

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

A Religious Weekly Review

JANUARY 6, 1923

---

Reunion

Cosmo Gordon Lang, D. D.

Two Notable Conferences

Rev. Frederick Lynch, D. D.

To be with Him and to Preach

Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, D. D.

Co-operation in Europe

Mrs. James P. Warbasse

Mr. David Lloyd George

Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, D. D.

LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

---

Three Dollars a Year

Ten Cents a Copy

Too Many Good Things

I have read THE CHRISTIAN WORK for some years and plan to read it for years to come with increasing satisfaction. It is the best educator in internationalism of which I have knowledge, and it is a lamentable fact that the American pulpit does not possess the international mind, consequently their congregations are not instructed and stimulated in international affairs as they should be.

But how does it happen that you did not feature on the cover page the brilliant reviews of the Life and Letters of Mr. Page?

A READER.

Books Received

The Outline of Science, Vol. IV. By J. Arthur Thomson. Putnam's. $4.50.
My Years on the Stage. By John Drew. E. P. Dutton & Co. $5.00.
The Life of the Spirit and the Life of Today. By Evelyn Underhill. E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.50.
The Religion of Science. By Wm. H. Wood. The Macmillan Co. $1.50.
Betty May. By Helen P. Hansen. Abingdon Press. $1.00.
Home Lessons in Religion. By S. W. Stagg and M. B. Stagg. $1.00.
Confessions of an Old Priest. By S. D. McConnell. The Macmillan Co. $1.25.
Preaching as a Fine Art. By Cotton Smith. The Macmillan Co. $1.75.
Because of Beauty. By Angela Morgan. Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50.
Skyline Camps. By Walter Prichard Eaton. W. A. Wilde Co.
Penguin Persons and Peppermints. By Walter Prichard Eaton. W. A. Wilde Co.
Select Notes on the International Sunday School Lessons. By A. R. Wells. W. A. Wilde Co.
Jacinth and Her Fairy Friends. By Nellie M. Pairpoint. W. A. Wilde Co.
Camp Fire Yarns. By Frank H. Cheley. W. A. Wilde Co.
Boy Scouts at Crater Lake. By Walter Prichard Eaton. W. A. Wilde Co.
Becky. By Amy E. Blanchard. W. A. Wilde Co.
The Young Wireless Operator with the Oyster Fleet. By Lewis E. Theiss. W. A. Wilde Co.
Scientific Christian Thinking for Young People. By Howard A. Johnston. Geo. H. Doran Co. $1.25.
Grimm's Fairy Tales. Edited by Frances J. Olcott. Penn Publishing Co. $7.00.
The Magyars in America. By D. A. Souders. Geo. F. Doran Co. $1.00.
Personal and Practical Christian Work. By T. C. Horton. Biola Book Room. $1.00.
The New Testament, a New Translation. By James Moffatt. Geo. H. Doran Co. $2.50.
Devices and Desires. By Francis C. MacDonald. Princeton Univ. Press. $1.50.
The Methodist Year Book for 1923. Methodist Book Concern. 50 cents.
Oracles of God. By W. E. Orchard, D.D. Pilgrim Press. $1.50.
Our Ambiguous Life. By John A. Hutton, D.D. Pilgrim Press. $1.50.
The Monday Club Sermons for 1923. Pilgrim Press. $1.75.
Constantinople Today. By Clarence R. Johnson, M.A. Macmillan Co. $5.00.
The Return of Christendom. By Various Writers. Macmillan Co. $1.75.

If you don't say, "I saw your advertisement in THE CHRISTIAN WORK," how will our advertisers know that their advertisement is bringing returns? You want credit for everything you do. So do we. Make it a habit to say, "I saw your ad. in the CHRISTIAN WORK."

The Capitol Avenue Baptist Church, Atlanta, Ga.

Note possibilities of closing off unneeded space to conserve light and heat.

An inkling of what you can do in your church. Wilson rolling partitions live up to our slogan, "One room into many, many, into one."

The Knowledge That Comes Only From Experience

To you who realize that movable partitions are necessary in every progressive church, this is important:

In the manufacture of rolling or folding partitions, no two orders are ever alike; requirements are different; sizes are different; interiors are different.

In over 47 years we have successfully completed 33,000 separate contracts and no two have been alike.

Ours is a made-to-order business. Each part for each order is made specially, and all in our self-contained plant.

Ours is the knowledge that can come only from experience.

To you we offer this knowledge to help solve the problem of housing the various interests of your church.

Our representatives are in most important cities, or you may address us in New York City.

We have several interesting booklets on the subject of church subdivision.

You are most welcome to copies of them.

J. G. WILSON CORPORATION

17 East 36th Street, New York
Offices in Principal Cities

FREE TO MINISTERS FOR POSTAGE

"The True Christian Religion," 1098 pages, postage, 20 cents.
"The Apocalypse Revealed," 110 pages, postage 15 cents.
"Heaven, the World of Spirits, and Hell," 350 pages, postage 15 cents.
"Arcania Celestia," Vol. I, 800 pages, postage 15 cents.
"Divine Love and Wisdom," 277 pages, postage 15 cents.
The above works of Emanuel Swedenborg are furnished Free, only to ministers, except postage, as indicated, which may be sent in the form of stamps, check or money order.

REV. L. G. LANDENBERGER
3741 Windsor Place St. Louis, Mo.

1922 PASSION PLAY beautifully illustrated by 58 colored slides, with lecture, for rent at $2.50, or for sale at $26.60. Also Wm. J. Bryan's "Back to God" and 400 other excellent illustrated lectures and sermons.

Write for information

VICTOR ANIMATOPH CO., Inc.
276 Victor Bldg., DAVENPORT, IOWA

ROCHE'S HERBAL EMBROCATION
RELIEVES SAFELY AND PROMPTLY

CROUP
OR WHOOPIING COUGH

Also wonderfully effective in Bronchitis, Lumbago and Rheumatism.
All druggists or
W. EDWARDS & SON E. FOUGERA & CO.
London, England 90-92 Beekman St. N. Y.

THE AMERICAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY

76 Wall Street, New York
(Incorporated April, 1833)

The only American undenominational, international and national Society aiding seamen.

Maintains a Sailors' Home and Institute at 507 West Street, New York City.

Places loan libraries ($25) on vessels sailing from New York.

Publishes the Sailors' Magazine, $1.00.

Supported by contributions and legacies.

JOHN B. CALVERT, D.D., President.
GEORGE SIDNEY WEBSTER, D.D., Sec'y.
Send contributions to CLARENCE C. PINNEO, Treasurer, 76 Wall Street, New York.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY

Its work is interdenominational evangelical and international in scope and is commended by all the churches. It has published the Gospel message in 178 languages dialects and characters. Its colporters meet the immigrants with Christian literature in many languages, and also visit the spiritually destitute. In the Spanish and Portuguese languages, chiefly for Latin America, there have been issued 16,012,088 copies of volumes, tracts and periodicals. Its literature in the native dialects has been the strong right arm of foreign missions. Its benevolent work is dependent upon donations and legacies.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS HALL, President.
REV. EDWIN NOAH HARDY, Ph.D., Gen. Sec.

Donations may be sent direct to American Tract Society, 101 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

ADVERTISING must pay the advertiser or else he cannot pay for space. Many readers of The Christian Work now answer advertisements seen in our paper and do not mention that fact. As a loyal subscriber to The Christian Work we are counting on you to help us by saying, "I saw your advertisement in The Christian Work," every time you answer one of our advertisements.

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

CONTINUING

THE EVANGELIST AND NEW YORK OBSERVER

Vol. 114.—No. 1

January 6, 1923

Whole No. 3004

CONTENTS

WORLD OF TODAY.....	3
EDITORIAL:
The Voice of the Church: Rev. Frederick Lynch, D.D.	5
To be with Him and to Preach: Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, D. D.	6
OBSERVER'S LETTER:
Two Notable Conferences.....	8
THE WEEKLY SERMON:
Reunion: Rev. Cosmo Gordon Lang, D.D.....	10
GENERAL:
Mr. David Lloyd George: Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, D. D. ....	14
Co-operation in Europe: Mrs. James P. Warbasse....	22
LITERARY SUPPLEMENT .....	16
COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT:
The Self Americanization of a Country Church.....	25
A SYMPOSIUM—On "The Gap in the Wall"
Various writers .....	27

THE CHRISTIAN WORK; Published weekly: 10 cents a copy, $3.00 a year in the United States, $3.52 in Canada, and $4.04 in all other countries (postage included.)

Publication and circulation office, 45 Willard Avenue, Providence, R. I. Editorial and advertising office, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Subscriptions may be forwarded to either of the above offices.
Entered as second class matter November 18, 1922, at the U. S. post-office, Providence, R. I. under the act of March 3, 1879.

Printed in U. S. A.—Published by The Christian World, Inc., Frederick Lynch, President; Henry Strong Huntington, Vice-President; Benson Y. Landis, Secretary-Treasurer.

Printed by Norman C. Lynch Co., Incorporated 45 Willard Ave., Providence, R. I.; 70 Fifth Ave., New York.

The World of To-day

SHOULD ARBUCKLE FILMS BE RELEASED

Some nine months ago Roscoe Arbuckle, a moving picture humorist, was tried for the murder of a screen actress under scandalous circumstances. The jury failed to convict the man, but the whole affair left no doubt of the rottenness of Arbuckle's private life. Will H. Hays, as president of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, ordered that no more Arbuckle films should be released. For seven months no film in which the man figured was used in the United States. Last month it was announced that a motion picture producer by the name of Schenck was proposing to employ Arbuckle as a screen actor once more and that Mr. Hays had no objection to the release of the films. Arbuckle's conduct since his murder trial, Mr. Hays says, proves that he merits another chance. "So far as I am concerned," he says, "there will be no suggestion now that he should not have his opportunity to go to work in his profession." Mr. Hays' action has aroused a very general protest. Dr. Macfarland, of the Federal Council of Churches, chairman of the committee to help maintain the standards of the movies appointed by religious organizations at Mr. Hays' request, protested that the question of Arbuckle's return to the screen was exactly the kind of question that should have come before the committee. Mr. Hays did not submit it. A great many motion picture producers have already agreed that they will not use Arbuckle films. "Ordinary business sense," comments "The New York Times," "forbids Arbuckle's return to the the 'movies.'" What is the basic principle in the whole affair? Are we to refuse to read a man's novels or listen to his music because his private life is not spotless? The old story runs that Queen Victoria and one of her friends, discussing the pleasures of heaven, spoke of the interesting people one would meet there, such as Enoch, Abraham, Isaiah. Her councillor suggested, "David." "I won't meet David," was the Queen's retort as the tale is told. But most of us are willing to read the twenty-third Psalm even though the man who wrote it committed adultery with Bathsheba. We cannot refuse to enjoy the good in a man's work because there is some ill in the man. Does this mean, then, that this man Arbuckle should be reinstated on the screen? Does not a quite new element enter in the present case? We do not read the twenty-third Psalm with any thought of David's life. But who will want to see Arbuckle now? Will it not be only people who have a morbid interest in him on account of the shameful revelations concerning him? Certainly no harm to the public is wrought by keeping Arbuckle off the screen. Just as certainly some harm may be done by letting him return to it. Some weak persons may argue, "Roscoe Arbuckle's rottenness was known. But he succeeded today just as well as—or even better than—if he had not been so unsavory. He

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

'got away with it.' I guess the rest of us can." Mr. Hays, we are sure, does not want to help people to reach that conclusion. We trust he will reconsider his decision.

WHAT THE PUBLIC WANTS OF THE COAL COMMISSION

The Research Department of the Federal Council's Social Service Commission has put out a most valuable summary of opinion on the work which should be done by the Coal Commission. In the first place, the public evidently wants accurate information. The editor of a great metropolitan paper which has given much space to the coal controversy complains that "none of us has sufficient data yet on which to formulate a policy." One of the ablest members of the A. F. of L. executive writes, "If there is any one thing in connection with the coal situation which impresses the thinking man, it is the absence of reliable and adequate knowledge." The Bureau's correspondents are especially desirous that the Commission secure the facts concerning investment and profits, as a vital element in the whole problem. Then, too, there is manifest a concern as to the relation of civil liberties to the control of the mining industry, with particular reference to portions of Pennsylvania and West Virginia. The public is apparently well aware now that the crux of this whole matter in so far as the labor controversy is concerned, is the question whether the miners are to be allowed to unionize or are to be permanently arrayed against each other in competing union and non-union fields. Some persons recommend the latter alternative as a matter of public policy; others see justice in the former. No organized public opinion in favor of Government ownership or of full Government control of the mines appears to exist. It is felt, rightly or wrongly, that Federal operation of the railroads was accompanied by waste and inefficiency, and that industrial progress in general demands as little Federal interference as possible. There has been much talk of nationalization among the miners themselves, but official spokesmen for labor are by no means of one mind on the subject. There is on all hands fear that the machinery of Government control would fall under political domination. Yet the coal situation so clearly constitutes an emergency that many people are thinking in terms of regulation through one or more Federal agencies. The analogy of railroad regulation through the Interstate Commerce Commission has apparently impressed many people as instructive in this connection. Further, it appears likely that if the threatened strike takes place next Spring, there will be a general demand for drastic action. "I am against the nationalization of any industry," writes a well-known conservative editor, but adds that "it may be that nationalization is the only cure for the troubles of the coal industry, and if the present Commission so reports, I should certainly be inclined to a favorable consideration of its recommendation." The whole inquiry shows the impatience of the public with the present socially wasteful and precarious method of running the coal industry.

FEDERAL AID FOR THE RURAL SCHOOLS

At a recent conference of the American Country Life Association, Professor William C. Bagley of Columbia University read an informing paper on the "National Responsibilities for the Improvement of Rural Education." "Whether it be true," he said, "as the army of figures seem to indicate, that one-fourth of our young men are unable to read a newspaper intelligently or write an intelligible letter, so unfortunate a condition would not be at all surprising in view of the fact that at least one-fourth of our elementary teachers are no more than boys and girls themselves and have had in preparation for their responsible work no training that really deserves the name. Practically one-fourth of all our elementary teachers and one-half of our rural teachers would be disqualified to vote because of their youth." Among the more serious defects in our rural school system are—we quote: "First, in typical states, the average length of service of the rural teachers is not more than two years as against eight or nine years for the urban teachers; secondly, an overwhelming majority of the rural teachers have not passed the age of twenty-one, while tens of thousands of them are only sixteen, seventeen and eighteen years old; thirdly, the proportion of rural teachers who have had any training whatsoever for their work is so small as to be practically negligible; and fourthly, the supervision which has been developed in the city school systems, and which has done something to counteract the evils inherent in the public attitude toward elementary teaching, is practically nonexistent in the rural schools." The rural schools enroll more than half of the boys and girls of the nation and the formal educational equipment of a very large fraction of the voters in the nation will be limited to what these schools provide. Professor Bagley states that out of every six illiterates in our native born population five live in the rural districts. Professor Bagley would attempt to remedy the situation through Federal aid. He would provide for competent students subsidies or scholarships sufficiently generous to enable them to undertake proper preparation for the service without expense to their parents. The aims that Professor Bagley seeks to further are embodied in the Towner-Sterling bill which awaits action by Congress. It provides for the creation of a Federal department of education and for the appropriation of Federal funds to encourage the promotion of educational projects by the states. The following specific aims are enumerated: (a) removal of illiteracy; (b) Americanization of the foreign born; (c) promotion of physical training and health service; (d) training of teachers; (e) equalization of educational opportunities within the states' borders. The language of the bill is intended to safeguard the control of education by the states. Professor Bagley further argues that the United States has already set a precedent for Federal initiative and aid in agricultural, commercial, and other welfare projects, in none of which has the administration tended toward Federal control.

EDITORIAL

EDITORIAL STAFF

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

Frederick Lynch

ASSOCIATE EDITOR

Henry Strong Huntington

MANAGING EDITOR

Benson Y. Landis

LITERARY EDITOR

Tertius Van Dyke

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Edmund de Schweinitz Brunner

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT

Violette Reynolds

CONTRIBUTING STAFF

Henry A. Atkinson
Peter Ainslie
Hugh Black
S. Parkes Cadman

Sidney L. Gulick
Rufus M. Jones
E. Guy Talbott
T. Rhondda Williams

EDITORIAL COUNCIL

Nehemiah Boynton
Williams Adams Brown
Howard Duffield
Sherwood Eddy
Irving Fisher
J. W. Johnson

George Foster Peabody
George A. Plimpton
Howard C. Robbins
Fred B. Smith
Cornelius Woelfkin
Shailler Mathews

Charles S. Macfarland

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS

Austria: Professor Carl Beth
Canada: Dr. J. Lovell Murray
Czechoslovakia: Professor Francis Zilka
France: Rev. Professor Wilfred Monod
Germany: Direktor A. Hinderer
Great Britain: Rev. Sidney M. Berry
Hungary: Dr. S. Szabo
Switzerland: Pastor Adolf Keller

lot of Geneva, Switzerland, Dr. Speer, Dr. Zelig, Bishop Brent and others all pleaded that America go speedily to the help of Europe; that America take her place in the councils of the nations, that America bear her share of the world's burdens, that America realize that she belongs to the family of nations, that America recognize all humanity as her neighbor, and answer to the call of need regardless of place or distance. As we said not only did all the speakers emphasize this but the applause for these utterances seemed enthusiastic and almost unanimous.

More than this, the final statement of the meeting read by Dr. Shailler Mathews at the closing session where Dr. Speer and Bishop Brent spoke was very explicit in its demands. It called attention to the fact that more than fifty observers visiting Europe during the past year for the Federal Council agree with the many representatives from other organizations that unless the United States comes to the rescue of Europe the world is threatened with chaos. It is evident to anyone studying the situation that the so-called political and economic problems are moral problems caused by the war in which the United States took part, and Europe cannot meet them without the sympathetic council and the economic help of America. Europe is threatened by a return to prewar conditions or worse. The statement then calls upon the Churches to educate the people regarding the necessity for the United States to assume its full share of responsibility in international tasks. It says that our government should either avail itself of the existing provision for organized international co-operation—it must mean the League of Nations here, for there is no other existing provision—or present some better way. Indeed this pronouncement is so explicit and so outspoken that it deserves quotation in full. It is as follows:

"Reports from fifty observers representing the Federal council supplemented and checked by the statements of representatives of economic, commercial and political organizations make it plain that unless the United States comes to the aid of Europe the world is threatened with chaos.

"It needs only an ordinary contact with continental Europe to make clear the fact that her political problems are fundamentally economic and moral, that the European nations can never meet the conditions caused by war, in which the United States was a participant, without the sympathetic counsel, and economic help of the United States.

"If, as seems not improbable, the nations of the world revert to prewar policies of economic imperialism supported by rival armaments, then a new war is only a matter of time.

"We therefore appeal to the churches to become centers of public education on the moral necessity of the United States assuming its full share of responsibility in international tasks.

The Voice of the Church

A FEW days ago the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ held its annual meeting in Indianapolis. This meeting of the Executive Committee is composed of delegates officially appointed by the various communions so it might reasonably be taken for granted that it speaks in its deliberations and findings for the Protestant Churches of America. Indeed this is generally taken for granted. And the delegates who happened to speak at Indianapolis were not only very eminent representatives of their several denominations, but were in many cases officials holding high positions: bishops, moderators, missionary secretaries and presidents of various boards.

This group of men was in session three days. Many subjects were up for discussion; but no matter on what theme any man might be speaking before he had finished he got over onto the subject of America's co-operation with the nations of Europe in solving the problems of Europe and healing the sores of the world. About half of the addresses were on this particular theme and these were the addresses which aroused the most interest and elicited the most applause. Mr. Fred B. Smith, Bishop Nuelson, Bishop Cannon, Pastor Berte-

EDITORIAL

"Our government should either avail itself of the existing provisions for organized international co-operation or of presenting some better way.

"We believe that the United States should definitely associate itself with the International Court of Justice now established at The Hague, in which we see the consummation of many decades of American desires and efforts for international peace through justice based on law.

"We urge that the United States also associate itself fully without delay with the humanitarian commissions of the League of Nations, now affording the most effective agency for dealing with the immediate non-political task confronting all Christian people.

"We voice the gratitude of the churches of America for the success attending the conference on limitation of armaments convened by our government and we urge our government take steps toward the convening of a second conference to deal with the economic reconstruction of the Western world.

"Above all would we declare that the hope of a warless world does not rest on organizations and conferences alone; back of economic and political disorders lie fear, suspicion and selfishness. The remedy for such evils must ultimately be spiritual. The nations of the world must be brought to accept a new way of life, the one revealed by our Lord Jesus Christ. They must learn that to give justice is better and wiser than to fight for rights."

The point we wish to make is this, that if the Federal Council really voices the Churches of America then either they have not made themselves heard in Washington or Washington does not care what the Christians or at least the Church people think. It looks as though the latter must be the case, for the Churches have been incessantly saying to Washington what is contained in these resolutions. The Federal Council, the Church Peace Union, The World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches, the various denominational conventions and assemblies have sent delegates to the White House and the State Department again and again. Individual churches have bombarded Washington with resolutions to this effect and the quoted utterances of outstanding pastors and laymen have been widely reported, and yet the administration has made no move. Now there goes to Washington this official utterance of the Protestantism of America. Again we say, it looks as though Washington considered the opinions of the Church people of America as of no account. Therein we think they are much mistaken. Every speaker on international topics whom we have recently met has told us that wherever he has gone he has found a rapidly growing impatience with our present policy of inaction. The Christian people have a vague feeling that we are standing aloof while others are drowning and they do not feel comfortable. That was decidedly the impression we got at Indianapolis. We have recently visited on a speaking tour some Chambers of Commerce and the feeling is not confined to the Churches. But the Church people are getting uncomfortable. We fear a storm is brewing. Perhaps Washington would do well to stop and think whether the voice of the Church is so weak and negligible as it seems to them. An aroused Church put prohibition over very quickly: it may put a world policy over as quickly if it gets aroused.

F. L.

To Be with Him and to Preach

WHEN one looks out upon the vast network of organizations all over the world, known as the Christian Church or churches, it is difficult to think oneself back to the days of the early Galilean ministry of Jesus, and to establish any connection between these later developments and that movement of simple and unlearned men who gathered round the Galilean Teacher and became His disciples. I was vividly aware of this as I stood once in the courtyard of the Vatican in Rome, and saw the Pope and his cardinals and his bodyguard of soldiers. My mind went back from all that pomp and pageant to the seashore and the hillsides of Galilee, and the quiet shadowed garden of Gethsemane, and I could not help asking myself the question: "Did all this spring from that?" Looking at a fully-grown oak one might wonder whether that all came from an acorn. The answer would be "yes" and "no." The oak is the acorn plus the universe. The great river that bears on its bosom the traffic of mighty cities originated in a rill trickling out of the heart of a distant mountain. But the river is not the rill—it is the rill plus all the tributaries which have flown into it on its course. Something like this is the relation between the Christian organization as it stands in the world today and that religious movement started in Galilee with the preaching of Jesus and His disciples. It was a movement that soon gathered into itself accretions from Roman life, Greek thought, and the oriental religious cults. And when the Roman Empire adopted Christianity as the State religion, it was not the Roman Empire only that suffered change, but Christianity too. Many elements entered into it that did not belong to its origin. So when it is said that Jesus made Christendom it is much like saying that the acorn made the oak, or the rill the river. In each case you have to add a thousand other divers influences. In thinking of this relation two contentions are illegitimate. One is the contention that the modern form may be found in the early movement. It is surely incontrovertible that no existing church can find its exact counterpart in the New Testament, not even the Congregational Church. The other contention which is illegitimate is that because an existing church form is not in the New Testament, it must be wrong. Why should it? There are many good things which are not in the New Testament. Why should it be supposed for a moment that Jesus and His disciples and a few Galilean peasants, living in a small country where their life was very simple, would evolve a form of church government fitted for all countries and for all ages of the world. It is very certain that they never intended to do anything of the kind. Every age and every land must find its own form, a form which is best fitted as an instrument through which the spirit of the church can serve the world. Even in the courtyard of the Vatican I felt no inclination to condemn the Roman Church because it was so unlike that early movement of Jesus and His disciples. If I condemned it, it would be on no other grounds. This is not to say that the early movement has lost its spiritual significance—that is another question altogether. Our interest and our good are not merely in historical connections. I should say that forms a part, the nearer we can get to the spirit of that early movement, and especially the spirit of the Founder, the better it will be for every church whatever its form. So it is exceedingly refreshing to read, even if it be for the hundredth time, the story in Mark of the early preaching of Jesus. The problem at first was not how to attract the multitude, but how to preserve for Himself enough privacy to maintain efficiency for the service of the multitude. The crowd came to hear Him, for which no doubt there were various reasons. Once when He retired to the seashore and knew that the crowd would come on after Him, he asked His disciples to have a little boat ready. That might almost make a parable. How many people today feel the pressure of circumstances, just as Jesus felt the pressure of that crowd? Would that they all could make some provision corresponding to that of the little boat, so that they might escape from the pressure at intervals into quiet and meditation for the renewal of strength and serenity. To have little boat ready would be a great thing—some power to carry us out of the throng and the press, where our best soul is liable to be crushed—to where we could maintain wholeness of being and integrity of character, and a saner and completer view of the surging world. Think of what it would mean to a politician who is pulled and swayed so many ways by so many different influences and currents. Gladstone had it; in the midst of any political tumult he could always retire to his temple of peace to survey the scene from a higher point of view. Abraham Lincoln had it. With some statesmen you always feel that what they say or do is owing to the influence of some pressure which is upon them at the time; with Lincoln you know that what he said or did was owing to his own great conviction nurtured in solitude with God. There are many indications in the Gospels that Jesus felt this need in His own life, the provision of the little boat is one of them, the power to move away from things, in order not to be influenced by them in the wrong way, in order to understand them better, and at last to serve the people with greater efficiency.

EDITORIAL

Now, when Jesus came to appoint an inner circle of disciples, He bore this need of His own life in mind;

"He appointed twelve, that they might be with Him, and that He might send them forth to preach." The words do not mean that they would be with Him for a time, and that after that they would go out to preach continually. It means rather that they would come back to Him again and again. That seems to me quite ideal. Their mission would be to preach the kingdom of God, but they were not likely to do that very fruitfully until they had been with Him, to learn His great conception of the kingdom, and to catch from Him the spirit of the kingdom. But even after doing this once, twice, they would need to renew it. A preaching mission among their compatriots would bring them up against so many divers opinions and tempers, and subject them to so many trials, that they would need to re-think and re-feel the great things of the kingdom in communion with the Master. This was their little boat—this fellowship with Him. To have the great soul of Jesus pouring its wealth quietly and gradually into their souls, breathing upon them calming holy influences of life far above theirs, and the serenity of a mind able to hold such converse with God as they had not attained to—what a steadying, what an enriching time it must have been. It was discriminating and purifying too. If they came back elated with success, as they are once reported to have done, He turned their attention off the success to the importance of their own character. On the other hand, if failure depressed them over-much there was nothing like coming back to be with Him. Probably far more servants of the kingdom are depressed by failure than over-elated by success. For every preacher who gets unbalanced through having testimony paid to his usefulness, ninety-nine break their hearts because they have no evidence that they are doing good. It must have been a great thing to be able to come back from those successive journeys to be with Him.

Now, there will always be an intimate relation between our communion with the Great Spirit of all good and the effectiveness of our work in the world for the kingdom of God. We need not think exclusively of preachers. The servants of the kingdom of God are of many kinds, and they are working in all sorts of spheres, and under all sorts of conditions, with many divers temptations and trials. Their work to be persistent must have faith behind it, and hope in it, and a great pure love flowing through it all. Wherever you want to preach the kingdom of God, to set up the reign of righteousness in the world, you want a faith that nothing can daunt, a hope that nothing can quell, and a love that will overcome all things. If these are to be secured for the public service they must be cherished in the private life. There is need of a spiritual meditation in loneliness, and there is need of an inner circle of fellowship with the like-minded, whose benefits correspond with those which Jesus and the disciples derived from having their times together. From all the public influences of life, and from all the thronging pressures of circumstance, we must learn to throw ourselves back frequently into communion with the Great Spirit of all good. He is a real Spirit. He is in us, and with us, and yet He is not ourselves. A writer in the "Hibbert" sometime ago said he had more and more difficulty in believing in a supreme mind in the universe, and he quoted with approval someone who said: "The Great Companion is dead." No, the Great Companion is not dead. If there is any reality in the universe it is He. You cannot reach conviction about Him by argument. But those who commune with Him need no argument. He is strength, and inspiration, and comfort to them. Times of communion with the Great Spirit, the helping God, are necessary to those who are engaged in the task of propagating the kingdom of God in the world.

T. R. W.

THE OBSERVER

Two Notable Conferences

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

TWO conferences have recently been held in New York whose findings I imagine are fairly representative of the opinion held by the majority of Christians in the United States regarding the duty of the United States in Europe and the Near East. I say "representative" because the delegates came from all parts of the country and represented most of the large communions. The first of these was called by a joint invitation from the Federal Council of Churches and the Near East Relief Committee. It remained in session all day and there was the frankest discussion by Messrs. Vickery, Acheson, Emhardt, White, Riggs, Salmon, Hibbard, Caldwell, Haven, Staub and Mrs. Cotton of the attitude the United States should take on the Near East horrors and how it should make its voice heard in the cause of humanity. It was interesting to note that more than in any previous discussion the provision for a national home for the Armenian people, protected by the League of Nations or some joint agreement of the nations, should be established. It was felt by everyone present—I imagine it is felt by everyone absent—that there will never be any security or sense of safety for the Armenian people so long as they remain under Turkish rule. It is quite generally known by all who have intimate knowledge of the Turk that he intends to exterminate the Armenians as soon as possible, leaving not one Christian to pollute his holy soil. He would have done this long ago had it not been for his wholesome fear of England. He would have done it during the war only he was restrained by Germany. It would have been bad strategy. Now flushed with power and only Great Britain protesting he will probably proceed to carry out this ultimate purpose. Therefore, since our government will not interfere with this holy massacre, it might at least use its influence to get him out of Turkey into a home of his own, where Great Britain—apparently the only power that cares what becomes of Christians in the Near East—may protect him against invasion by the Turks. The results of this discussion were embodied in the following resolution:

"That we make an earnest plea that this Government use its powerful influence to secure for the Armenian people a protected National Home, so that the stricken people may not find in Soviet Russia their only friend, and that America may enter into its present opportunity of expressing again its historic interest in oppressed peoples of other lands."

There was undisguised disappointment expressed by everybody who spoke that our nation was not to be represented at Lausanne by official delegates—only by listeners. It was hoped that even at this last moment our government might cable one of our diplomats abroad to represent the United States. But such was not to be. There was on the other hand much enthusiasm felt by the delegates and shared, I think, by all the Churches, that Dr. James L. Barton, chairman of the Near East Relief, Dr. George R. Montgomery, secretary of the Armenia-America Society, and Dr. William Peet of the American Board had sailed for Lausanne to do whatever might be possible unofficially to protect the missionary and charitable interests of the American Churches in the Near East. The final resolutions were very significant and I quote part of them here with the striking preamble:

"Whereas Secretary Hughes has definitely stated in his recent address at Boston, when referring to the situation in the Near East, that this Government has pledged itself to see that the international obligations of the United States shall be met and that there shall be no

confiscation or repudiation of America's rights, and

"Whereas we believe that even more important than property rights are human rights, involving other people than ourselves and laying upon us inescapable moral obligation,

"Therefore be it Resolved

1. That we respectfully assure the President that we welcome the statements of Secretary Hughes in regard to this Government's intention to stand for

- (a) The freedom of the straits;
- (b) The protection of religious minorities in the Near East;
- (c) The protection of American property rights and the lives of American citizens;
- (d) The freedom to carry on religious and educational work.

"We believe these things can be more surely accomplished by the appointment of accredited delegates at Lausanne clothed with more power than mere observers, and we believe this can be done without entangling America in European political affairs.

"We also hope that America may have among her representatives at the Lausanne Conference someone from this country who is intimately acquainted with the humanitarian interests of the Near East, and who is so closely in touch with present-day opinion in America that he can voice the sentiment which has expressed itself in the gifts for relief, missionary and educational work of over $120,000,000. In making this request we believe that we are expressing the sentiment of approximately fifty thousand members of the Christian Churches of all faiths in America."

The second conference was even more representative of the Churches for it was composed of official delegates. It was called by the Federal Council of the Churches to consider co-operation with the European churches especially in the matter of relief work. During the war and since the war the various denominations in the United States have been pouring millions of dollars into Europe, raised by the denominations and distributed by the denominational agents in Europe or by the local church of the communion sending the money. (It should be said here however that in no instance has the money been used only for relief of the denomination represented. Everybody who needed has shared.) It was felt by some of the leaders of the European churches, especially those in Switzerland, that greater efficiency and perhaps wiser distribution might be possible in the future if the various denominations could co-ordinate their work somewhat, confer often together, perhaps co-operate in some instances. To consider this question a conference of the European Protestant group to meet with the Americans was held at Copenhagen last August. The result was that a central office was set up in Switzerland with Dr. Adolph Keller acting as Secretary. It was to consider the work of this office and the general situation in Europe as related to the Protestant churches that the conference was called in New York.

Bishop Cannon of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, presided and the discussions were intensely interesting. In the first place Bishop Nuelson, the Bishop for Europe of the American Methodist Episcopal Church, and Dr. J. H. Rushbrooke of London, who is the commissioner in Europe for the Baptist Churches were present and told the real condition of Europe. They both live in it, and live in it all the year round, and touch it vitally and know the people. They agreed in their story and both agreed that the only hope was in America and that she ought to be there. (Why is it that the moment anyone says this before any American audience everybody claps their hands or shouts "Amen" and yet our government moves not hand or foot to have any helpful part in world affairs?) Both Bishop Nuelson and Dr. Rushbrooke have just come from Russia. Both are more hopeful than Americans have been. Perhaps the hopefulness is due not to the fact that Sovietism is proving successful, but that Lenine is dropping it point by point, and as he gets back toward democratic government and the recognition of capital the nation is gradually recovering from prostration. Bishop Nuelson said that there was a decided disposition in the great Russian Church as it was emerging from its period of darkness and persecution, toward a more evangelical attitude in both faith and work.

There were other representatives of the European churches present—from France, Italy, Czecho-Slovakia and other states. Rev. Georges Galienne of France has been receiving very earnest attention as he has been presenting to Americans the attitude of the French Protestant churches toward the position of the French government in Turkey. (The article which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN WORK for December 9 is in substance what he had to say at this conference.) The general feeling which grew more and more pronounced as the discussion went on was to the following effect:

1. The Churches of America have risen to the call of humanity and taken their place by the side of the European Churches both during the war and since, in all relief work, in rendering all assurance to the weaker denominations, in solving all the problems that face the European Churches, in the task of apportionment between the countries formerly at war against each other and in the endeavor through a more united Church to build a new and Christian world-order.

2. Our government responded to the call superbly during the war, but has failed during the distressing peace. It is to be hoped she will now take her place in association with the nations as the American Church has with the churches of Europe.

3. It is greatly to be desired that all the communions act in Europe as far as possible unitedly, as one great American Church both for the sake of efficiency and for the illustration to the world of the unity of the Church of God.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Reunion

By Cosmo Gordon Lang, D. D.

Archbishop of York

[Delivered in St. Alban's Church, London, Wednesday, November 15th, being the first of a series of addresses on Reunion.]

THE Lambeth appeal to all Christian people on the subject of Reunion, which was issued in 1920, marked a new stage in the evolution of the old, difficult, yet ever-urgent problem of the recovery of the lost unity of the Church of Christ. It certainly had a great effect at the time. It was not that it said anything that was very new, but men felt that what was said was said in a new tone; they recognized the unfolding of a new vision, they saw the possibility of a new beginning. In a situation which had become an impasse a new door of hope seemed to be opened. Nor was the effect merely a nine-day's wonder. The appeal was translated into nine languages. It was conveyed to the heads of the great Roman and Eastern Orthodox Churches and of various Protestant communions in England and Scotland and throughout the world. Everywhere there was a quickening of movements which had become sometimes despairing, sometimes disillusioned, always halting. The Eastern Orthodox Church at once, and in many ways, strengthened its old desire for a closer union with the Anglican Church throughout the world. The Patriarch of Constantinople, dealing with one particular difficulty, registered his own conclusions in favor of the validity of Anglican orders, and requested the other patriarchs to conform, if they could, with his decision. Here let me make a digression. I desire, at this fateful time, to record our sympathy with the Patriarch and his fellow-Christians in Constantinople, exposed as they are to danger more serious and more imminent than the people of this country have as yet at all realized. With that expression of sympathy with him and his fellow-Christians I would combine the expression of a very earnest and serious hope that the Government of this country when it enters the forthcoming Peace Conference will, with its allies, make sure of securing that our honor shall not be set aside and that adequate protection shall be given to the lives and liberties of the minorities in Asia Minor and in Constantinople.

As soon as the Lambeth appeal had been issued, movements—indeed, negotiations—between the different Churches began and are being carried on in Sweden, in the United States of America, in Canada, in Australia, in India, in Africa, in China. I want to remove a possible misunderstanding. The Lambeth appeal is not in any way limited in its scope to our Protestant fellow-Christians. On the contrary, it embraces the ancient episcopal communions in the East and West to which ours is bound by many ties of common faith and tradition. I have already spoken of the East, and as to the West the recent call to reunion given by that veteran apostle of the cause, Lord Halifax, whatever may be thought of his ardent hope or of the obstacles in the way which at present would seem to be insuperable, is a reminder that to the eye of faith no true and full vision of reunion can leave out the great Roman Catholic Church; and no plan of reunion could meet the needs either of the Church or of the world which cut out the possibility that in the patient providence of God the vision may one day be fulfilled.

But my theme today is the relation between the Anglican Church in England and those who group themselves under the title of the Evangelical Free Churches. Here, thank God, the way of approach is open, and we are on it. The stage so far reached is marked by the report of the Joint Conference on Church Unity held this year at Lambeth Palace. Let me recall the history of this document. In September, 1921, the Federal Council of the Evangelical Free Churches, desiring explication of expressions in the appeal which were felt to have an ambiguous character, appointed a number of their most influential members to such conference with the two Archbishops and with other members of the Church of England as they may appoint. The response of the Archbishops was naturally ready and eager. They appointed nine bishops to meet these representatives of the Federal Council; later, to these nine bishops, the Bishop of Salisbury, who had just come from Australia, was added, and, as theological experts, Dr. A. C. Headlam and Dr. W. H. Frere. The Conference met at Lambeth on November 30, 1921. Note the significance of what immediately happened. It was at once realized by all that unless some foundation were laid of at least understanding and, if possible, agreement upon certain large and ultimate principles, discussion would merely beat the air. It was a welcome recognition that any real approach to unity must start from some common conception of truth; that it is upon truth in the last resort and not upon convenience that polity must be based. Accordingly, a sub-committee was appointed, charged with the very difficult task of considering some of these larger questions of principle. It consisted of six members of the Church of England—the Bishops of Gloucester, Peterborough, Ripon and Salisbury, with Dr. Headlam and Dr. Frere, and six members of the Free Churches—Dr. J. D. Jones, the Moderator of the Council, Dr. Garvie, Dr. Scott Lidgett, Professor A. S. Peake, Dr. P. Carnegie Simpson, and Dr. J. H. Shakespeare—a company at once representative and able. I had the honor and privilege of being chairman of that committee. It held long meetings at Lambeth in January, March and April of this year. It decided to consider chiefly the three following subjects: The Nature of the Church, the Nature of the Ministry, the Place of the Creeds in a united Church; truly questions going to the root of the matter. It presented its report to the larger conference on May 24 in the form of a series of propositions on these three subjects, to which all its members had given their unanimous agreement. After full discussion the larger conference unanimously gave its approval to these propositions in the form which has been published.

In the second place, note the limitations of this document. It is expressly stated that it is not intended as a complete statement of the great subjects with which it deals or even as expressing what individual members of the Conference or of the Churches they represent might regard as a full statement of their own positions. I want to emphasize this limitation, for criticism has been made in Anglican quarters that the statement does not cover the whole ground of the truth as it is held by the Church of England, still less as it is held by many of its devoted members. Of course it does not. If it did there would be no problem to consider. Since there is a problem, and a most difficult one, the first step, on which all others depend is to secure agreement at least upon great fundamental issues. That this statement does not measure a remarkable and may prove to be an even more remarkable agreement on such fundamental issues I hope in a moment to show. That is the main point. The temperament that cannot get beyond the horns of the dilemma, all or nothing, can make no way in the quest either of unity or of truth.

Again, it has sometimes been said that it is useless to formulate agreement when the points of acutest difference are left untouched. On that criticism I would make three comments. First, that the statement expressly acknowledges that many matters of great importance are not dealt with by it, and that these must be, and I may add are being, the subject of future discussion. Secondly, I would say that it is the way of folly on entering serious and purposeful conference to throw down at once the challenge of the most contentious matter. It is the way of wisdom to prepare for the discussion of these matters by reaching agreement about principles upon which their solution must depend. That is the way which this Conference chose, and I would add that the measure of agreement reached does cover matters on which there has been throughout history most acute differences, differences which have, indeed, been largely responsible for the divisions of Christendom. Once again I would ask you to note the general character of the statement. It is an attempt to reach not words but truth. We are in these days accustomed, perhaps too well accustomed, to the phrase "finding a formula." If, indeed, the formula is one which secures real agreement on vital points, to find it is a great achievement, but a formula, however skilful, which avoids the real issue by artfully concealing unresolved differences is a mere makeshift. If this were the real character of the statement it would, indeed, be poor stuff. But I can truly say of the committee over which I presided that its concern was to find, not a formula but a common mind, an agreement upon vital principles. It seemed to me very little like a company of diplomats negotiating a possible compromise; it was, I think, much more like a comradeship of men, after prayer to God and in trust upon His Spirit, seeking to reach a truth which they could hold together.

Having made these preliminary observations in order to explain the nature of the statement and to anticipate criticisms which may be made upon it, let me try to summarize its main points. It can only be a summary. I would beg of you to obtain a copy of the report, published under the title of "Church Unity" by the S. P. C. K., and to read and study it carefully. I do not think anyone can be in line with the movements of his Church, whatever it may be, unless he possesses this statement.

First, then, on the Nature of the Church. The first proposition laid down is all-important; indeed it is the basis upon which the whole structure rests. There are ultimately but two fundamental conceptions of the Church, between which a decisive choice must be made. Is it created by the association of men or of societies of men who accept the Gospel declared by Christ or give their allegiance to His teaching and example, or is it created by God, a body or organism of which Christ Himself is the constitutive principle, which men do not form but into which they are brought? Is it based upon the consent of men and societies of men to the Gospel as God's redemptive purpose for mankind, or is it itself part of that Gospel, part of that redemptive purpose? The first conception is quite intelligible. It has been in history and is still widely held; it underlies a great deal of modern popular thinking and speaking about the Church; but it is not compatible with the second. A choice must be made. The whole problem of the unity of the Church depends upon that choice. The statement before us makes it decisive choice: "The foundation of the Church rests not upon the will or consent or beliefs of men, whether as individuals or as societies, but upon the creative Will of God." A great theologian has said that if that were accepted there ought to be no fundamental obstacle to reunion. From this premiss conclusions of vital moment follow. The Church is one and there can be but one Church. This one divinely ordained Church has on earth its visible expression, the visible Church. (I am summarizing the statement and occasionally adding a comment.) This visible Church must possess certain visible and recognizable marks by which it can be seen and known by men. These have been, since the days of the Apostles at least, the following:—"The profession of faith in God as revealed and incarnate in Christ; the observance of the two Sacraments ordained by Christ Himself; an ideal of the Christian life protected by a common discipline; a ministry, representative of the Church for the preaching of the Word, the administration of the Sacraments, and the maintenance of the unity and continuity of the Church's witness and work."

Accordingly, since the visible Church, by virtue of its essential character, its oneness in Christ, ought to be visibly one, its unity is a matter not of human desire but of Divine purpose, and therefore of Divine obligation. The only true raison d'être, therefore, of local churches is that they should be local representatives of the One Church. The existence of Churches that have grown up in history, independent of and even rivalling one another in the same place, is not in accordance with the purpose of Christ. Thus the very use of the word "Churches," however natural for purposes of convenience and courtesy, is itself a rebuke, a reminder that we have drifted into a wholly abnormal condition, and a call to restore the true position in accordance with the purpose of the Lord.

Then follows a paragraph which is very compressed and would require a separate lecture to unfold what is implied within it. It does not, it cannot, make judgments as to the status of existing Churches, but it comprises the principles by which this judgment should be made. "The marks which ought to characterize the Church visible on earth are possessed by these existing separate Churches and societies of Christian people in varying degrees of completeness or defect. Hence, even though they be parts of the visible Church, they cannot be considered as all alike giving equally adequate expression to the Lord's Mind and Purpose. Some, indeed, may be so defective that they cannot rightly be judged to be parts of that Church. But such judgments, though made in trust that they are in accordance with the Divine Mind, must be regarded as limited to the sphere of the visible Church as an ordered society here on earth. It would be presumption to claim that they have a like validity in the sphere of the whole Church as the One Body of the redeemed in Christ, for within that sphere judgment can only be given by the All-knowing Mind and Sovereign Mercy of God."

These are fundamental principles; they go to the root of the matter. If there is agreement there, there may be agreement all along the line.

Secondly, the Nature of the Ministry. Here again we are confronted by two fundamental conceptions between which a decisive choice must be made. Is a Ministry, a Word, a Sacrament a mere matter of human convenience, naturally, indeed, quite important, but still a matter to be regulated simply by the desires of various groups or Churches? If so, the unity of the Church is not dependent upon questions as to the nature and authority of the ministry. These are questions which various societies are free to settle for themselves. Or, on the other hand, is a Ministry, a Word, a Sacrament a Divine ordinance for the Church, an integral part of its organized life? If so, then the authority of this Ministry becomes a matter of vital importance. Here again the statement makes its choice: "A ministry of the Word and Sacrament is a Divine ordinance for the Church, and has been since the days of the Apostles an integral part of its organized life." It goes on to say that such a ministry must be regarded as "a ministry of the Church, and not merely of any part thereof." Though exercising representatively powers and functions which are inherent in the Church itself, it does so by the authority of the Lord who is its Head. This authority is, so to say, mediated by those who have authority given to them in the Church to confer it. In response to faith and prayer, Divine Grace is given through ordination.

Now, plainly, if all this be the character of the ministry, it must surely follow that, in view of all the differences which have been developed in history, there must be means in a reunited Church whereby the ministry may be acknowledged by every part thereof as possessing the authority of the whole body. This is a matter of vital importance:—"Within the many Christian Communion into which in the course of history Christendom has been divided, various forms of ministry have grown up according to the circumstances of these several Communion and their beliefs as to the Mind of Christ and the guidance of the New Testament. These various ministries of Word and Sacrament have been, in God's providence, manifestly and abundantly used by the Holy Spirit in His work of "enlightening the world, converting sinners, and perfecting saints." But the differences which have arisen with regard to the authority and functions of these various forms of ministry have been and are the occasion of manifold doubts, questions, and misunderstandings. For the allaying of doubts and scruples in the future, and for the more perfect realization of the truth that the ministry is a ministry of the Church, and not merely of any part thereof, means should be provided for the United Church which we desire whereby its ministry may be acknowledged by every part thereof as possessing the authority of the whole body."

Then follow two statements which must be kept together and which together seem to me to lift many old and bitter controversies to a new level from which a new and hopeful advance may be made. No thoughtful man can fail to see their far-reaching significance:—"In view of the fact that the Episcopate was from early times and for many centuries accepted, and by the greater part of Christendom is still accepted, as the means whereby this authority of the whole body is given, we agree that it ought to be accepted as such for the United Church of the future. Similarly, in view of the place which the Council of Presbyters and the Congregation of the faithful had in the constitution of the early Church, and the preservation of these elements of presbyteral and congregational order in large sections of Christendom, we agree that they should be maintained with a representative and constitutional Episcopate as permanent elements in the order and life of the United Church."

These declarations in their combination illustrate the great principles of the Lambeth Appeal, that the now separated Churches have their own special contributions to make to the fullness of the whole Church. If there is new hope in the willingness of non-episcopal Christians to recognize the true place and meaning of the Episcopate, is there not also new hope in the movements now at work among us who possess the Episcopate to combine it with a better representative system in the Synod of the Clergy, the Presbyteries and the Council of the Laity? If it is too much to say that these declarations make a stage in the long and difficult road towards reunion further on than any stage which has hitherto been reached, they lead to a starting-point from which a new stage in the direction may be made, in which many of the old difficulties would be left behind and many others would be solved as we go.

The acceptance of such a starting point would not of course, so the statement says, imply the disowning of past ministries which have been in fact manifestly used and blessed by the Spirit of God, nor would it imply the acceptance of any particular theory of the origin or character of episcopal ordination. We Anglicans do not impose any such theory upon our own candidates for Orders, and all theories are being modified by fuller research into the records of the past. But it is not, I think, presumptuous to express the hope that those who, for the reasons summarized in this statement, believe that the visible unity of the Church requires, in fact, such a common authority for the ministry as the Episcopate can give, will come to see in it part of God's providential order for His Church.

Lastly, the Place of the Creeds in a United Church. This section of the statement is very closely compressed, and I must not stop to comment on all that is involved within it. When its phrases are duly pondered and rightly understood, the agreement disclosed must be deemed to be most remarkable. There are currents of thought among the Free Churches, and even within the Anglican Church, which represent the Church as mainly a company of seekers after truth, which belittle the gravity and importance of what has been divinely revealed, which resent what are called credal obligations, and question the worth of a common objective standard of truth. But the statement before us clearly recognizes that there can be no real unity of the Church unless there is a unity of faith. In a united Church, it says, there must be unity of faith, which implies both the subjective element of personal adhesion and an objective standard of truth. The supreme standard is the revelation of God contained in the Scriptures and summed up in Jesus Christ. But in addition to this the United Church must have a formal statement of its corporate faith in Christ, and a sufficient statement of its corporate faith is to be found in the Nicene Creed. "When assent to the Creeds," it is added, "is required by the United Church, such assent should not be understood to imply acceptance of them as a complete expression of the Christian faith"—who shall presume to say that they are?—"or as excluding reasonable liberty of interpretation. It should be understood to imply the acceptance of them as agreeable to the Word of God contained in the Holy Scriptures, as affirming essential elements in the Christian faith, and as preserving that faith in the form in which it has been handed down through many centuries in the history of the Christian Church." Yet with this recognition of the rightful place of the Creeds in the United Church must go the full and thankful recognition of the continued presence and teaching of the Living Spirit in His Body, giving in each day and generation ever-renewed guidance in the apprehension and expression of the truth.

So I close this summary of a summary. However bald the presentment of it has necessarily been, you cannot have failed to realize that it stands for an agreement most striking, I think it might be said unprecedented. Almost every clause includes, and would, if it were generally accepted, conclude controversies which have long divided and embittered Christian society. Remember, this agreement was reached by men entitled to represent traditions, associations of history, as diverse as those of Anglicans, Presbyterians, Wesleyans and other Methodists, Baptists and Congregationalists. What past renderings of the Body of Christ do these very titles recall! Of course, it may be said that the agreement of a few leaders after close conference does not carry with it the agreement of the mass of their fellow ministers and people. That is true; much time is needed for the implication of these statements to be grasped by the rank and file of the Anglican and Nonconformist communions; yet it is worth noting that when the report of the Committee was presented to the Conference, and from the Conference to the Council of the Free Churches, the Council, in spite of the large issues with which the document dealt and the large numbers of which the Council was composed, gave it its general approval and asked that the Conference should continue. The statement is seed sown in a wide field and very difficult soil, but it is good seed, which may in God's own time bring forth fruit.

Of course, again it may be said that the statement leaves many of the most difficult points untouched: I have already admitted and indeed insisted that this is true. In a sense it ends just where the most obviously acute and practical difficulties begin. The Committee of the Conference has met again, and is now considering some of these. It may be that further progress at present may prove to be impossible; it may be that time should be allowed to enable what has been agreed to to sink into the common mind of the Churches concerned; believe me, I am the last man to underrate the formidable difficulties that remain or to indulge in any over-sanguine hope. But there are two questions which I confidently put: Does not the statement, even as it is, disclose a framework of faith and order, within which it may be possible to build up or rather to restore in the course of time a real and lasting unity, a Church, to use the words of the Lambeth Appeal, genuine, Catholic, loyal to all truth, and gathering into its fellowship all who profess and call themselves Christians, within whose visible unity all the treasures of faith and order bequeathed as a heritage by the past to the present shall be possessed in common and made serviceable to the whole Body of Christ? The second question is more simple, and the answer to it is surely very plain: Must not God mean men who have been enabled to get thus far together to go further? There is only one answer. The way may be long, the difficulties assuredly are great, but men who have once seen the vision of a true Catholic Church will never leave the road, they will say in loyalty to it: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, may my right hand forget her cunning." They may not reach the Holy City themselves, but, even so, they will be content if they die with their faces resolutely set towards it, and leave to their children the unconquered hope that their feet may yet stand within its gates. I beg you, in thought and prayer and desire, to join their company.

Mr. David Lloyd George

By Rev. Charles Edward Jefferson, D. D.

Minister of the Broadway Tabernacle Congregational Church, N.Y.

[This is the eighth of a series of articles by Dr. Jefferson, based upon his recent experience in Great Britain where he preached, during the past summer, in the London City Temple, as the representative of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches.]

MR. LLOYD GEORGE is down and out. But some men cannot be kept down, nor will they stay out; and Mr. Lloyd George is that kind of man. He will be up and in again, if not tomorrow, then the day after. He is the most extraordinary Briton now alive. The British Empire has never had an abler Prime Minister, and it may wait centuries before it finds his equal. I never realized how he towered above all other men in British public life until I lived in Britain. Like a Colossus he did bestride the British world, and other men looked small when measured against his huge legs. By sheer force of mind and heart he had gotten the start of all the British leaders and was bearing the palm alone. And now lies he low and there are many who refuse to do him reverence.

But his overthrow came about by a combination of forces which can be easily discerned and measured. It was by his virtues as well as by his defects, by his successes as well as by his defeats, by his immeasurable services as well as by his blunders that he fell. The public will follow no leader long. Aristides, great in war and peace, was ostracized at last, and some of the men who voted against him had no other reason for their hostility than that they were weary hearing Aristides called "the just." The incense burned before Mr. Lloyd George made many Britons sick.

The wonder is not that he is out, but that he was in so long. His position was an impossible one. No man can indefinitely remain leader of a coalition cabinet. Liberals and Tories can be linked together for a season, but not forever. Under the pressure of war extremists of different stripes they can be welded into one, but when the pressure is reduced each group will go to its own place. Mr. Lloyd George was always displeasing some of the Tories. How could a man with his traditions and temperament fail to do that? He was always giving offense to some of the Liberals. How could the head of a cabinet in which there was powerful Tory sentiment which had to be reckoned with every day do anything else? They told me that in the Liberal Club his portrait had been removed from the wall and relegated to the cellar. His was an uncomfortable and precarious position from the first day to the last, and it is amazing that the two days were so far apart. He rode successfully the whirlwind of war, and achieved the far greater triumph of riding for four years the hurricane of the wildest peace which the world has even known.

His position exposed him to continuous misunderstanding and criticism, and laid him open to serious and damning charges. To many he seemed a man devoid of principle. He was called an opportunist, a time saver, a trimmer. Those who hated him did not hesitate to call him a trickster and even a sharper. They forgot that a man at the head of a coalition cabinet must of necessity deal in compromises. There is no other path by which he can get on. It was his business to seek and find the middle course in which Tory and Liberal could walk and work together. To the idealist whose business it is to proclaim abstract ideals, the way of compromise is always the way of the devil. But to the practical statesman who must find a path along which a nation is willing to walk, the ideal best is never possible. Politics, as Mr. John Morley long ago reminded us, is always the second best.

Stating principles is one thing, and making programs is another. The prophet must proclaim principles but the statesman must plan programs of action. He must deal with prejudice, and ignorance and passion and perversity. He must be firm, and at times he must yield. He must insist, but he must also concede. He must allow certain principles to lie for a time in abeyance, in order that other principles may move forward to their coronation. He must sacrifice minor interests in order to get the major purpose through. In order to keep his countrymen together along a perilous road, he must allow the second best to triumph for the present in order that the first best may come off victorious in the end. Such a man is sure to be suspected, misjudged, maligned, and hated. History is not likely to agree with the traducers of Mr. Lloyd George. Coming generations will see more clearly than is possible to us, that his heart was true, and that even when he seemed to have wandered from the path, his eyes were on the distant and shining goal.

If a man's greatness is to be measured by his power to attract and repel, then Mr. Lloyd George has an incontestible claim to greatness. To an American there was nothing in England more unfailingly entertaining than the clashing judgments of Britons on their Prime Minister. Some considered him an archangel straight from the Court of Heaven, while others feared him as Beelzebub, the prince of the devils. Often I would pass in the same afternoon from a group in which the Prime Minister was crowned with laurel to another group in which every man poured out upon his head the seven vials of his wrath. I soon found that if I wished to stir up an animated conversation in any part of the land, all that was necessary was to mention the name of Mr. Lloyd George.

In one thing all Britons agree—they all admit that Mr. Lloyd George is a great speaker. Woe to the man whom he gets after with his tongue! He can use words which cut like sabres and which sting like adders. He is master of vivid and unforgettable phrases. His speeches abound in pictures. He never thunders, but now and then the lightning flashes. His most telling gestures are with his hands. There are few orators who use their hands so much as he does, and no one uses them more effectively. There are certain ideas which I shall never be able to think of again without seeing Mr. Lloyd George's hands. He speaks quietly and with deliberation. His words fall sometimes upon the heart like flakes of fire. He wins his audience by his candor and simplicity, his friendliness and common sense. Even the hearts of his enemies are sometimes softened by the touch of his magical words, and, forgetting their prejudices, men are swept away on the current of his persuasive speech.

I was impressed by his radiant vitality. He is a live man. I saw him for the first time the evening he returned from the Conference in Genoa. It had been a long drawn, vexatious, unsuccessful conference. Mr. Lloyd George came out of that conference defeated. I expected to see disappointment in his eyes. I was sure there would be marks of fatigue upon his face. The man who met my gaze was a man with a fresh and buoyant look. He had the air of one who was just returning from a holiday. He looked as a man looks when he has beaten his opponent in a game of golf. When, later on, I stood face to face in conversation with him, I was still more deeply impressed by the freshness of his countenance. He looked like a man who had never had a care or trouble. He shook hands with acquaintances and friends with the jovial air of a man of leisure. I asked myself: "How can Atlas carry the world on his shoulders, and have a face like that?" He looked as though he slept soundly every night, but how could a man sleep when he had on his mind the Irish tragedy, and the Russian chaos, and the French entanglement, and the Turkish peril, and the Palestine muddle, and the taxation nightmare, and the unemployment horror, and a score of other perplexities and burdens? One would think that the solid flesh would melt, thaw and resolve itself into a dew! But this Welshman does not allow himself to be flustered by public business. While in the midst of all these ponderous cares of state, he had time to entertain friends and strangers at breakfast and now and then to attend an afternoon garden party, and occasionally to give an address in some church or at some civic function. Within a few days last summer, he gave a lecture on John Wesley, and delivered an oration on Mazzini, and addressed nearly four hundred clergymen at a luncheon on the "Church and War." He has evidently tasted of the spring of perpetual youth. His face cannot be furrowed and his back cannot be bent. They told me in Bournemouth that when he plays golf on Saturday with Dr. J. D. Jones, he remains over to hear him preach on Sunday, and that he sings the hymns with the gusto and abandon of a boy. Here, then, is a wonderful man who can carry the greatest of the world's empires on his back, with the tempest beating in his face and still sing!

He has a genius for getting things done. That was a gift sorely needed during the war, and so he was transposed from one position to another until he arrived at the post of Prime Minister. Whenever there was a job which was peculiarly hard he was called. He always responded and he never failed. The list of his achievements is a long one. At the head of the list will forever stand the settlement of the Irish problem. Many of Britain's greatest had worked on that, and in vain. This man tried it and succeeded. He is a miracle worker, a wizard, this little lawyer from Wales.

His moral qualities are as fine as the faculties of his mind. He has self control, and patience, and courage. He dared to fight even the great Lord Northcliffe, the Napoleon of modern journalists, the giant of the newspaper world. Politicians are always afraid of mighty journalists. Even statesmen walk with wary step in their presence. Here was a journalist of extraordinary stature and renown. He owned many papers. He raised up and cast down when he would. He gave orders to Mr. Lloyd George, and Mr. Lloyd George refused to obey him. He defied him. Northcliffe hurled at him all his thunderbolts but in vain, and Northcliffe, broken in body and mind, went down into his grave with the Prime Minister still on his throne. There is no more thrilling chapter in modern history than that which recounts the defeat of the Journalist Goliath by this Welsh David.

In trying to account for the power of this man, we must not leave out his religion. Mr. Lloyd George is a religious man, a member of the Christian church. He believes in Jesus Christ. He has never concealed his faith. He believes in the church. He attends its worship. He reads its history. He revels in the biographies of its leaders and saints. He is very sure of God. This gives him endurance and hope. He is an optimist. In the darkest days of the war, it was always light where he was. He is not discouraged by difficulties, nor depressed by obstacles, nor swerved by opposition, nor embittered by abuse. Resistance endows him with new powers. He is a stormy petrel whose element is the tempest.

He is an internationalist. He is a hater of war. He is a believer in the League of Nations. He believes in the parliament of man, the federation of the world. He is the friend of America. He may visit us some day. When he comes, he will receive the greatest ovation ever given to a statesman from beyond the seas.

The Literary Supplement

Vital Books for Thinkers in the Church

CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS

By HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York. $1.50.

Dr. Fosdick is beyond doubt one of the clearest and most fearless writers and speakers on Christian themes in the present age. He faces the practical issues which are before modern men directly, and illustrates them with a wealth of material gathered from a very wide range of reading and a retentive memory. His thought on every subject comes always to a conclusion where a conclusion is possible. He never leaves his hearers or readers hanging in the air.

The present volume, which contains the Cole Lectures at Vanderbilt University for 1922, is in some ways the finest of his many valuable books. No one who wishes to understand the issues which the modern world faces can afford to overlook this work. The author begins with an outline review of the idea of progress, showing the Greek and Roman, Hebrew and Christian elements in it. He has an extraordinary facility for describing periods of thought in a few phrases, which argues a profound meditation upon the writings of the past. Most fascinating is his description of the contribution which modern scientific invention, discovery, the increase of knowledge, new social hopes and evolution have made to the present day idea of progress. With strong feeling he portrays the twentieth century's growing conviction that faith in automatic progress is unfounded, and that on a transient earth the idea of human progress apart from God and immortality leads nowhere. In this scientific age he shows the futility of the idea of mere mechanistic control of life, and argues with tremendous persuasion for the necessity of religion as the interpreter of the facts. He points out the futility of any plan to produce social betterment without the preliminary experience of the inward transformation of the individual, and, on the ground that the purpose of life is the redemption of personality, he insists that bald economic progress does not really accomplish anything. "The morals of Fifth Avenue are not such that it can look down on Third Avenue, nor is it possible anywhere to discern gradation of character on the basis of relative economic standing."

One of the most interesting parts of the lectures is where Dr. Fosdick points out that Christianity is itself a progressive movement and illustrates this from the Bible. One of the lectures is on the Perils of Progress, and if any one is foolish enough to think that Dr. Fosdick does not deal directly with the problems of sin in the individual, I recommend that he read this lecture carefully. For social palliatives instead of radical cures he has nothing but contempt.

All through the book runs the sense of a burning mission, a zeal that is the more convincing because of its thorough foundation in the consciousness of the sufficiency of God. There is nothing negative about these lectures. They are startlingly positive, and full of a kindly spirit that speaks volumes for the patience and faith of the author. Perhaps I can best conclude a brief and inadequate review of these finely tempered lectures by a little quotation from the one on "The Need for Religion":

"One wonders why the preachers do not * * * * recover their consciousness of an indispensable mission. One wonders that the churches can be so timid and dull and negative, that our sermons can be so pallid and inconsequential. One wonders why in the pulpit we have so many flutes and so few trumpets. For here is a world with the accumulating energies of the new science in its hands, living in the purlieus of hell because it cannot gain spiritual mastery over the very power in which it glories. Here is a world which must build its civilization on spiritual bases or else collapse into abysmal ruin and which cannot achieve the task though all the motives of self-preservation cry out to have it done, because men lack the very elements of faith and character which it is the business of religion to supply."

WHAT IS THERE IN RELIGION?

By HENRY SLOANE COFFIN. The Macmillan Co., New York.

The origin of this volume of ten chapters (five of which were delivered as lectures at Ohio Wesleyan University last spring) was an incident in which Dr. Coffin took part when a group of young people speaking of remaking a shattered world, demanded abruptly: "What is there in religion anyhow?" The answer which Dr. Coffin gave to this question was the beginning of this volume. In a later page of the book Dr. Coffin admits that the question is somewhat impatient and cynical, and indeed it seems that it is a poor title to describe the spirit in which he has written the book. Dr. Coffin is always vigorous and nothing if not practical. He knows perhaps as well as any other preacher today the thoughts of "modern" people and in this volume he seeks to show the value of religion in everything that makes for fullness of life. He takes the simile of the Hudson River rising in the far off Adirondacks from Lake Tear-in-the-Cloud and shows throughout the different lectures what that river does in the way of work and of beautifying the country through which it passes on its way to the sea; and in comparison with the various services performed by the river he describes the services of religion to mankind. On the title page of his book he has the phrase "Flumen Dei repletum est aquis."

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

Once or twice it seems to me that the author strains his simile a little bit as when for instance he describes religion as supplying illumination for life on the simile of the Hudson River supplying power at certain points to make electricity. But for the most part the simile is sound and binds the whole book together most happily with the beautiful figure of that magnificent river and forms a pleasant background for religious thought.

Dr. Coffin appears at his best in his emphasis on the social aspects of religion. Here I would say he is without superior in the present day. He is sane and fearless and while he is never fanatical he shows a contempt for limiting himself to saying only those things which are agreeable to his hearers. Perhaps one of the best illustrations of his apt use of his simile and also of the boldness and sanity of his thought is to be found in such a quotation as the following: "When one tries to define Christianity—a very difficult undertaking because the instant you try to examine it you interfere with its flow and it loses its essential character—one gets at its essence most clearly in the Christlike movements in the thoughts and conduct of individuals and social groups. A river is found not in the water which you may be able to bail out in a pail and so investigate. The water ceases to be a river the moment you capture it in your bucket. A river is found in the continuous stream moving towards the sea-level. Christianity is not the religious opinions or the modes of worship or the customs of life or the forms of activity of any particular generation of believers in Jesus, which one can take and examine, very much as one hauls up a bucket of water from a running stream. The water of a river is ceaselessly flowing and the doctrines and ritual and usages and methods of Christians are forever in flux. Again and again men have taken Christianity at some point in its course—in the New Testament period, or in the undivided Church of the first three centuries, or in the epoch of the Protestant Reformation—and insisted that the beliefs or the forms of Church government or the usages in worship were fixed then for all time. But subsequent centuries can no more think with the minds of the apostles or of the Greek creed-makers, or organize the Church after the pattern of the early Fathers, than they can call back the first or the fourth of the sixteenth century in the stream of time."

One cannot but be impressed by Dr. Coffin's wide reading and tremendous range of quotation. Sermonizers with that wicked habit of making quotations at second hand will find this volume a mine of apt quotations from everybody from Plutarch to Mrs. Humphrey Ward. It seems to the reviewer that Dr. Coffin limits the power of his writing by the wealth of his quotation. Certainly the last lecture on "Change and Permanence," which has the fewest quotations, is the best in the book because it most clearly reveals the thought through Dr. Coffin's own language and feelings.

This volume gives a fine presentation of the vigorous forward thinking power of the Christian Church today.

THE NATURE OF SCRIPTURE

By REV. PROFESSOR A. S. PEAKE. George H. Doran Co., New York. $2.00.

Dr. Peake is well known to all students of the Bible as a brilliant and disciplined commentator and as a fine writer and speaker on biblical topics. The present volume is made up of various sermons and lectures, delivered on different occasions in England, all of them bound together by the underlying thought of the character of the Bible. The main purpose of the book is to show that there is no necessary incompatibility between faith and criticism, but that they are complementary. The author takes a sane and wholesome attitude towards the Bible as a record of revelation. "We must break with an atomistic view of the Bible or we shall never discern its full value. We have no right to insist that every part of it shall reveal a direct spiritual message."

The author is far from satisfied with much of the modern loose thinking about the Bible which is really responsible for the discredit into which higher criticism sometimes falls. He says, "I can only express my dismay at the recklessness with which the Christian case is sometimes staked on experience alone. It is a combination of historical proof with the arguments from experience which alone can bear the weight." In another place he expresses himself thus: "This is the meaning of the Bible to us: that it incorporates for us the record of God's redeeming love; that it brings to us in documents that can never grow old the history of the past, which though it tells the story of past ages has yet within it an eternally significant truth."

The final chapter gives some very valuable hints for modern preaching, and points out that we take the glad tidings far too much for granted. We have allowed familiarity to dull our minds to the glory and power of the Gospel.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE CHURCH ON MODERN PROBLEMS

By various writers. The Macmillan Co., New York. $1.50.

This volume is composed of papers read at the thirty-seventh Church Congress in the United States at Baltimore last April under the chairmanship of Dr. Slattery, now Bishop Co-adjutor of Massachusetts. There are as many authors as there are papers and all of them contain interesting thought. Seven subjects are treated: "What Are Our Young People Seeking in their Apparent Revolt from the Moral Standards of an Earlier Day?", "Credal Requirements and Church Reunion," "The Second Coming of Christ," "The Significance of Current Expectation," "Psychoanalysis, Its Value and Its Dangers," "Wherein Is the Church Concerned with Labor's Demand for Continuous Employment?", "How Can We Best Meet Young Men's Hesitancy to Enter the Ministry?", "The Necessary Guidance of the Present Revival of Interest in Prayer." All of the papers are well worth reading and give splendid indications of Christian thought on the immediate questions of the hour. Perhaps the most interesting of all are the three papers by Mrs. Trowbridge, by Dr. Drury, Rector of St. Paul's School, and by President Bell of St. Stephen's College on "Young People Today." They voice a fine sense both of sympathy and of constructive criticism. I suppose it would be difficult to find three writers better qualified, one as the mother of the best type of modern young people, the other as the master of a great school and the third as head of a theological college. The section on psycho-analysis contains some very valuable hints and should do much to clear up some popular misunderstandings and put an end to some of the general denunciations which so frequently take the place of honest consideration in this declamatory age. Another very fine paper is that by Mr. Hobson who writes concerning the hesitancy of young men to enter the ministry and describes the objections which most evidently from the vigor of his writing he has heard offered by young men. The final section of the book on "The Needed Guidance of Prayer" strikes a very fine note. Dr. William Austin Smith, late editor of The Churchman whose recent death is a great loss to Christian forces in this world, writes a fine paper with an indignant moral tone to it which is characteristic of that splendid Christian leader. He demands that we do not debase the office of prayer and learn to seek small gifts of God when we might seek great ones and he invites us to think more of religion and work than of superstition and magic.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

The whole book is a very valuable contribution to the present day thought in the church.

PREACHING THE SOCIAL GOSPEL

By OZORA S. DAVIS. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York. $1.50.

The President of Chicago Theological Seminary has written a book which is exactly what many ministers have been looking for. We have heard and read much concerning the social gospel especially of schemes for putting it into action, but we have received very little practical help in trying to preach the social gospel. Dr. Davis quite frankly says that he regards preaching as the minister's paramount although not his only task. The following quotation will perhaps best explain the purpose which the author has in writing this book: "It is apparent, therefore, that the modern preacher must set forth both aspects of the gospel, the individualistic and the social. But he cannot do this at random. He dare not preach now and then the social message, and now and then give the individualistic appeal, as he may be moved at the moment or as the occasion may dictate. On the other hand, no preacher ever would attempt to preach a 'system of sociology,' if such existed. What is needed is such an organization of the preaching of a church year as shall insure the progressive presentation of the social message, along with the right emphasis upon the individualistic appeal."

There is constant insistence throughout the book that there is no real conflict between the individual and social appeal. Our modern delight in objects which are denoted "hand made" is a mark of the persistent interest in the individual and the fact that people are constantly asking for a real program of action shows our equal need of the social gospel. Dr. Davis applies this new emphasis of preaching to all our various human relationships beginning with the family which he describes as "the first sphere in which the individual begins to find himself and to define his duties as a social being." He carries this out into the neighborhood and into the world of industry and political and national life. It is the author's conviction that this preaching will issue a deeper passion and a greater widening of the congregation's activity.

There are many quotations throughout the book from leaders in the movement for social emphasis in preaching and Dr. Davis has made his book most suggestive to preachers by connecting his thought everywhere directly with texts and passages of the Bible. This is a valuable book for the modern preacher who should remember that it is by the same author who wrote a volume called "Evangelistic Preaching."

Aids for Preaching and Pastoral Work

THE MIND OF THE MASTER

By REV. JOHN WATSON, D. D. (IAN MACLAREN). George H. Doran Co., New York. $1.50.

This reissue of the famous volume of sermons by Ian Maclaren affords a good opportunity for preachers to renew their acquaintance with the never out of date sermons of this great literary preacher. Especially interesting to read in the present theological situation are the sermons on "Sin, an Act of Self Will," "Devotion to a Person the Dynamic of Religion" and "The Culture of the Cross."

The publishers perform a real service to preaching by drawing the attention of modern men to that preaching of past years which has in it the element of durability.

THE MEANING OF LIFE

By REV. A. EDWIN KEIGWIN, D. D. George H. Doran Co., New York. $1.50.

Dr. Keigwin declares that in these sermons he seeks to establish "an atmosphere of hominess." He finds that whereas some minds are at home in a dim religious light there are others who need to be preached to in quite a different manner, and one must say quite clearly that Dr. Keigwin is a splendid example of what perhaps may best be termed as a "popular preacher." His language is simple, sometimes homely, his thoughts are strongly underlined, his manner is dramatic and anecdotal. He is constantly striking off catching phrases. For instance, he asks, "Is death a reality? Is it the end? Or is it the means to an end?" One occasionally wonders if there is as much depth of thought behind some of the phrases as there is vigor of utterance and cleverness of phraseology.

The subjects which Dr. Keigwin chooses are subjects adapted to this type of preaching and as one reads them one is constantly impressed with the preacher's evident sincerity and his tremendous enthusiasm. Having heard Dr. Keigwin preach one of these sermons I know that it is an impressive experience to feel the contagion of his personality spreading through the congregation. The sermons are in the best sense practical. I suppose that it would be true to say that Dr. Keigwin has no interest in life except in the concrete instance of the life of this or that man. As he himself says: "Abstract thought is a recoil—objective thinking may shoot neither so far nor so high, but it makes more bull's eyes. It is the score after all that counts." Perhaps one may be at times a little troubled at the apparent conception of the Bible which underlies some of the preaching, but no one can feel doubtful of the moral courage and vigor of the preacher in dealing with a large number of practical questions before plain men.

A CHILD'S RAMBLE THROUGH THE BIBLE

By ROBERT C. FALCONER. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York. $1.25.

This volume of thirty-nine sermons to children is written with a fine purpose and with considerable liberalism throughout. The themes are all taken from the Old Testament and each one is headed with a text or a chapter from the Bible. Some of the sermons call for the use of objects and in one or two instances the use of the object would be adapted only to a most informal sort of service, as, for example, where the preacher is called on to "exhibit a doll's bed with a larger doll than it can accommodate." Preachers to children will find such sermons especially as that on "The Fall of Jericho," "The Mantle of Elijah" and on that phrase from the sixth verse of the first chapter of Job "Satan Came Also" very suggestive. The book is well worth putting on your shelf with other books which help to prepare your mind for preaching to children.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

THE CHILDREN'S SIX MINUTES

By BRUCE S. WRIGHT. George H. Doran Co., New York. $1.25.

Dr. Wright has gathered here the magical number of sermons that appear in all books of sermons for children, that is fifty-two, and in them has treated of a variety of subjects. As is usual in such books some of the sermons seem of very little significance as compared with others. I suppose this may be more or less due to the personal prejudices of the adult reviewer. One wonders sometimes if our approach to children is really fundamental enough, or whether we do not sometimes let ourselves sink to the level of those who speak somewhat childishly to "the kiddies." This, however, is by way of general comment and has reference only occasionally to the sermons in this volume. Dr. Wright has performed one very practical service. He gives for each sermon a memory verse from the Bible and a memory hymn (from the Methodist Episcopal Hymnal).

THY SEA IS GREAT, OUR BOATS ARE SMALL

By HENRY VAN DYKE. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York. 50 cents.

All of Doctor van Dyke's work bears the stamp of clear thought and finished expression. This is one of the reasons why he is so unpopular with the literary cliques and "back scratchers."

This little volume of seven newly written hymns, together with three others which he had previously written, offers some really helpful thoughts on hymn writing, and provides also ten hymns adapted for singing wherever Christian people are gathered together. They breathe the atmosphere of profound reverence in simple and understandable terms. They are poetical, as one would expect, and free from heavy theological terms which are always ephemeral.

The refrain of the first hymn which gives the title to the book, "Thy Sea is Great, Our Boats are Small," is indicative of the disciplined faith expressed in all the hymns. There is an abiding sense of the overruling Providence of God, as well as a strong emphasis on the part that man has to play in making manifest the will of God in our needy world.

I BELIEVE IN GOD AND IN EVOLUTION

By WILLIAM W. KEEN, M. D. J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia, Pa. $1.00.

This little volume is an enlargement of an address given by the Emeritus Professor of Surgery at Jefferson Medical College before the students of Crozer Theological Seminary in June, 1922. The lecture as reported in the newspapers offered such strong evidence of both a vigorous Christian faith and a devotion to science that a demand was made for its enlargement and publication in this more permanent form. The author begins by stating that there are two views of the creation of man; first, that man was created completely furnished "like the heathen legend of Minerva springing fully armed from the brain of Jupiter"; second, that man's creation was not instantaneous but gradual. Following a brief enlargement of this idea there come fifteen short chapters offering such evidence as has come to the author during sixty-two years as student and teacher of anatomy and surgery in support of the second view.

This little volume is a convenient book to put in the hands of those who are troubled on this question of science and religion. It carries in it somewhat of the same spirit as animates the writings of that great physician and Christian, Dr. William Hanna Thomson.

PASTOR AND EVANGELIST

By REV. CHARLES L. GOODELL, D. D. George H. Doran Co., New York. $1.35.

The author as Secretary of the Commission on Evangelism and Life Service of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ is performing a great service in the present time in emphasizing the duty of pastoral evangelism. Out of a number of year's experience as a pastor he insists on the necessity of the churches conducting evangelistic services of their own as a matter of week-to-week routine in the Sunday School and the church services and pastoral visitation. In this small volume the longest chapter is on "Evangelism for the Times" in which Dr. Goodell issues a clear and emphatic call to dealing with the individual soul. He warns against the mistaken notion that there is a social gospel which is not in any way dependent on a spiritual basis and declares that our present day emphasis on personal experience as the basis of religion can only be justified by "personal work" in the churches. The whole book is a thoroughly needed warning against the temptation of the modern minister to become an executive and administrative officer and sitter-on-platforms.

THE ANGEL ADJUTANT OF "TWICE BORN MEN"

By MINNIE L. CARPENTER. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York. $1.25.

This is the American edition of the life of Staff Captain Kate Lee of the Salvation Army; and, as Gen. Bramwell Booth says in the introduction, it is well adapted to show the value of the work of the right kind of a woman in the religious field. Perhaps some who take a highly ecclesiastical view of the church would be helped in the reading of this simple story of heroism and energy. The book describes the angel adjutant both on duty and on furlough, both well and sick. She was one of those fearless souls who is ready to face the very worst because of her own tremendous conviction of the sufficiency of God for all these things.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

JUST NERVES

By AUSTEN FOX RIGGS, M. D. Houghton Mifflin, Boston, Mass. $90.

This modest and simple volume ought to be a joy both to those who are suffering from nervousness themselves or those who have to deal with nervous sufferers. Dr. Riggs writes out of a long practical experience with a true sympathy and deep insight into human nature. His strong convictions and fresh point of view make his book delightful reading. He begins by pointing out the cruelty of many persons in describing nervous disorders contemptuously as "just nerves," and goes on to clarify a number of the abused words. He limits his treatment to the subject of nervousness based on inefficiency, thus eliminating nervousness based on mental or physical inadequacy. He is not altogether satisfied with the trend of our modern civilizations, as indeed I suppose nobody who reflects much upon it is satisfied. "Physical comfort and safety, it would seem, have been won through multiplying the mental and moral risks." Great stress is laid in the book on childhood training and many instructive observations are made in language that is simple and understandable to all. The final chapter gives ten commonsense rules and these show Dr. Riggs at his best and ought to prove of great help to all dealing with nervousness in themselves or others. He begins with a practical statement "to avoid 'nervous breakdowns' in adult life it is only necessary to maintain one's mental and moral efficiency." Other phrases from this chapter stick in the memory: "Worry is a complete circle of inefficient thought whirling about a pivot of fear." "Shun the New England conscience; it is a form of egotism which makes a moral issue of every trivial thought or feeling." And then the final conclusion of the whole matter: "Do not criticise your part in the play, study it, understand it and then play it, sick or well, rich or poor, with faith, with courage and with proper grace." This is one of few books on this delicate subject that bears no faintest taint of morbidity about it.

YOUR INNER SELF

By LOUIS E. BISCH. Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City, N. Y. $1.50.

Dr. Bisch writes this volume for the purpose of presenting "only carefully attested hypotheses which have already supplied a solution of many difficult problems. * * * His aim is to promote an interest in this subject, a knowledge of which he regards as so frankly helpful, and to stimulate an appetite for a wider knowledge than can be condensed within the limits of so brief a handbook." As all psycho-analysts believe, Dr. Bisch finds that the first requirement for avoiding breakdowns or affecting cures is contained in the old inscription in the Temple of Apollo at Delphi, "Know Thyself." The book is written in a simple style and those who are not quite sure of the meaning of certain terms will find a glossary in the back of the book and also an index. Without going into all the details of the items treated in this book it is sufficient perhaps to emphasize the fact that the author does not confine himself to any one theory in explaining nervous disorders. His conclusions are those of the practical physician rather than the theorizer in the study. The value of such a compact and simple handbook as this is very great in these days when the pressure of modern life is such as to make it necessary for everyone to have some understanding of the more or less hidden causes of nervous breakdowns.

THE PRACTICE OF AUTOSUGGESTION

By the Method of Emile Coue

By C. HARRY BROOKS. Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.

This little volume begins by giving a picture of Dr. Coue at Nancy conducting his clinic. Then follows a section on the nature of autosuggestion dealing with two primary considerations—thought as a force, and conflict between thought and will. The author declares that Dr. Coue's uniform success is due to the startling discovery that "when the will is in conflict with an idea, the idea invariably gains the day." The third section of the book describes in simple language the method of practising autosuggestion, and quotes that interesting statement from Emerson: "Men imagine that they communicate their virtue or vice only by overt actions, and do not see that virtue and vice emit a breath every moment."

The chapter on the general formula "Day by day in every way I'm getting better and better," contains the curious statement: "Religious minds who wish to associate the formula with God's care and protection might do so after this fashion: Day by day in every way, by the help of God, I'm getting better and better. It is possible that the attention of the unconscious will thus be turned to moral and spiritual improvement to a greater extent than by the ordinary formula."

The concluding paragraph of the book says: "Autosuggestion is no substitute for religion; it is rather a new weapon added to the religious armory. If as a mere scientific technique it can yield such results, what might it not do as the expression of those high yearnings for perfection which religion incorporates?"

In a brief foreword Dr. Coue says, among other things, "Mr. Brooks has skillfully seized on the essentials and put them forward in a manner that seems to me both simple and clear. The instructions given are amply sufficient to enable any one to practice autosuggestion for him or herself without seeking the help of any other person."

For the Arm Chair Traveller

SKYLINE CAMPS

By WALTER PRICHARD EATON. W. A. Wilde Co., Boston, Mass.

Mr. Eaton is one of the most successful writers on outdoor life. Himself a skillful camper and keen observer of nature, he is able to communicate his enthusiasm in his writing. Some will remember the delightful charm in his essays published under the title "In Berkshire Fields." The present volume is a series of essays on various camping experiences, chiefly in the far west. The author describes not only the more sublime aspects of nature, but lightens his account also with observations on little wayside occurrences, the picture of a whistling marmot, and, in another instance, the unexpected human travelers who suddenly come upon his cabin in the midst of a blizzard. They enter and all sit down to supper together in the "tumultuous democracy of the storm." Mr. Eaton's interest in life is contagious. A tree, or a mountain, or a river is to him an object worthy of long contemplation; but his landscapes are not scenes of lonely grandeur, for the human interest is always present as one would expect in the author of so many successful books for boys. The photographs by Mr. Fred H. Keiser are all good and some of them are most striking and unforgettable and add much to the attractiveness of this journey through some of the mountain wonders of America.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

THE CHARM OF THE MIDDLE KINGDOM

By JAMES REID MARSH. Little, Brown & Co. $3.00

Mr. Marsh was an official of the Chinese customs during his travels from Moukden to the south of the Middle Kingdom. Both speaking and writing Chinese he is able to enter quite closely into the life of the people and in this volume of appreciation of the color and life of China he makes full use of his qualifications. He writes of the beautiful Manchu temples and the Tombs of the Emperors in Moukden. He describes strange experiences with Chinese cooks with extraordinary sidelights on the Chinese idea of the value of human life. The story of his visit to the Temple of Fertility and the experience he had there in the presence of the consul tells a whole world of information about China. Another interesting passage describes his attendance by special invitation at the annual ceremonial worship of the Lamas of Lhasa and the strange dances which he there saw and the astonishment with which he observed utter disregard of the people for these holy rites. Only the children, he says, sat with eyes bulging out of their heads while their elders chattered and talked together. The author seems to have taken particular delight in speaking with all sorts of people and seems to enjoy recording as frankly as possible both his own thoughts and those of his acquaintances.

A number of good photographs, one actually showing the devil dance in Lhasa, provide a further interest in this narrative of fascinating travel.

BEYOND SHANGHAI

By HAROLD SPEAKMAN. The Abingdon Press, New York. $2.50.

This is the record of an artist's journeyings in a houseboat by rickshaw and by steamer and on foot in China. It includes a period spent in the houseboat dubbed "The Apocalypse" and along the river cities of the Yangtze and in the island of Puto-shan with its seventy Buddhist monasteries and temples. The final section describes the rather rare experience of living with a Chinese family under "native conditions." The book gives an interesting picture of Chinese life as it appears to the eye of one looking for color and romance. There are eight colored plates from paintings by the author which give a beautiful impression of the mystical atmosphere which he describes.

OLD MOROCCO AND THE FORBIDDEN ATLAS

By C. E. ANDREWS. George H. Doran Co., New York. $3.00.

Mr. Andrews dedicates his book to Joseph Conrad which is a sure evidence that he is out for romance and adventure and the book clearly records the atmosphere of strange places both among men and in the rugged and wild beauty of the forbidden Atlas. The author starts off with the story of the incident that filled him with an uncontrollable desire to visit Marrakesh, the ancient capitol of Morocco, and describes the flat roofs of this strange city, its minarets and palaces, market days here and in other queer cities. Throughout the pages are scattered little thumbnail word pictures of persons and scenes of all sorts. He describes the little Berber girl, Kbira, eight years old, who accompanied the party on its expedition and often helped out in difficult situations. The inevitable comic mule appears and here and there are Berber poems (translated into English of course) and amusing folk tales such as "The Story of the Foolish Sultan" and "The Tale of the Stork." The book is well illustrated with many photographs and is pleasingly printed on large pages.

CHILE

By L. E. ELLIOTT. The Macmillan Co., New York.

This is an up-to-date handbook on Chile apparently written chiefly from the point of view of business. There are chapters on mining, agriculture, forest and woodland, commerce, the transport system, finance, which would appeal especially to a man going on business to Chile, but there are also chapters on the history of the country, on the naval position of Chile among the nations, on the native races and on that curious possession of Chile, once so famous in the literature of romance, Easter Island. The known history of Chile is of course not very ancient. Four hundred years would perhaps cover the most of it from the days of the early navigators to today. Numerous photographs, both of towns and of mountains and harbors add interest to the pages, and two maps, one political and the other of railroads, are to be found at the end of the book together with a glossary of Chilean terms.

Good Books

YELLOW BUTTERFLIES

By MARY RAYMOND SHIPMAN ANDREWS. Charles Scribner's Sons. 75 cents.

This is another of the characteristically beautiful stories by Mrs. Andrews. It tells the story of a little boy who came to manhood in the days of the Great War, and went out to serve his country never to return. Somehow his mother feels that he has returned to her in the coming of the American Unknown Soldier. It is impossible to describe the charm with which the story is told without retelling it in the author's words. Most graceful is the use made of the symbol of the swarm of "cloudless sulphur" butterflies, which once settled on the yellow curls of the little boy. Doubtless the story brings comfort to many hearts sorely wounded in the Great War.

Mrs. Andrews offers acknowledgment and thanks to Mr. Kirk Simpson for his press account of the coming of the American Unknown Soldier.

NEW BLOOD, A Story of the Folks That Make America

By LOUISE RICE. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York. $1.00.

Louise Rice has written a very pleasing and suggestive story of the coming of foreigners into a little sleepy Jersey village and of their conscious and unconscious effects upon that village. Evidently she has drawn upon many actual events in describing the situation. Indeed the book closes with a description of a monument to the men of that town who served and some of whom fell in the great war. The book is written in a delightful vein and contains incidents both of humor and of pathos. The coming of these strange people to the town and their landing at the station on a hot sleepy afternoon and how they quite innocently drew together Miss Elizabeth Meredith and John Arden, the estranged lovers, and the contest against the epidemic which swept the town makes a tale of moving interest which leaves a cheerful thought in the mind.

GRIMM'S FAIRY TALES

Edited by FRANCES JENKINS OLCOTT. The Penn Publishing Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

The edition of Grimm edited by Frances Jenkins Olcott is delightfully illustrated by Rie Cramer. Some of us of American training think that some of Grimm's tales are rather terrifying for children, but Miss Olcott has given some recognition to that fact and has really in this edition produced a book which we need not be afraid to place in the hands of little ones.

Co-operation in Europe

By Mrs. James P. Warbasse

Educational Secretary of the Co-Operative League of America

IT is encouraging to know that the Co-operative movement is being carried along with magnitude as well as with zeal in other countries. In England one-third of the population are Co-operators. Their trade in 1919 amounted to about one billion dollars. The thirteen Co-operative Wholesale Warehouses distribute the products of sixty-five factories which make boots and shoes, cutlery, ironware, soap, tobacco, jams, pickles, bacon, cocoa, paints, brushes and brooms, flour, crackers and candy and even automobiles. The wheat that goes into the manufacture of flour is largely grown on the wholesale society's land in Canada and is transported to England in the society's own ships. The Co-operators own about thirty thousand acres of fruit and pasture land in England. Their policy is said to be to buy up every acre of tillable land offered for sale in England and place it in use for producing fruit, vegetables and dairy products for the consumers.

The membership of this great body of consumers is largely from the wage-earning class and it is from their ranks that the directors, managers and officers of their enterprises are drawn. Tom Killon, the former president of the British Wholesale went to work at the age of nine years. He had thirty thousand people under his direction in factories, mills and warehouses when he resigned at middle age. In 1918 the business he directed amounted to $400,000,000. He received a salary of $3,500. It is interesting to note in Great Britain that while Co-operative labor get slightly higher wages than is paid in private business, yet its managers and leaders have established standards of remuneration for themselves that would be scorned by captains of industry. The manager of St. Cuthbert's Society, Edinburgh, for example, received a salary in 1900 of $1,750 a year. In the twenty-six years of his service he administered for his membership a trade that made over twenty-one million dollars in savings. If he had retained and re-invested in a capitalistic fashion, instead of distributing them according to the co-operative principle, he might have died a famous Scotch millionaire. Instead, his answer to a firm who urged him to work for them was as follows: "My fellow co-operators pay me sufficient to satisfy my needs. I am happy serving the people. I should not be happy serving you at the expense of the people."

The total products of the British Co-operative factories are five times greater than those of the British Manufacturers' Association. We can get some idea of the volume of the product when we realize that in their eight flour mills, they turn out thirty-five tons an hour. In the Irlam soap works 500 tons of soap are produced each week. Four million pairs of shoes a year come from co-operative shoe factories.

In none of these centers of industry do we find goods being produced for the consumer at the expense of the worker. Way back in 1901, nearly twenty years ago, without threat of a strike the membership themselves instituted the eight hour day. Was this not long before any such legislation was passed, aside from being enforced, even by progressive states? In the membership meetings the question of hours, wages, bonuses, standards of output, etc., are discussed at length and voted on. Co-operators as employers insist on right conditions in the industries owned by them. The spirit of these workers' organizations is definitely different from that in most enterprises run for private profit.

Numerically speaking, the Russian Co-operative Movement is the largest on the continent, although it is many years younger than the British. Since the revolution it has flourished. Now 70 per cent of the population are members. Fifteen million members do an annual trade of $400,000,000. Each European country has a story all its own that would be of interest to follow. For seventy-five years the European Co-operatives have been plugging steadily along, each step of the path a step ahead even though it may have been a slow and not always a certain step. By now their members and their achievements are so sure that we here in America feel very youthful when we attempt to tell of our achievements in this land of enterprise.

Nevertheless, here and there across the country we see various interesting phases of the movement.

Co-operative stores

Miners, railroad men and other groups of organized workers form the basis of most of the co-operative stores in the United States. A type of workers' Co-operative stores may be found among the miners in Gillespie, Illinois. Their sixth annual report shows a spare capital of $12,000 invested in dry goods, shoes, groceries and meats, and miners' tools and supplies. Two hundred and eighty-five members do an annual trade at their store of $175,000, the net profits on this business being $10,000 a year; the profits being nearly equal to the investment. Seven per cent of the profits is paid back to the members in purchasing dividends.

Another miner's store is at Calumet, Michigan. The Tamarack Co-operative Society has a membership of seventeen hundred. It was organized thirty years ago and has continuously paid a yearly interest on its capital from four to eight per cent and saving returns to members on their purchases varying from eight to thirteen per cent. Since its beginning, it has returned in interest and savings returns one and a half million dollars. Its business amounts to $900,000 a year.

Co-operative milk

Co-operative milk distribution is not merely as general as the Co-operative store, but it may prove to be so economically effective a method of bringing the milk supply from the dairies to the babies, that mothers will soon be insisting on Co-operative dairies. In some New England factory towns there are several of these plants. Co-operatives in Fitchburg, Mass., who were already running a restaurant, bank, printing plant and women's and men's furnishing store, found that the dairy farmers were killing their cattle rather than sell their milk at a loss. The Co-operators agreed to take the full product of forty milk farms, paying the farmers a cent more a quart for it than they had previously received, seven and three-quarter cents. They so economized on collecting, pasteurizing and distributing the milk that it was delivered to their four hundred members within six hours at fourteen cents a quart, instead of eighteen cents, the price at which it had been sold before.

In addition to this economy the Co-operators are setting aside from the savings a fund by which they soon will be able to buy up one farm after another and so control, not only the distribution, but the production of milk. The profit motive in milk production is dangerous. Discontented farmers and diseased cows are a public menace. Dr. Williams, in figuring out the waste in milk distribution in Rochester, New York, and its immediate effect on quantity and service, found in 1919 that twenty-three farmers were covering twenty miles daily in delivering to one hundred sixty-five families, the total cost being $720,000 whereas he calculated that one distributing agency need cover only two miles with a cost of but $220,000 to the same number of families.

Co-operative bakeries

The Purity Bakery in Paterson, New Jersey, was organized by the mill workers in 1906. When first started it was not run on strictly Rochdale principles. The workers were poor and bread was dear. By co-operating they sought to get more bread for less money. After selling it to themselves at six cents a loaf, if any surplus remained it was used as a strike fund or for some social purpose.

Private bakeries felt the competition keenly and did everything in their power to destroy their Co-operative rival; even to giving bread away on certain days. But the members stuck to their own bakery and it grew and grew till it was serving daily over a thousand members. When war was declared and the price of food was fixed by the Federal Food Control Board, the bakery faced a new problem. The Government ruling was that bread should be sold at ten cents a loaf. They telegraphed to Mr. Hoover to find out if they must raise the price of their bread four cents. At the same time that their complaint was received in Washington, protests against the government prices from private bakers all over the country poured in, stating that if they had to charge so low a price they would be ruined!

The reply to the Purity Cooperators was that no exception could be made in their case and so they had to solve the difficulty of having too much money on their hands. A general meeting of the members was called and they decided to revise their constitution along Rochdale lines and return the profits to their members according to the amount of their purchases, after setting aside a good sized sum which was used to help build a new $70,000 sunny bakery lined with white tiling and installed with splendid rotary ovens which turn out thousands of loaves a day. Their annual business is $250,000 on which they save $18,000 which they return to their members.

There are thirty other Co-operative bakeries in the United States, several of which have been modelled on the Purity Bakery at Paterson.

When will all the people get together and work out for themselves the problem of daily bread as effectively as these Co-operatives have?

Co-operative housing

Next in importance to food and clothing these days is the question, "Where shall we live?" In Europe, while the state and municipalities are tossing back and forth at each other the responsibility for carrying out adequate housing enterprises for thousands of homeless citizens, Co-operators have set their shoulders to the task and are actually building garden cities and rows upon rows of modern apartment houses. Here in America we abuse the authorities for not doing something to relieve the housing shortage, but it is only here and there, as in Brooklyn, New York, Kansas City, Milwaukee and other scattered spots that people are uniting their savings in a common fund and proceeding to supply their own needs free from the predatory landlord and the impotent state.

Two sixteen-family apartment houses in Brooklyn, each costing about $45,000 to build, have been erected by the people who live in them. They are their own landlords. They raised $8,000 amongst themselves and borrowed from a Co-operative bank in Fitchburg the remaining $33,000 on mortgage. Each apartment dweller pays rent to the Association, of which he is a member, at the rate of $25 and $27.50 a month. This pays the interest on the share capital and loan and is sufficient for repairs, up-keep and a reserve fund with which to pay off the mortgage from time to time.

There is a different atmosphere in Co-operative apartments than in those lived in by the tenants who are hounded from year to year and from place to place by the greed of voracious landlords. There is a sense of contentment and security, of care and pride in their homes, that the about-to-be evicted city dweller seldom feels.

Two more similar apartments are being built next to these in Brooklyn by friendly imitators, while on the nearby corner a Co-operative Bakery with a grocery, bakeshop and meat market on the street floor and a recreation hall upstairs, has just been completed at a cost of $120,000. These will supplement the Co-operative Housing scheme.

Co-operative laundries

When food, shelter and clothing are all organized on a co-operative basis, the one remaining necessity is a laundry. Much of the wear and tear on the housewife is removed when the family washing can be done in some central place. "Start a Co-operative Laundry and make the old time washday a holiday" is the watch word of a farming community around Chatfield, Minnesota. By installing up-to-date washing, drying and mangling machinery in a building adjacent to their Co-operative Creamery, they have been able to utilize the same steam power with an additional investment of only $2,500. When the farmers drive in with their milk they bring the wash from home. It is returned to them rough dry at a cost of five cents a pound. (I am paying 13 cents a pound for similar work because I must patronize a commercial laundry.) This is by no means mere service cost. From these charges the Society pays six per cent interest on capital invested and ten per cent dividends on patronage. It is a real Rochdale Laundry, not one of the temporizing cost-plus affairs that have no stability and furnish no training school for the collective administration of the people's needs.

Co-operative laundries are to be found in several other locations in the United States.

Co-operative recreation

The purely materialistic side of life is not the only side which co-operation serves. The intellectual and the social cravings of the people are provided for by the same methods and with the same motives and ideals.

Every tourist passing through Belgium is familiar with the social centers there, Les Maisons des Peuples. In the early days of Co-operation they were modest little club houses where the men gathered to read the papers, hear a song from a comrade once in a while and sip a cup of coffee, gingerale or beer. Except for alcoholic drinks and profit, they were a substitute for the cafes. When the women and children came, music, dancing and little plays were given. Now some of the most beautiful buildings and parks are owned and used by these very Co-operators. The money invested in them usually comes from savings of the Co-operative bakeries, shops and factories managed by the working men and women. It is they who determine how the profit shall be used. In Belgium profits are used to cheer the hearts and gladden the days of Co-operators, not to line the pockets of a few profiteers. On the top floor of the Maison des Peuples, in Ghent, is the studio of Jules von Biesbroeck, the famous Finnish painter and sculptor. He is subsidized by the members of the Co-operative to create a new art which shall interpret the struggles of the labor movement. His mural decorations, marble groups and paintings are created as a response to the artistic demands of the people. He needs no "patron." In this country it is difficult to find any such social and artistic expression of the community as are typified in the Belgium Maison des Peuples. The community center movement is striving toward something in that direction, but it is created from the top and handed down. It has not yet taken root, nor has it been supported by the people, without subsidy from the benevolent.

In this country too, social, educational and aesthetic features are being promoted by many Co-operative Associations as part of their regular activities. Many bakeries and shops have reading rooms where books, magazines and papers are arranged to attract members in their moments of leisure. Plays, concerts, dances, movies and other entertainments are planned by special committees from time to time. This part of the Co-operative movement is as important as the economic. "The test of a people's culture is how they spend their leisure." Many Co-operators in this country realize this and are bending all their efforts to develop the ideals and lessons of co-operation through beauty, art and play, as well as through the functions of barter and trade.

In every land, where Co-operative Societies exist, the members are learning to work together, developing initiative, resource and technique through action, proving to the world that individual profit, that individual progress need not be the entire motive and purpose of life. They are demonstrating that people can organize in a free society for mutual benefit and not for private gain.

The progress and development of co-operation though not by any means complete, is still far from being a dream of the future.

In Europe today thirty million heads of families are members of Co-operative Societies. With five to a family this means that one hundred and fifty millions of people take part (without private profit) in the trade of Europe. The membership doubled during the war, when private trade exploited the people and governments failed to meet their needs.

Cannot we attain the same goal in this country? Let us begin right now to study and train ourselves in the principles of co-operation. When soundly equipped with the necessary knowledge let us organize and carry through some form of Co-operation. Then we may feel assured that each of us is laying a brick in a solid foundation of the new economic structure of society. The spirit by which it is reared substitutes mutual aid and unselfish service for antagonism and competition. The method by which it is brought about is as sound and tested as it is ideal and Utopian. By consecrating ourselves to this service we will be laying up treasures that cannot be lost or destroyed in any cataclysm of coming events; we will be preparing ourselves and our fellow men for effective participation in the new order when the storms are past and the Co-operative Commonwealth is ushered in.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Conducted by Rev. Edmund De S. Brunner, Ph. D.

The Self Americanization of a Country Church

TEN years ago the Big Springs Baptist Church held all its services in Swedish. Today practically all of them are in English. The change has taken place under the leadership of Reverend Ragnar A. Orlander, a native of Sweden, and until he came to Big Springs, a city pastor. He is one city pastor who has made good in the country.

The church was organized a little more than a half a century ago by seven Swedes who met for some time in the sod barn of their first pastor. In 1880 the first building was erected, part of which is now serving as the pastor's garage and the rest of it as a part of the township hall. The second building was constructed in 1893 which is now a part of the new and modern church plant. One element in the success of this church has been the long pastorates which have averaged nearly ten years per man.

The change from Swedish to English at church services is not the only one which has taken place in the last ten years. The members were naturally conservative and a little slow to accept new ideas. This did not discourage Mr. Orlander. When the plan to raise the building and put in a basement which would include a small dining room and kitchen was proposed, it met with much opposition. This seemed to be too big an undertaking to the members. During one of the many meetings held for consideration of the matter one trustee asked the pastor: "Are you going to make a soup house of the church?" "No," replied the pastor, "but we are going to make it a pleasant place to meet in and I am sure when we get it all planned you will be the first to give fifty dollars." "No sir, I will not give a cent to it," quickly returned the trustee.

But as it finally turned out, a committee was appointed to raise the money of which this trustee was a member, and he was actually, the first man to give not fifty but one hundred dollars to the project.

While the first undertaking was not a large one, it was very important for it revived the church and brought it to a consciousness of its power. It showed the members that they could do something. It was the best sort of revival. When the question of a new parsonage came before the congregation three years later, it was received more favorably. The old house was sold and moved to town, and a beautiful modern home was built in its place. This new parsonage has eight large rooms, lower floor furnished in hard wood, basement finished including a cement floor, electric lights, running water, indoor toilet and hot water heating system.

The latest improvement which Big Springs has undertaken and which it is just completing, is the remodeling of the church. The remodeled church will be tantamount to a new church, for the old edifice has practically been rebuilt. The work cost nearly twenty thousand dollars and was all paid for on the day of dedication. The outside dimensions are seventy by sixty. The main auditorium is fifty by thirty-six with a seating capacity of two hundred fifty. A small gallery in the rear will seat seventy-five easily. The main Sunday School room, thirty-four by twenty-four, is separated from the auditorium by accordion doors and will seat two hundred comfortably. The total seating capacity of the auditorium then is over five hundred.

Because the Big Springs church has always featured singing in its services, a platform large enough to seat a chorus of twenty-five has been built instead of one just large enough for the preacher. A space was provided for a pipe organ and the connections are being put in with the general understanding that this is the next improvement which will come in the very near future.

There are five individual Sunday School class rooms up stairs and four in the basement which, used in connection with the main Sunday School room, gives the Sunday School plenty of room.

The basement includes a dining room and kitchen. The former will seat about one hundred fifty at tables and when used for a prayer meeting or B. Y. P. U. meeting it will seat two hundred. The kitchen is modern in every respect, including running water, large new stove, built in shelves, serving window into the dining room and many other comforts that men would overlook but which make the work more pleasant for the women. The women have a separate cloak room and rest room.

The whole building is electric lighted with power from the new 110-volt electric plant which also furnishes power for the parsonage. This plant is in a separate building and was installed for $2,000. Besides furnishing light it runs the pump which supplies the pressure for the water system of both the church and parsonage.

The furniture including the seats in the auditorium will all be new, and beautiful electric light fixtures are being installed throughout the building. The church may justly be proud of their home for a similar equipment, including the parsonage and ground, in almost any city would cost today between forty and fifty thousand dollars.

The church has adopted the budget system for handling all its finances. The current expenses are apportioned to the different members. A committee is appointed at the last meeting of the year which apportions the estimated local expenses of the coming year among all the members and nothing more is said of current expenses for the remainder of the year. The local expenses of the church for the last fiscal year were $2200. The church also raised $9000 toward the new building last year.

The church has always backed up its word of appreciation of the pastor with deeds. Pastors cannot live at the present time on expressions of approval and votes of thanks. The pastor receives $1800 a year and his parsonage. The trustees always see to it that ice enough to last all summer is put up in the winter and wood enough to last all winter is cut in the summer. There are two acres of ground in connection with the parsonage which gives the pastor plenty of space to have a large garden, and for years his garden has been second to none in the community. A few chickens and a cow furnish fresh eggs, butter and cream for the family. What an opportunity our city pastors are missing by not accepting calls to country churches!

On Sunday regular services are held. The Sunday School, which has an average attendance of one hundred and twenty-five, follows the morning service. Special singing is a feature of every service, and a large orchestra is used very often in the evening. The Sunday services are well attended and it is not uncommon to see sixty cars parked in the church yard on a pretty Sunday.

On Wednesday evening the regular prayer meeting is held and on Friday evening the young people have their meeting. Their plan of holding the B. Y. P. U. on a week night is somewhat new but it is working splendidly at Big Springs. By having a whole evening the young people are not crowded for time. They sing several songs and follow out the regular B. Y. P. U. method of conducting a program. The program committee meets with the pastor once a month to arrange the program. It is aimed to have every young person take some part in a meeting at least once a month. After the meeting a social hour follows including some light refreshments. The average attendance for a year is seventy-five and on the night the writer was present sixty young people were out, in spite of the fact that it was a cold February night with a deep snow on the ground. When the roads are good, it is not uncommon to have over one hundred young people present and the beauty of it all is this—as many young men attend as young women.

The men's Bible Class, taught by the pastor, meets Sunday morning. This same class functions as a Brotherhood and takes an active part in all community questions. It is this organization which has supported the pastor in all his building enterprises.

A male chorus of fourteen voices is made up from members of this class. Besides leading the singing at many of the regular church services, the chorus sings at many community affairs. It is very popular and is often invited to sing at the Old Settlers picnic and similar occasions.

The Ladies' Aid Society meets at the different homes. The whole family attends these meetings and it is not unusual to have one hundred fifty present. This gives the members a great opportunity for social fellowship. The younger ladies have a Mission Society which also meets in the different homes. This was the Red Cross organization during the war.

Thanksgiving Day is a special day at Big Springs. It is made a big community Thanksgiving Service Day. A special Thanksgiving sermon is preached by the pastor and a special offering is given for orphan children. The whole community have their dinner together at the church and there is always present from four to five hundred. A committee is appointed to arrange for the dinner. They make a menu and assign different items to the different families to bring and when it is all put together nothing is missing to make the turkey dinner complete.

Another community celebration is the annual Sunday School picnic. This picnic is very largely attended by all the people in the community whether they belong to the church or not. The children have their contests, the fat men race and the boys see who can eat the largest number of blueberry pies. It is a great day together in the beautiful country which they all love so much.

Then the day of all days—Christmas day, is justly celebrated at Big Springs. Preparations are made for weeks in advance for this program. The children are taught "pieces" and the older ones learn songs. Some years Christmas scenes and tableaux are given. The church is always elaborately decorated and the beautiful Christmas tree is never forgotten. It is needless to say that the church is crowded to its utmost capacity at these entertainments.

It is very gratifying to find a church program which makes provision for the social development of its members as well as the spiritual. The two can be carried on simultaneously. "In Big Springs," says Rev. Orlander, "we never have a social gathering or entertainment without having a prayer or a Bible reading which gives the occasion a religious atmosphere nor does this drive away the young people." Each year a special series of revival meetings are held usually led by the pastor. The meetings are well attended by both the young and old of the community. When Rev. Orlander took up the work ten years ago, the church had a membership of one hundred eighty-five, at present there are two hundred fifty members. One hundred and fifty members have been taken into the church during the present pastorate. A large percentage of these have been young people. A very important point in this connection is this—the whole program and message of the country churches should appeal to the young people. If it does, it will assist in holding young people on the farms. The older people sell their farms and move to town leaving the middle aged and young people in control of the community. This gives a rural pastor a big opportunity to develop a membership and leadership largely composed of comparatively young people.

It is Rev. Orlander's conviction that the country church is the only solution for the church problem in the open country. In those churches which are supposed to be a combination of town and country folk, all the offices are usually held by the town people. As a result the country folks feel no responsibility and they therefore stay home and criticise. When the country people have their own church as they have in Big Springs they feel the responsibility of supporting it and attending all its meetings. A country church can do things as well as a city church. The Big Springs plan to invite the denominational State Convention next year. It has a church large enough for the meetings and as almost all the members live in modern homes the delegates will be royally entertained.

One of the strongest testimonies to the success of this church is the number of young people from this church who are attending college this year, eight in all.

Too much credit cannot be given to the pastor for his faithful work. He did not allow himself to be distracted by calls to large city churches and general work which he has received in the past and is still receiving but instead stays at Big Springs and makes the many opportunities there his responsibility.

"I love the people, and that is the reason I stay." If all our pastors would stay with churches long enough to really know their people, to share their troubles and successes, in a word to love them, we would have more churches like Big Springs.

Rev. Orlander believes, "That the big problem in the country, and in the city, is to reach the hearts. The pastor has never preached agriculture, good roads, or better pigs on Sunday to his people, this part of the church's program is carried out on week days, but it is carried out. His theory is this—When business men come to church, they do not want to hear about figures and merchandise, neither does the farmer expect instructions in agriculture or road building on Sunday. He expects the pastor to lead him in his worship." Thus through an all-around program of worship, education and service, Big Springs has done and is doing Big Things.

A SYMPOSIUM

On "The Gap in the Wall"

The View of Rev. J. Mont. Travis of Denver, Colorado

THE article on "The Gap in the Wall," by Mr. Berry in your issue of November 11th is a very timely article upon a most perplexing problem.

Mr. Berry's announcement that he is one of the younger set is wholly unnecessary. Every oldtimer will recognize at once his "newness" in his treatment of this problem which has baffled the wisdom of the leaders of all denominations.

May I, as an old one who has spent half a lifetime trying to correct, without legislation, some of the evils which Mr. Berry attributes to Presbyterian lack of system, venture one or two comments?

1. The problem of tenure of office in the pastorate and the problem of Vacancy and Supply are two separate, distinct and very different problems touching each other only where the minister is trying to make his escape from an unsatisfactory pastorate.

The irritating activity of a disgruntled minority is sadly common; but it is not an unmixed evil. It has its rise, not in the Presbyterian or any other system, but in the general depravity of human nature. More commonly, perhaps, it is the depravity of the minority that becomes the irritant, but too often it is the depravity or the inefficiency or the unwisdom of the pastor himself and his personal friends. The remedy is almost always to be found in the dissolution of the pastoral relation at the request of the pastor without making any fuss about it; but the preventive which is of vastly more importance, is to be found, not in "system" but in perfect frankness on the part of pastor and people, each with himself and each with the other. Having been for many years in a position with exceptional opportunities to observe without prejudice, I give it as my judgment that in at least one-third of the cases where difficulties in the pastorate make it necessary for the pastor to seek another field, he and not a disgruntled minority is to blame. Let a pastor regularly take account of his own stewardship; consult first his own better judgment than that of his wife and most intimate friends and in many cases he will find that he has reached his limit and served his time of usefulness in his field and that in justice to himself as well as to his people he ought to make a change. Let the officers and members of a congregation take council together as to their own faithfulness, their loyalty and co-operation and they will many times find that they are at fault and that the progress of their church can only be restored by a fuller response to the leadership of their pastor.

Where the difficulty is really created by an unreasonable and meddlesome minority the Presbyterian "system" is peculiarly fitted to apply the remedy. I know of such a case in which the pastor reported to his Presbytery that a disgruntled few were trying to drive him out and asked the Presbytery whether he should go or stay. The Presbytery made a careful investigation and ordered the "minority" to cease its opposition at once or leave the church. Half of it did one and half the other. If, however, these difficulties and unpleasantnesses in the pastorate are traced to their ultimate cause it will be found in the lack of wisdom on the part of congregation in calling a man unsuited to their particular field—in their failure to make a careful investigation as to his adaptation rather than his ability, or the failure of the minister to consider carefully enough his own adaptability to the peculiar needs of that church. They "marry in haste and repent at leisure."

2. The second problem with which Mr. Berry deals, that of making the connection between the minister wanting a church and the church wanting a pastor, or as he seems to consider it, finding a good church for every minister, like the poor we have always with us. There are always in the Presbyterian body a large number of ministers without a charge or looking for a change of fields and at the same time a large number of churches looking for pastors. This is one of the most serious problems with which the church is confronted, but it is not nearly so serious as Mr. Berry imagines. In order to eliminate a large part of the problem permit me to say that a great many of the "vacant" churches either never ought to have been organized or ought now to be dissolved, and a large number of the "vacant" or restless ministers either never ought to have been ordained (or received from some other denomination) or are not now content to serve the only kind of church that they are competent to serve. I know of a Presbytery just now in which there are six vacant churches. In four of these the utter inefficiency of the pastor was evident to everybody in the congregation and the Presbytery except the minister himself; in the other two cases the men were competent but unfitted for the particular kind of work required by conditions in their fields. But with this elimination there remains the great problem with its anxieties and its heartbreaks, with its ever imperative demand for solution.

Two elements serve to multiply the difficulties of solution. The first is the constant clamoring of an army of untrained, inefficient, restless men for jobs, so that the minute a church is announced as "vacant" the Session is deluged with applications from men, one-half of whom would not accept the church if it was offered to them and the other half could not carry on the work of that particular church successfully for six months if they had it. The Session, in self defence, consigns the whole lot to the wastebasket and the one or two worthy men who ought to have received consideration go with the rest. However humiliating it may be, it must be confessed that many of these "rounders" are mere adventurers who by some hook or crook have managed to get ordained and are going about from church to church trying to get a living by the easiest possible means. The remedy at this particular point lies with the Presbyteries in the enforcement of the powers which they already possess. See to it that no man is ordained until he has proved his worthiness and that no man is received from another denomination until his record is thoroughly established and his worthiness proved; then see to it again that when a man has proved himself to be unworthy he is deposed and not shunted off onto some other Presbytery. With the driftwood cleared away the placing of worthy ministers would be greatly simplified. The second element in the difficulties of filling vacancies is the unreasonable and often unchristian prejudice against men who have passed middle life. For this, doubtless, many of the older men are themselves to blame, for at the period of life when they ought to be at their very best—at the very height of their usefulness, they begin to take their ease in Zion, to rely upon their past reputation and to "let down" in their work. Yet hundreds of ministers between the ages of sixty and seventy years are doing glorious work in the kingdom and would be an honor to any church. I know of no remedy for this feature of the difficulty but the instilling of the spirit of Christ, mingled with a little common sense, into the minds and hearts of the officers and members of churches holding such prejudice. This kind cometh out not by "system," but by prayer and fasting.

Is there any solution for this age-old problem? Mr. Berry suggests the system of the Methodist Episcopal Church. This system keeps every church supplied with some kind of preacher and every preacher supplied with some kind of church; but ministers of the Methodist Church complain to me more frequently and more bitterly against their system than do Presbyterian ministers against our own. A church is better without any minister than with an unfit one.

Personally, I believe that the present system of Vacancy and Supply used by the Presbyterian Church will go as far toward solving the problem as any system can until there are some fundamental changes brought about in the manner of selecting and training men for the ministry, provided both ministers and churches will honestly and earnestly "play the game." This provides, if properly carried out, that the Stated Clerk of the General Assembly shall have in his files a complete list of churches desiring a pastor and a complete list of ministers without a charge or desiring a change of pastorate. Each Presbytery has its own local committee whose business it is to assist any church to secure a pastor or any minister to secure a church. This has not worked out very successfully so far because neither the churches nor the ministers have really entered into it with any kind of earnestness. The Stated Clerk now has on file the names of some three hundred or more ministers who want a church and is able to furnish information concerning each one. Possibly sixty or seventy-five of these are "rounders" whose Presbyteries ought to eliminate them; but the great majority are fine, competent men ready to take up work in any field suited to their ability and conditions. He has also a list of the churches seeking a pastor. This is never complete because the Presbyteries fail to make full returns; but there is a long list. Now comes the difficulty of adjustment. This minister has the executive ability to minister to only a medium sized congregation; but he must be located in a larger town on account of the College privileges. This one is trained and competent for any line of work, but can live only at a very high altitude or in a certain climate. This man is an exceptionally good preacher, but frankly confesses that he cannot do pastoral work and must have a church where that is not required and so on down the list. This adjustment is a tremendous task, requiring endless patience and highest skill and it can only be accomplished by the finest co-operation between the Stated Clerk's office on the one hand and the churches and ministers and the local Committee on Vacancy and Supply on the other. But it can be done. Let us, at least until a better way is found, stop complaining and finding fault and lend our very best efforts to the putting into perfect operation the machinery we have already installed.

The View of Rev. George W. Luccock

Pastor of the College Church, Wooster, Ohio

MR. BERRY has stated very fully and fairly, and in good spirit, the evils in the situation. Your introductory observation altogether right. Even the M. E. Church, the efficiency of which is justly entitled to all Protestant admiration, has its problems. If ministers and churches of Congregational and Presbyterian order would accept settlement on the terms that rule in Methodist appointments, no church need have a long vacancy, no minister able to work need be without charge, and no pastorate need be perpetuated to the point of unendurable suffering. For be it known that even in the House of Wesley complaints are not confined to a whisper. It is an easy jump from the frying pan of democratic incompetence to the fire of monarchical efficiency. And few there be that make the jump. However, it is with a great price that we buy this democratic freedom.

It is to be remembered, in working toward the desired goal, that a perfectly satisfactory system is impossible, for the reason that a perfectly satisfactory system presupposes a spiritual culture not yet attained by any preacher or any church. If all the preachers and all the churches were all that they ought to be, there would be no problem. The problem persists because of the persistence of certain carnal survivals in both pulpit and pew.

While no system wholly satisfactory can be expected, a very great improvement may and ought to be expected. Day by day, in every way, we can do better.

It is to the credit of our Methodist brethren that they are addressing themselves to the task of effecting a better placed and adequately supported ministry than are Presbyterians. Presbyterians, mighty generous with their money in other directions, have never been willing properly to finance this undertaking.

Some say the old way is better, desiring to retain the prerogative of boosting their friends into desirable pastorates. Others throw up their hands and cry, "What's the sense? It's bad enough, but nothing can be done about it anyway." And many others do not care. Fairly comfortable and fully busy themselves, they are not concerned greatly for their less fortunate brethren. And, besides, like the voice of many waters comes the warning, "We just must cut down expenses."

For Presbyterians, there is only one way out. And that is through the Presbytery. For this particular company of saints, or rather company of particular saints, the government is on the shoulders of the Presbytery.

The task here, and it is far greater than many imagine, is to educate Presbyteries to fulfil their constitutional errand.

Already a good start, only a start, but a good one, has been made, by the ten years' incessant study of this problem, and patient toil to see a solution, by the late Dr. Walter H. Houston. He saw and stated with singular clearness how Presbyteries must bear the responsibility.

Dr. Lewis S. Mudge, Stated Clerk of the General Assembly, has taken a definite step forward in planning regional administration of the work of Vacancy and Supply.

If you have space for suggestions, the following might be offered:

The restlessness under present conditions not abating but rather increasing, makes some constructive effort for improvement imperative. It would be the sheerest folly to abandon the struggle to make the situation better.

Presbyterians must make up their minds that effective administration is impossible without money, and they must be willing that the Stated Clerk shall have enough money to develop his ideas.

Presbyteries must be stimulated to create and sustain a sentiment in their churches and in their ministers for using to the limit the principles of their own form of government.

And back of all, every man minister of us must feel himself called anew to preach by word and life the spirit of self sacrifice. We, no less than He, are here, not to be ministered unto but to minister, and, in our measure, to give our lives for the redemption of this and every like situation of sin.

The View of C. L. Brokaw

Cashier of the Commercial National Bank,
Kansas City, Kansas

I have for many years thought about this problem and have stated that I have thought the Methodist Church was handling the situation better than we Presbyterians, and it is a problem that ought to be solved. This "gap" should be closed. I have felt that it must be exceedingly humiliating to preachers to "candidate" and have been somewhat chagrined to observe the wire-pulling and letter writing that was necessary to secure a field for their endeavor.

The only suggestion that has ever come to my mind which seems at all feasible would be for each Presbytery or, better perhaps, for each Synod to appoint a committee of three, who would have somewhat the same powers that the bishop has in the Methodist Church. If some such change in the fundamental law and practice of the Presbyterian Church could be brought about, I believe that it would do much toward solving this problem.

The View of Rev. Perry V. Jenness, D. D.

Minister of the North Presbyterian Church
Denver, Colorado

As a Presbyterian I appreciate Mr. Berry's point of view, and can sympathize with him in his position.

However, I do not think the churches are altogether to blame. The restlessness of the ministry in these days accounts for some of the restlessness of the pew. Moreover, the unscriptural way of seeking additions to our membership by all kinds of questionable methods, without regard to spiritual experience, naturally creates a membership that will not be long content with a faithful ministry.

In my judgment the remedy will not be the erection of ecclesiastical machinery, but can only be found in a genuine spiritual awakening that shall touch and influence pulpit and pew alike.

The View of Rev. Thornton B. Penfield, D. D.

Secretary of the Metropolitan District of the Presbyterian New Era Movement

THE Gap in the Wall" is a very real thing in the Presbyterian Church. It is not merely a hole in the wall, for it is a part of the structure that was never finished. The Presbyterian Church has tried to fill the Gap with its Vacancy and Supply plan. This plan is thoroughly Presbyterian in its purpose and its program; and my observation of its workings leads me to feel that it operates advantageously in sections of the country that have been willing to adopt it and use it as it is intended to be used. The plan safeguards both pastor and congregation, both candidate and vacant church; but so far it has not filled the Gap, because in the eastern states, particularly, few presbyteries are sufficiently Presbyterian to be willing to swallow the plan—hook, bait and sinker—and the result is that frequently the Vacancy and Supply Committee is either discredited, or the committee is retained in name only with merely the functions of a ministerial intelligence office or matrimonial bureau, minus the registration fees.

In this modified form the Vacancy and Supply plan has serious limitations. And yet, as chairman of the so-called Vacancy and Supply Committee in my own presbytery for several years, I can bear testimony that the committee has saved several churches from disastrous if not scandalous experiences and, on the other hand, has been the means of bringing a number of strong, spiritually-minded and well worth while pastors to churches that are today rejoicing in their splendid leadership. Of course, there are many men who apply for opportunities to be heard in churches who have to be disappointed. The committee, acting as a clearing-house, has to reach decisions that are not always in harmony with the judgment of candidates themselves or their zealous friends. And unquestionably the members of all such committees, as well as the candidates and their friends, are liable to err in their judgment and exhibit other human limitations.

I cannot speak from experience of the situation in other denominations but I am confident that a number of earnest, unselfish Presbyterian leaders are now giving much thought and attention to the problems that have been stated in the article written by Mr. Berry; and the recent action of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in connecting the work of the Vacancy and Supply Committee more closely with the office of the Stated Clerk of the General Assembly, thus bringing the work of this committee and that of the Stated Clerk in each presbytery into closer relations, is an effort to lay foundations to fill the Gap as it exists in this denomination.

---

The British Y. W. C. A.'s Counsel to Investors

More than two years ago the Executive Committee of the British Y. W. C. A. passed the following resolution: "The Young Women's Christian Association of Great Britain wish to state publicly that they are convinced that the claims of workers to adequate wages come before the claims of shareholders to dividends.

"They desire to urge upon those of their members, who are shareholders, the duty of accepting their responsibilities towards those whose labors help to produce their dividends. Further, they feel convinced that members should inform themselves as fully as possible as to conditions of employment and, as one means to this end, attend shareholders' meetings."

Here is outlined in brief a policy which should become a matter of course as the ideal among Christian investors. The Christian should ask questions of the corporations in which he holds an interest as to wages and working conditions and profits.

Write for this Booklet

It tells how you may secure an income that cannot shrink; how you may execute your own will; how you may create a trust fund; how you may give generously without hardship. It describes the annuity bond, a safe, convenient, and productive investment which promotes a fundamental Christian enterprise. Endorsed by all denominations.

Write for Booklet 1C.
AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY
Bible House, Astor Place, New York

Crannell's Pocket Lessons

Full Bible text for all the International Lessons for 1923, with Analyses, References, and Daily Bible Readings. Vest-pocket size, 2 3/4 x 5 3/4 inches. 207 pages. Strong cloth binding, 35 cents.

The Judson Press
1701-1703 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

"New-Idea" Service Table

A sturdy, neat and well finished oak table, unexcelled for general household purposes, carrying entire meal and returning dishes to kitchen. How many steps will this save you?—Shelves 18 x 24 inches covered with cork material not affected by heat, water, etc. Sent parcel post, with return privilege—not sold in stores. Price $8.50 plus postage or express. Weight 20 pounds. Circular on request.

Price $8.50
Parcel Post

Rodda Mfg. Co., 10 S. 18th St., Phila., Pa.

Says Doctor

Sherwood Eddy

Missionary and Social Prophet

"Among the few journals that have stood for complete social justice and a full social gospel, The Christian Century holds a unique place."

EDITORIAL STAFF

Charles Clayton Morrison
Herbert L. Willett Orvis F. Jordan
Joseph Fort Newton John R. Ewers
Lynn Harold Hough Edward Shillito
Alva W. Taylor Thomas C. Clark

The Christian Century is distinguished by its candid discussion of living issues in the light of the mind of Christ

Mail Coupon to-day. Foreign postage extra

CHRISTIAN CENTURY

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Dear Sirs: Please enter my name (a new subscriber) for a year's subscription to The Christian Century at your regular rate of $4.00 (ministers $3.00). I will remit upon receipt of bill and you will please send me without extra charge a copy of ☐ "The Reconstruction of Religion," by Ellwood, or ☐ "The Crisis of the Churches," by Leighton Parks, or ☐ "The Mind in the Making," by Robinson, or ☐ "What Christianity Means to Me," by Lyman Abbott.

Name .....

Address .....

C. W.

Books Received

The Dramatic Instinct in Religious Education. By Thos. W. Galloway, Ph. D. Pilgrim Press. $1.75

The Morals of the Movies. By Ellis P. Oberholtzer. Penn Publishing Co. $1.00.

The Art of Preaching. By Dean Chas. R. Brown. Macmillan Co. $1.75.

A Short History of the World. By H. G. Wells. Macmillan Co. $4.00.

The Conquest of Disease. By Eugene DelMar. Progressive Literature Co. $2.00.

Drama in Religious Service. By Martha Candler. The Century Co. $2.00.

Heroes of the Church. By Park Hays Miller. Westminster Press. 50 cents.

Church Street, Stories of American Village Life. By Jean C. Cochran. Westminster Press. $1.50.

Verses for Children. By Cecil T. Blancke. Westminster Press $1.50.

Man and the Two Worlds. By William F. Dix and Randall Salisbury. Harper & Bros. $1.50.

I Believe in God and in Evolution. By Wm. W. Keen, M.D. J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.00.

Modern Physiology, Hygiene and Health By Mary S. Haviland $1.50.

Old Morocco and the Forbidden Atlas. By C. E. Andrews. Geo. F. Doran Co. $3.00.

A Neglected Era. By Edith Ross Braley. E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.00.

Blossomed Hours. By Edward H. Griggs. Orchard Hill Press. $2.00.

That Boy and Girl of Yours. By Wilbur F. Crafts. Baker & Taylor Co. $1.50.

Belief in Christ. By Charles Gore, D.D. Chas. Scribners Sons. $2.25.

Americans. By Stuart P. Sherman. Chas. Scribner's Sons. $2.00.

Stories by Mrs. Moresworth. Compiled by Sidney Baldwin. Duffield & Co. $3.50.

Stories by Juliana Horatia Ewing. Duffield & Co. $3.50.

Your and Yours. By Grace L. Morrill. Fleming H. Revell Co. $1.75.

Master Skylark. By John Bennett. The Century Co. $3.50.

The Lord of Thought. By Lily Dougall and Cyril W. Emmett. Geo. H. Doran Co. $2.50.

A Wonder Book. By Nathaniel Hawthorne. Geo. H. Doran Co. $4.00.

Gospel Truths. By J. E. Whitaker, D.D. United Lutheran Pub. House. $1.75.

Lesson Commentary for Lutheran Sunday Schools. By Wiles, Hunton and Smith. United Lutheran Pub. House. $1.75.

The Apostolic Age. By Wm. Bancroft Hill, D.D. Fleming H. Revell Co. $2.00.

The Meaning of Life. Rev. A. Edwin Keigwin, D.D. Geo. H. Doran Co. $1.50.

The First Christian School. By Otis Cary. Pilgrim Press. 50 cents.

The Evangelistic Encyclopedia. By Rev. A. B. F. Hallock. Geo. H. Doran Co. $3.00.

The Mind of the Master. By Rev. John Watson, D.D. (Ian Maclaren). Geo. H. Doran Co. $1.50.

The Gospel of the Sovereignty. By Rev. J. D. Jones, D.D. Geo. H. Doran Co. $1.75.

Self Healing Simplified. By George Lander Perin. Geo. H. Doran Co. $1.50.

Syllabus for Old Testament Study. By John R. Sampey, D.D. Geo. H. Doran Co. $2.00.

Jesus of Nazareth. By Geo. A. Barton, Ph.D. The Macmillan Co. $2.00.

The Influence of Modern Problems. By Various Writers. The Macmillan Co. $1.50.

The Religion of the Primitives. By Monsignor A. LeRoy. The Macmillan Co. $2.50.

Yellow Butterflies. By Mary R. Shipman Andrews. Chas. Scribners Sons. 75cents.

The Church at Play. By Norman E. Richardson. Abingdon Press. $1.50.

The Early Days of Christianity. By Frederick C. Grant. Abingdon Press. $1.75.

Problems in Pan Americanism. By Sam Guy Inman. Geo. H. Doran Co. $2.00.

Fury. By Edmund Goulding. Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.75.

A Fifth Avenue Parade and other poems. By Percy Stickney Grant. Harper & Bros. $1.50.

The Journal of John Woolman. By Amelia M. Gummere. Macmillan Co. $2.50.

Epistles to the Corinthians. By J. S. Riggs and H. L. Reed. Macmillan Co. $1.25.

The Orthodox Devil. By Mark G. Pearse. The Abingdon Press. $1.25.

The Early Days of Christianity. By Frederick C. Grant. The Abingdon Press. $1.75.

The Church at Play. By Norman E. Richardson. The Abingdon Press $1.25.

The Madonna of the Curb. By Anna Balmer Myers. Geo. W. Jacobs & Co. $1.75.

The Children's Six Minutes. By Bruce S. Wright. Geo. H. Doran Co. $1.25.

Bible Types of Modern Women. By Rev. W. M. Mackay, D.D. Geo. H. Doran Co. $1.50.

Bible Types of Modern Women, 2d Series. By Rev. W. M. Mackay, D.D. Geo. H. Doran Co. $1.50.

The Sunday School at Work in Town and Country. By Wm. M. Brabham. Geo. H. Doran Co. $1.50.

Where the Higher Criticism Fails. By W. H. Fitchett. Methodist Book Concern. $1.25.

Incentives in the New Industrial Order. By J. A. Hobson. Thomas Seltzer. $1.75.

VICTOR Portable STEREOPTICON

THE PERFECT LANTERN SLIDE PROJECTOR

SHIPPED ON APPROVAL THOUSANDS OF SLIDES FOR RENT OR FOR SALE

ASK FOR CATALOGUE AND TERMS

VICTOR ANIMATOGRAPH COINC.
276 VICTOR BLDG. BOSTON, MASS.

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y.
AND
220 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY
BELLS

Individual Cups

Every church should use. Clean and sanitary. Trial free. Thomas Communion Service Co. Box 432 Lima, Ohio

McSHANE BELL FOUNDRY CO. BALTIMORE MARYLAND
Church, Chime and Peal BELLS
Memorials a Specialty.

5,000 CHRISTIAN WORKERS WANTED

To sell Bibles, Testaments, good books and handsome velvet Scripture Mottos. Good commission. Send for free catalogue and price list.

GEORGE W. NOBLE, Publisher
Dept. No. 10, Monon Bldg. CHICAGO, ILL.

Revival CAMPAIGNS

Dr. T. M. Hofmeister
Greenfield, Ohio

COLLECTION ENVELOPES—8c per pack of 52, in Cartons (Also Storehouse Tithers' Envelopes) write Dufold Trifold Company, Asbury Park, N. J.

Tusculum

A thorough Christian-character-building College. Established 1794. Address

President O. O. GRAY, D. D., Greenville, Tenn.

UNIVERSITY BIBLE EDUCATION

at home. Prepare for fall and winter study. Finest books. Best courses. Hundreds studying. Catalogue free. Lose no time from your regular work. Write Prof. C. J. Burton, Bible University, Eugene, Ore.

The Woodlawn Cemetery

Is readily accessible by Harlem trains from Grand Central Station and by subway. Small lots at reasonable prices. Write or telephone (4855 Gramercy Park) for Book of Views or representative. Office 20 E. 23d st., New York City

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE

to sell those Wonderful California Herbs for Rheumatism. People from all over the U. S. have written us the last five years about the extraordinary results from these marvelous Herbs. Send for free booklet. Pound $1 postpaid.

RHEUMATISM HERB COMPANY,
SAWTELLE, CALIFORNIA

MANY USES FOR

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING

1. To locate some old book you would like to get.
2. To secure employment in church work or with a Christian concern.
3. To advertise your services as a sexton.

Classified Ads Cost but 3c a Word—

Minimum Order $1.00

When answering advertisements please mention the Christian Work

IRRESISTIBLE

JOIN OUR DELIGHTFUL "CHRISTIAN WORK" PARTY

On the Great White Star Line "S. S. Baltic" Summer Cruise to the Holy Land, Egypt, Turkey, Greece, Spain, Italy, Etc.

61 Days      $600 and Up

Starting June 27, 1923

A Surpassing Summer Vacation Opportunity

For Ministers, College Professors, Teachers and Business Men

IDEAL SUMMER WEATHER ON SHIP BOARD

With the Average Temperature on Shore lower than Boston, New York or St. Louis, Nights Cool. Practically no Humidity

Clark's 20th Cruise
to the Orient

STOP-OVERS IN EUROPE

Return tickets first class
good on Adriatic, Baltic,
Cedric, Celtic, etc.

Until
January 1, 1924

S. S. BALTIC

Luxurious White Star
Transatlantic Liner

S. S. BALTIC

23,876 tons register.
Three great promenade
decks — Sumptuous
Public Rooms, 24 Suites
with Private Bath.

The Climax of Luxurious
Travel

A FASCINATING ITINERARY

Madeira, Cadiz, Seville (Cordova, Granada and the Alhambra), Gibraltar, Algiers, Athens (Corinth, Eleusis), Haifa, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Bethany (Nazareth, Sea of Galilee, Samaria, etc.), Alexandria, Cairo, Naples, Pompeii, Aome (Capri, Sorrento, Amalfi), Monte Carlo, Cherbourg (Paris and the Battlefields, London, etc.), Liverpool to New York.

D. E. LORENZ, Ph.D., Author of "The Mediterranean Traveler" and Managing Director of Clark's Orient Cruise of 1922, and "Round the World" Cruise of 1923, is organizing a party of CHRISTIAN WORK readers. Why not take advantage of this remarkable opportunity and spend your vacation months visiting the most fascinating countries in the world? No travel worries—just rest and enjoyment. Rates include regular shore trips, landings, drives, guides, hotels, railroads, fees, etc.—everything first class.

We Invite Our Readers to Join Our Party

ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET (70 pages) AND SHIP DIAGRAM SENT FREE POSTPAID.

NOTE.—A few vacant rooms are available on our Mediterranean Cruise, Feb. 3, 1923, and on our Round the World Cruise, Jan. 22, 1923.

Address: Cruise Department, CHRISTIAN WORK

70 Fifth Ave., New York City

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

A Religious Weekly Review

JANUARY 13, 1923

---

The Churches and War

Rev. Frederick Lynch, D. D.

The American Negro

Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D. D.

Samuel C. Benson's Approach to New York

Rev. Henry Strong Huntington

The Public School and Free Institutions

Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis, D. D.

Serbia and the Serbians

Rev. Henry A. Atkinson, D. D.

An Italian's Experience in Smyrna

Theodore Bortoli

---

Three Dollars a Year

Ten Cents a Copy

Community Service Bulletin

Community Service has prepared a suggestive bulletin on the singing of Easter carols. As the first paragraph of the bulletin remarks: "The singing of carols at Christmas has been so successful and valuable as to suggest the wisdom of undertaking a similar movement at Easter. While Easter is more distinctly a church festival, it is one which commands great general interest and lends itself easily to community endeavor. The singing of Easter carols can do much to create a feeling of friendship and of common celebration of a great world idea. Since much of the celebration is centered in the church building, to which many people through illness or other reasons cannot go, the singing of carols at homes, hospitals and other institutions is particularly appropriate."

Those who are interested should send for the bulletin to Community Service (Incorporated), 1 Madison Avenue, New York.

THE COMMUNITY CHURCHMAN

A Monthly Magazine for all churchmen who are community minded

A working tool for every pastor and layman, informing, inspiring and helping him to make his church of larger social and spiritual service to his community.

Annual subscription price, $2.00

Rate to Ministers, $1.50

Single copies, 20 cents each.

HANDBOOK OF THE COMMUNITY CHURCH MOVEMENT

This Handbook (84 pages, paper-bound) contains concise information concerning the numbers, varieties, methods of organization and kinds of service of the community churches throughout the United States. Price 65 cents, postpaid.

Address, Dept. W

THE COMMUNITY CHURCHMAN
2822 Annette St., Indianapolis, Indiana

"Both Capital and Labor would do well to give good heed to its emphasis on the Principles of Vocation and Fraternity." The Expository Times.

THE RETURN OF CHRISTENDOM

BY VARIOUS WRITERS
Introduction by Canon Gore

The authors find the elements of a distinctive Christian sociology, needed to check the work of disintegration now going on, implicit in the Catholic Faith. $1.75
"Their exposition of the Faith would meet with warm approval in every Church in Christendom."—The Expository Times (Edinburg.)

The World's Great Religious Poetry.

Compiled by Caroline Miles Hill, Ph. D.
12 mo. 876 pages

A well-balanced collection of religious poems classified under a rather detailed analysis, helpful and really valuable in itself, and supplemented by indices to facilitate reference. $5.00

The Religion of Science

By William H. Wood, (Dartmouth)

The book that "you have" been looking for. Gives science its due but keeps it in its place; and, then, goes on to vindicate the right of revealed religion on continued supremacy in human life. $1.50

"Distinctly new."—Reformed Church Messenger.

"A cool analysis of the facts which shows the religion of science will not work."—The Continent.

"First-rate apologetic for those who regard the metaphysical work of physical scientists as destructive of all religious values."—President Charles M. Jacobs, Lutheran Theological Seminary.

Matter and Spirit

By James Bissett Pratt

Author of "The Religious Consciousness"
A professor of philosophy of world standing boldly champions the psychology of the Bible as to the nature and constitution of man. A body blow to materialism. $1.50

The Influence of the Church on Modern Problems.

1923 CHURCH CONGRESS PAPERS

Men of differing opinions discuss seven big problems with the object of bringing the various schools of thought in the Church into sympathetic relationship. $1.50

The Church in America

By William Adams Brown

"Christian union halts for the lack of a convincing doctrine of the Church. A systematic theologian more interested in the living present than the dead past has wrought out here a fresh doctrine through observation of contemporaneous religious institutions."—The Christian Century. $3.00

"Profoundly valuable."—From a full page editorial in the Congregationalist.

The Reconstruction of Religion

By Charles A. Ellwood

Only an unusual volume on this subject would win the superlative praise of both clergy and University professors.

Highly endorsed by Bishops Mitchell, Nicholson, McConnell and Lines; and by George A. Coe, S. Z. Batten, S. Parkes Cadman, Foster Kent, etc. And by these University Professors: Giddings of Columbia, Small of Syracuse, Ross of Wisconsin, Cooley of Michigan, Hocking of Harvard, Stanley Hall of Clark, etc. $2.25

The Art of Preaching

By Dean Charles R. Brown

(Lyman Beecher Lectures, 48th Series)
"One of the ablest preachers in America describes the mighty opportunity of the preacher with delightful humanness of style."—Southern Churchman.

"Direct, instructive and helpful addresses on preaching the Gospel."—Herald and Presbyter. $1.75

Jesus of Nazareth

By George A. Barton Ph. D., LL. D.

First published Dec., 1922. Cloth 12mo.
400 pages. $2.00

If your school has never tried it, see the difference it will make to put personal copies of this book in the hands of a class of high school age that compares favorably with the text books used by them in History, Rhetoric, etc.

Not much of the biographer and a great deal of biography about this life of Jesus.

The Idea of God

By Clarence A. Beckwith

Professor of Christian Theology (Chicago)
"Perfectly at home in all branches of modern thinking related to his problem. Shows convincingly that belief in a personal God is, again, possible to the average modern mind."—Christian Intelligencer.

"Fair to the new thought, yet faithful to the good things in the old—coming from a theological seminary it is one of the signs of the times."—Boston Transcript. $2.50

The Freedom of the Preacher

By William Pierson Merrill

(Beecher Lectures for 1922)

"For common sense and genuine helpfulness equal to any of their illustrious predecessors."—Watchman-Examiner. $1.25

"If you are an intelligent layman you will read this book so that you may respect your pastor's job."—The Christian World.

Items for Your Next Order

Kresge: The Church and the Ever-Coming Kingdom of God.....	$2.25	Galer: Old Testament Law for Bible Students.....	1.25
Bull: Preaching and Sermon Construction.....	2.50	Coffin: What Is There in Religion?.....	1.25
Rogers: The Theory of Ethics.....	1.50	Jones: Spiritual Energies in Daily Life.....	1.50
Shannon: The Country Faith.....	1.00	Drury: The Thoughts of Youth.....	1.25
Gulick: The Christian Crusade For a Warless World.....	Paper .75	Gulick: The Christian Crusade For a Warless World.....	Paper .75
Jess: World.....	Cloth 1.00	Jones: Is There a God?.....	1.25

64-66 Fifth Avenue

The Macmillan Company

New York City

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY

Its work is interdenominational evangelical and international in scope and is commended by all the churches. It has published the Gospel message in 178 languages dialects and characters. Its colporters meet the immigrants with Christian literature in many languages, and also visit the spiritually destitute. In the Spanish and Portuguese languages, chiefly for Latin America, there have been issued 16,012,088 copies of volumes, tracts and periodicals. Its literature in the native dialects has been the strong right arm of foreign missions. Its benevolent work is dependent upon donations and legacies.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS HALL, President.
REV. EDWIN NOAH HARDY, Ph.D.,
Gen. Sec.

Donations may be sent direct to American Tract Society, 101 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Communion Ware of Quality

Best materials. Finest workmanship
ALUMINUM or SILVER PLATE
Send for Illustrated Catalog with
REDUCED PRICES

INDIVIDUAL COMMUNION SERVICE CO.
Room 304 1701-1703 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE AMERICAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY

76 Wall Street, New York

(Incorporated April, 1833)

The only American un denominational, international and national Society aiding seamen.

Maintains a Sailors' Home and Institute at 507 West Street, New York City.

Places loan libraries ($25) on vessels sailing from New York.

Publishes the Sailors' Magazine, $1.00.

Supported by contributions and legacies.

JOHN B. CALVERT, D.D., President.

GEORGE SIDNEY WEBSTER, D.D., Sec'y.

Send contributions to CLARENCE C. PINNEO,
Treasurer, 76 Wall Street, New York.

THE ORIGINAL VEST-POCKET HELP TORREY'S

Gist of the Lesson

FAMOUS "GIST" FEATURES

Lesson Text in Full. Changes in Revised Version Noted.
Emphasized Words and Dates Given as Accepted.
Phrases in Black Face. Exposition of Lesson.
Type. Condensation of Thought. Prayer Meeting Topics.
Flexible Binding, 35c postpaid

F. H. REVELL CO., 153 Felt Ave., New York, 17 N. Wabash Ave., Chicago

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

CONTINUING

THE EVANGELIST AND NEW YORK OBSERVER

Vol. 114.—No. 2

January 13, 1923

Whole No. 3005

CONTENTS

WORLD OF TODAY.....	35
EDITORIALS:
The Churches and War: Rev. Frederick Lynch, D.D.	39
The American Negro: Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D.D....	40
EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE:
Samuel C. Benson's Approach to New York: Rev. Henry S. Huntington .....	42
OBSERVER'S LETTER:
Expository Preaching .....	45
THE WEEKLY SERMON:
The Public School and Free Institutions: Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis, D.D.....	46
GENERAL:
The Church and Recreation: Rev. Roy P. Guild.....	50
Serbia and the Serbians: Rev. Henry A. Atkinson, D.D.	52
An Italian's Experience in Smyrna: Theodore Bortoli	55
INDEX:
July-December, 1922 .....	59

THE CHRISTIAN WORK: Published weekly: 10 cents a copy, $3.00 a year in the United States, $3.52 in Canada, and $4.04 in all other countries (postage included.)

Publication and circulation office, 45 Willard Avenue, Providence, R. I. Editorial and advertising office, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Subscriptions may be forwarded to either of the above offices.

Entered as second class matter November 18, 1922, at the U. S. post-office, Providence, R. I. under the act of March 3, 1879.

Printed in U. S. A.—Published by The Christian World, Inc., Frederick Lynch, President; Henry Strong Huntington, Vice-President; Benson Y. Landis, Secretary-Treasurer.

Printed by Norman C. Lynch Co., Incorporated 45 Willard Ave., Providence, R. I.; 70 Fifth Ave., New York.

The World of To-day

SOUND SENSE ON THE I. W. W.

Whenever there develops among us a considerable body of opinion quite at variance with that which most of us hold, our first duty toward it is to endeavor to put ourselves in the place of this minority in order that we may come to understand the reason for this view. Only then can we gauge its justice and only then, too, are we prepared to bring those whom we may regard as mistaken to a more intelligent view. We are in particular need of such a reasonable approach in dealing with so-called "radicals." A recent letter from Rev. Charles W. Lathrop, Executive Secretary of the Department of Christian Social Service of the Protestant Episcopal Church, is an excellent illustration of the spirit which we need. "The backbone of the I. W. W. and Communist movement," he wrote, "is the part of our community who make up casual labor. Casual labor means laborers who are drawn into employment when times are good and factories are busy. The minute the demand falls off and the factories are less busy these are the men who are out of work. Seasonal labor in the harvest periods contributes another quota to casual labor. * * * Casual laborers have to move from place to place. They have no opportunity to establish a home or to anchor themselves in any normal, human life. They tend to become the tramps and 'vagrants.' No one can say that they get a really square deal. As a consequence of their hard experience, these men are easily persuaded that the industrial system which produces these conditions is wrong, and they are ready to follow those who demand that it be changed. * * * This whole situation ought to be studied and these men should be dealt with sympathetically. Instead of that, they are harassed and hounded and their bitterness grows deeper. It is a fundamental ideal of our democracy that violence, which has accompanied revolution in autocratically governed nations, can no longer be justified as a necessary method of defending human rights. * * * Suppression of freedom of speech is an offence against this fundamental feature of democracy. Without freedom of speech, history shows that men regard violence as the only means of protest against social injustice. It is to prevent violence that I am speaking with all the vigor that I can command for the protection of the right of free speech and free assemblage. It is for this reason that I object to Syndicalist laws, whereby men are jailed not because they have wronged the community or their fellow-citizens, but because they are members of organizations which are protesting against what they consider to be injustice. This country would be in no danger of violence if we maintained our original ideal of civil liberties." Dean Lathrop's is the thoroughly Christian approach to the situation.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

POLITICAL PRISONERS

The matter of release of political prisoners still drags. During the summer the President told a representative committee of citizens who called on him concerning this matter that he expected to have all the data necessary to a disposition of the remaining cases in his hands within sixty days. It appears that there was a misunderstanding in government circles in regard to the time limit and a recent report from the Department of Justice indicated that the necessary summaries of the evidence in many of the cases had not been completed.

A resolution urging action in this matter was passed by the Conference of Progressives held in Washington, December 2, under the auspices of the People's Legislative Service. In the aggregate a great deal has been said and done in the interest of the men who remain in jail because of their opposition to the war. The effort has apparently not been organized in such a way as to impress Washington. The following editorial from the New York Evening Post for December 20 seems to summarize the real sentiment on this question:

"The fourth Christmas since the close of the war might well be made the occasion for release of the sixty-two men still held in prison under the espionage law. These men have already been confined longer than those who were convicted of plotting against the Government or of being German spies. All of the European countries have long since freed the prisoners detained under their war-time laws. In England the sentences for such offences did not exceed six months; in the other Allied nations amnesty was declared within fourteen months after the armistice. None of our prisoners is being punished for an act of violence. Their offence was an expression of opinion in violation of an emergency law which now has been obsolete for the length of a full Presidential term. Some of these men, in the words of an army officer, were 'convicted in a wave of hysteria.' They were opposed to the war. Their opposition was limited to an expression of opinion. The war is over. Let them go."

THE ADMINISTRATION'S OBJECTIONS TO THE BORAH PLAN

Last week a letter from President Harding to Senator Lodge was published, in which the President declared his opposition to Senator Borah's proposition for an international conference on the economic situation and on further limitation of armaments. The President pointed out that Congress had as yet made no provision for the United States to be represented on the Reparation Commission. We cannot be so represented without the express action of Congress. Congress also, in setting up the World War Debt Finding Commission stipulated that the interest on the funds owed should be four and one-half per cent and that the debts should be liquidated in twenty-five years. "If," wrote the President, "Congress really means to facilitate the task of the Government in dealing with the European situation, the first practical step would be to free the hands of the commission so that helpful negotiations may be undertaken. * * * In discussions with foreign Governments, the previous Administration and the present Administration have insisted that the question of European debts to the United States is distinct and apart from the question of reparations, but European nations hold a contrary view, and it is wholly inconsistent to invite a conference for the consideration of questions in dealing with which the Government is denied all authority by act of Congress." With respect to the other two topics suggested by Senator Borah for the conference, the President commented:

So far as the limitation of land armaments is concerned, there seems to be at this time no more promising prospect of accomplishment than when the conference was held in Washington a year ago. Here, again, I venture to warn the Senate against the suggestion to our own people or a gesture of promise to the world which cannot be fulfilled until the nations directly concerned express their readiness to co-operate to such an end.

With respect to a limitation of auxiliary types of naval craft, which are not limited by the present naval treaty, it is to be said that such an agreement is much to be desired, whenever practicable, but we may reasonably postpone our further endeavors along that line until the agreements made at the Washington Conference secure the final sanction of all Governments concerned.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S PLAN

In the course of the Senate debate the next day after President Harding's letter was made public it transpired that the Administration had already entered into "conversations" with the European powers "with a view," as Senator Lodge put it, "to ascertaining on the part of this Government whether there was anything this Government could properly do to improve financial (i. e. economic) conditions in Europe." On Senator Lodge's assurance that he believed Senator Borah's proposition if passed would be harmful to these negotiations, the latter withdrew it. Later in the day, the Administration at Washington and Secretary Hughes in a speech at New Haven made the Administration's plans clearer. The Administration sums up its recent activities in regard to the international situation about as follows. Our representatives have expressed to the allied Governments the hope that the conference of allied Premiers at Paris on January 2 for the purpose of attempting to reach an accord on the question of German reparations will not end abortively. Our government has suggested that should the allied Premiers fail to devise an amicable adjustment of the reparations problem, the governments concerned (including the United States, if desired) shall designate eminent financial experts to meet in conference, survey the economic situation of Europe and particularly of Germany and submit a report stating the amount which in the opinion of these international financiers the German Government is able to pay to its victorious ex-enemies. The United States further suggests that the financial conference shall devise a plan of financing Germany so that France and other nations will be assured of reparations payments without being compelled to wait for a long period. The allied debt to the United States is not to be considered by the financial conference in its plan of adjustment of the reparations problem. The United States Government will not issue invitations to this conference if its suggestion that such a conference be held is accepted by the powers concerned, and it is not willing that the conference shall be held in Washington or elsewhere on American territory, believing that the questions involved are purely European questions. But we are ready to designate American financial experts for participation in the proposed conference should such American participation be desired by the allied experts. The plan is most hopeful.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

HEALTH AND RELIGION

In another column of this issue we tell something of the interest in faith healing excited among English Free Churchmen by Samuel Benson on his recent visit to London. Probably every one believes that if we followed out the will of God we should be in far better health than is the average "civilized" person today. And on behalf of the human race we welcome every discovery of means of healing. So far as Christian Science "works" we welcome it. That does not mean that we accept the explanation of the Christian Scientists as to why it works. The fact and the explanation are wholly separate. The reasons for Christian Science cures may have nothing to do with Christian Science vernacular and patter. It is clear that auto-suggestion "works" often, as M. Coue's records prove. Some people, certainly, have been helped by the Emanuel treatment and by Hickson and by the "Bible healing" of which Dr. Benson talks. It is perfectly true that we need to get our minds into the attitude of health and faith. Taking recovery and health for granted helps to insure recovery and health. But is not a chief trouble with us that we are, in general, in unstable equilibrium nervously? As the doctors all agree, we are living "unnatural" lives. After the new baby was born in one of our neighbor's homes the other day, the father observed to the doctor that he believed in trusting to nature completely, if possible, in such a natural episode as birth. "But," the doctor retorted, "in these days of corsets and high heels and steam heat and rich food and late hours, how can you expect to be able to trust to nature?" Curiously enough it apparently did not occur to the doctor that it was his function to educate people against "corsets and high heels and steam heat and rich food and late hours."

GOD'S WAY OF HEALTH

If we are to expect good health, must we not in fairness first of all conform to the customs and modes of life that, by their results of strength and vigor, prove themselves to be after the mind of God? In "Physical Culture" recently a woman told the physical rejuvenation which came to her as the result of following the customs of a tribe of British Columbian Indians with whom she chanced to be thrown. She was a physical invalid when she came among them. She adopted the Indian woman's dress, a single thickness of cloth over the body, discarded stockings, put on the soft Indian moccasins, bathed in the sea unclad every morning, lived outdoors, slept in a shack open on two sides to the outdoors. She tells a marvelous story of recovery of health and cheer. Dentists agree that if we ate food that was harder to chew, tougher meat, fresh vegetables, whole wheat bread, we should have better teeth, and better digestions. One might speak of a score of aspects of life in which we are not living physically according to what study and investigation and experience prove to be the will of God for us. Let us first conform to these obvious commands for human health. Let us order our lives to accord with God's will for the body. When we do so, a very great proportion of our ills will disappear. Then we can tell better what need there is for Christian Science or the Emanuel Movement or Bible Healing.

ARMENIA AT LAUSANNE

In default of action by any other of the participants in the Lausanne Conference, America has laid before that body the projects for an Armenian National Home. Ambassador Child reported the American action in the following words:

The American delegation, though not negotiating a peace treaty nor submitting definite plans for adjustments to which the United States Government cannot become a signatory, has stated to the conference its full approval of the demand of Lord Curzon and the other allied statesmen for any practicable plan for a national Armenian home and for the acceptance of such a plan. The American delegation has sought and obtained the views of those who represent the movement in the United States for a national Armenian home, and who may be considered representative experts upon the subject, and has laid these views before the conference today. * * * * We have contributed and will continue to contribute to the insistence that Turkey shall give consideration to any practicable, concrete plan which may be put forward.

The project for an Armenian National Home submitted by the Americans was put in shape by Dr. George R. Montgomery, director of the Armenia America Society. It provides that the Armenians should receive some eighteen thousand square miles in the region about Alexandretta at the northeast corner of the Mediterranean. This National Home should be autonomous, under the jurisdiction of the League of Nations, its safety guaranteed by the powers. The district suggested for it was put under a French mandate after the war and was referred to officially by the French as Armenia. The first of the Allied soldiers to occupy it were the Legion d'Orient of the French Army, renamed the Armenian Legion after the Armistice. When the French made peace with Angora, they surrendered this region to the Nationalist Turks, with never a word to the League of Nations—witness that the French government has completely failed to understand the essential idea of a mandate.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

THE PROSPECTS FOR AN ARMENIAN NATIONAL HOME

Dr. Montgomery suggested at the conference that Great Britain might placate the Turks for the virtual loss of this territory by accepting an arrangement for Turkey to receive territory of corresponding size in the Mesopotamia region. As for Armenian population for the new National Home, there would be on hand immediately from two to three hundred thousand refugees, including fifteen thousand refugees in Constantinople, one hundred ten thousand in the Smyrna region, and fifty thousand orphans who are being cared for by Americans. What is the prospect of Turkey's accepting the proposition? America's position at Lausanne is greatly weakened because we are not full members of the conference. The day before the Armenian Home project was brought up, Ambassador Child stated the American position in regard to amnesty for Turkish subjects. Riza Nur Bey, the extreme Nationalist member of the Turkish delegation, rejoined, "The Turkish delegation protests in principle against any discussion of any American proposition, since we regard the American delegates as simple observers." One of the Turkish delegates said to Edwin L. James, the New York Times correspondent at Lausanne, "If the Americans send a fleet with one hundred thousand men to the Gulf of Alexandretta to demand a home for the Armenians we will fight it out with you. If you send two hundred thousand we will kiss your hands and give you your Armenian home. But these are about the only methods by which you can get us to give up a slice of our richest farming territory, which would cut the Bagdad Railway." One Turk ironically remarked that the Turks would make a counter proposal that America establish a safe National Home for the Negroes in Texas (where they might be free from lynching.) But these are by no means the last words on the subject. If the other powers, or probably even if Great Britain alone gave Turkey to understand that no peace would be consummated until the National Home was established, and that Turkey would never receive Constantinople until she accepted the plan, there is no question but that the Turks would yield in time. The present conference might break up, the Turks might make trouble for the English in the Mosul region, but they would not permanently sacrifice Constantinople—and Eastern Thrace—for the sake of a few thousand square miles. It is beyond question that the English are ready to stand with the Americans. But America should let the Turks know that we will never make a treaty with them until the Armenian National Home is a reality and there is adequate provision for the permanent safety of the Greek and Assyrian minorities. Nor must we sign any treaty with Turkey until she has provided for reparations for the survivors of the people whom she has robbed of house and home and every last shred of property. If the peace of the world cannot be secured until Germany is honestly paying reparations, no more can it be secured until Turkey begins to do justice to the people whom she has been beating and raping and pillaging and murdering. Let America put humanity before profit. As we have said before, if the Turks knew that not one dollar of American capital would enter Turkey until the Armenian National Home was assured, they would ere long sing another song. The business men of this country today could do nothing more effective than to let the State Department know that they make this same demand,—make no treaty with Turkey until the Armenian National Home is assured. A word from the Standard Oil to that effect would have great weight. So would such a word from the Guaranty Trust. So would such a word from the leaders of the Chambers of Commerce. The men who head these organizations believe that the claims of humanity outrank those of material personal profits. In many cases they are the very same men as those who lead in philanthropy. If Washington knew that it had the support of business as well as of the Church in standing absolutely for the Armenian National Home, it would undoubtedly do so. It ought to do so in any case whether or not it was urged so to do by either churches or chambers of commerce. The country only longs to have an Administration whose courage for the sake of human life shall command its enthusiastic honor.

Builders' Conference at Hampton Institute

Under the auspices of its newly organized Department of Building Construction, Hampton Institute will hold its first annual Builders' Conference the last three days of this month. The conference will give colored builders an opportunity to keep abreast of developments in the field of building, to see demonstrations of new materials, methods and machinery, to receive instruction from experts, and to meet, for the exchange of ideas and experiences, other men who have had valuable experience. Some of the best known architects and builders in the country will speak to the conference.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

EDITORIAL STAFF

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

Frederick Lynch

ASSOCIATE EDITOR

Henry Strong Huntington

MANAGING EDITOR

Benson Y. Landis

LITERARY EDITOR

Tertius Van Dyke

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Edmund de Schweinitz Brunner

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT

Violette Reynolds

CONTRIBUTING STAFF

Henry A. Atkinson	Sidney L. Gulick
Peter Ainslie	Rufus M. Jones
Hugh Black	E. Guy Talbott
S. Parkes Cadman	T. Rhondda Williams

EDITORIAL COUNCIL

Nehemiah Boynton	George Foster Peabody
Williams Adams Brown	George A. Plimpton
Howard Duffield	Howard C. Robbins
Sherwood Eddy	Fred B. Smith
Irving Fisher	Cornelius Woelfkin
J. W. Johnson	Shailer Mathews

Charles S. Macfarland

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS

Austria: Professor Carl Beth
 Canada: Dr. J. Lovell Murray
 Czechoslovakia: Professor Francis Zilka
 France: Rev. Professor Wilfred Monod
 Germany: Direktor A. Hinderer
 Great Britain: Rev. Sidney M. Berry
 Hungary: Dr. S. Szabo
 Switzerland: Pastor Adolf Keller

The Churches and War

FOUR years have passed since the signing of the Armistice. Everybody looked to the Peace Conference to give us a new world wherein would dwell righteousness, joy and peace. The war itself was being waged to end war and establish an international order based on law and the common good. Our high hopes have all been dashed to earth. War and rumors of war still persist and those suspicions, jealousies and hatreds that are as bad as war cover the earth. National selfishness and the spirit of revenge have not passed away. The community of good will which was to supersede a world of selfish, individualistic states has not come. The discouragement of the world is great. Europe is living in a state of fear. The unrest borders upon chaos. No one knows when the great cataclysm may approach.

And yet, all over the world, among all peoples, there is such an abhorrence of war and desire for brotherhood as no previous generation has witnessed. This is the hopeful side. In every nation people are yearning for a new world based on justice, brotherhood, co-operation and good-will. They turn eagerly to any source that holds out promise of this new order—the League of Nations; the Conference on Delimitation of Armaments; the World Court; the Conferences of the Churches. It is pathetic the eagerness with which the people set their hopes upon these attempts at the common life of nations.

Never has the feeling that war in its essence is un-Christian been so firmly held or so universally expressed as during the last two years. This protest grows with astounding rapidity. It comes from Great Britain in the great movement called forth by Dr. Jowett's challenge to the Churches. It comes from Germany in the "No More War" movement. It comes from Copenhagen where many Christians of many faiths communed together. It has come from America in the utterances of the Federal Council, the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches, from national conventions, and from many local congregations. The consciousness of war as an anachronism in the Kingdom of God is more and more possessing the people. It is difficult to put Jesus Christ and poison gas into the same sentence. The Church is everywhere at last insisting that nations are bound in all their relationships by the same Christian principles that underlie the relationships of individuals. There can be only one ethic, one moral law, one Christian principle applicable equally to men and nations.

This protest against war by the Churches is the most encouraging sign of the times. But it is not enough in itself. The Church of Christ must go further and insist on that association of nations in some community of good-will which will remove fear from the hearts of the weaker nations, and which will substitute Christian organization for the arbitrament of force, and which will make possible that simultaneous delimitation of armament for which all good men pray. What form this world organization shall permanently take we do not know. Already fifty-one states have made a beginning in the League of Nations. The Conference on the Delimitation of Armaments was a step in this direction, and for it we extend our hearty gratitude to the President of the United States. The World Court is another step in this direction and we warmly welcome the intimation from President Harding and Secretary Hughes that the United States is to have full part in its constitution and deliberations. But we believe the time has come when the United States should go further. Mr. Harding promised us that this country would soon be in association with the rest of the nations bearing its full share of the burdens of the world and taking its place in the councils of the nations. This has not come to pass, and meantime great crimes against humanity are wilfully perpetrated, as in the Near East and we are voiceless; great problems call for solution, problems created by a war that was our war also, and we take no part in their solution. We feel as the disciples of Him who was Lord of the Kingdoms as well as of human souls, that the time has come for our country immediately to take full part in all the councils of the nations and either to associate herself actively and officially with the present League under such modifications as will protect our constitutional rights, or to call upon the nations to join with her in some association which shall immediately convene to take some great Christian step toward healing the sores of the world; halting such national iniquities as now disgrace our civilization, and laying foundations for a new world order where all disputes shall be adjusted by peaceable judicial methods and force be gradually displaced by Christian trust and mutual endeavor for a happy world.

EDITORIAL

This has nowhere been expressed more concisely and we believe more forcibly than in the following words uttered by the Federal Council a year ago:

"There is one way and only one way to outlaw war. We must first establish a peace system. Mere disarmament by itself alone will not stop war. Only the firm establishment of the institutions and agencies of justice and of liberty under law, maintained by effective sanctions at the hands of law-abiding and peace-loving nations, can possibly banish war from this war-cursed world. The most urgent need of mankind today is the speedy establishment of international institutions to assure equal justice, full security and fair economic opportunity for all nations alike. These are essential prerequisites to permanent peace."

The situation in the Near East has moved the whole world to indignation and to impatience. It was one of those horrible iniquities that need not have been. Unfortunately the one restraining voice was absent from the Council of Nations. It is quite universally felt that had the United States lifted her voice at the right time in concert with other voices, that neither Greece nor Turkey would have entered upon the steps that have led to inexpressible suffering and the reinstatement in Europe of a merciless power. Again we call upon our government to protest against such iniquities. We do not ask for war. We believe the one thing that will make war unnecessary is that our nation should sit in the Council of the Nations and say: "These things shall not be." We resent the attitude that Armenians and other stricken people are not our neighbors. Neighborhood is not a matter of distance, but of need and common sonship in God. We do not ask our nation to mix in foreign politics, but we do affirm that the massacre of innocents, violation of women, the exiling of old men and women and the burning of cities are not politics but humanity. Why is not the slaughter of Armenians, the establishment of the unmentionable Turk in ruthless power, as much the concern of America as of Great Britain? It is the concern of all humanity. Again we would ask that our government participate in any council dealing with the Near East, casting her voice and vote on the side of humanity and righteousness.

F. L.

The American Negro

SAIN'T PAUL, the foremost of God's ambassadors, and the founder of Western Christianity, declared that in Christ his living Lord, the whole creation was renegade, new and transformed.

According to the glorious apostle who formerly had been a bigoted and persecuting Judaizer, in the Christian ordering of life there is no race distinction, no prejudice of color or condition, no servitude, no snobbery, no arrogance, no German deity, no American supremacy, no British superiority exists in simon-pure Christianity. Its Prince and Savior is all, and in all; and all men are one in Him. What do the so-called Christian nations have to say in response to this challenging ideal? They have seldom if ever realized it. Their political practice has usually been far below the demands. The few instances when they have displayed its restraining virtues were clamorously denounced by professed followers of Christ as betrayals of national interests or of national honor. Undoubtedly the peoples of the Orient and our own negro citizens have received some benefits from Christian Powers, but they have also endured numerous injuries. Had not Africa lain at the feet of the white man there might have been no slavery in the United States or in the British dominions, or on the Spanish Main. The opium traffic was forced upon China by England's gunboats. Russia waged war against Japan at the bidding of a court camarilla. These flagrantly open injuries have disrupted humanity and the veriest dullard is aware of the gigantic ills that ensued. The Civil War here, wars and rumors of wars elsewhere, the defeat of Spain in the New World, the downfall of the Czaristic Empire are largely traceable to the wrongs and oppressions inflicted by racial hatred and nationalistic greed. Unless the white race repents of its wickednesses and sincerely accepts and practices the humanity and brotherhood of the New Testament, it will, in my judgment, eventually be expelled from the Orient. Should it resist expulsion the probabilities are that a world war of unparalleled dimensions will be fought to the finish. Educated Orientals who influence their fellow-countrymen no longer reverence cultivated Europeans and Americans. The recovery of our damaged prestige will not be made by steam roller methods. Yet how narrowly the United States has recently escaped hostilities against Japan, and how little we have to thank our chauvinistic press that we have escaped them! How slender is Britain's hold on India! How just were some petitions of Korea, China and Egypt to the Versailles Conference! How heedlessly they were ignored or rejected! Who, then, can say that the white race will be wise enough to get safely beyond the catastrophic period? When the Japanese delegates sat stern and silent in council while their late allies swept aside their plea for racial equality, an observant onlooker registered their ominous bearing. They will not soon forget that painful defeat of the justice which is Christianity's real strength. It is urged that whatever are the faults and crimes of Western civilization, at least it is capable of progress. But the typical American or Briton who wishes to be the cause of as many changes as possible in his environment makes a fetish of progress and adores it even when it is no more than the ethical camouflage of his burning desire for constant change. He glories in the scientific method of life, whereas the typical Chinaman, says Dr. Bertrand Russell, has a far more ethical conception of the ends of life. This distinction which separates East and West far more effectively than we suppose, will have to be recognized by those who have substituted pagan for Christian conceptions of races and nations.

EDITORIAL

Much I have said applies to the American negro. In the language of Senator Calder, "Every colored man and woman in this Republic, and millions of its white citizens, believe that the negro, wherever he lives within our boundaries, is entitled to justice and fair play at all times, no matter what the provocation may be." These are the sentiments of true religion and of true statesmanship. The Americans who are not willing to identify themselves with them and to include the honest, industrious negro in the range of their good will are not loyal adherents of democracy. In defense of his reaction, the white rebel against democracy asserts that the negro is addicted to race consciousness. Granting that the assertion is true, is race consciousness an unpardonable offense, and if so, who is guiltless of it? I submit that such a consciousness, as distinguished from racial pride, tyranny and exaction, is as proper and seemly as personal self-respect. If it be true, and I think it is true, that since the World War the negro has shown an intensified desire to assert his rights, I for one am content that he should do this so long as he also asserts his duties with his rights.

Nothing can be permanently done for people who have lost self-confidence and self-courage. The resolution to overcome difficulties and to achieve meritorious success depends upon a due respect for one's self and for one's race. Why, then, should the negro be penalized for traits which we extoll in the white man? It is highly important that those traits shall be directed by moral motives and toward moral ends. Provided they are thus directed, the negro is justified in his ambition to become what his Creator intends him to be—a man, erect, candid, two-handed, capable, self-supporting, and as such a valuable asset to the home and the community. In these relations he is legally and morally entitled to the fraternal intercourse of his fellow citizens. I shall not comment at length upon the almost insuperable obstacles which the negro has had to encounter. Captured by armed bands in his native habitation, carried in chains across the seas on slave ships which were floating hells; crushed by laborious tasks; starved, beaten, warned not to conceive himself a human; segregated in disease-ridden quarters, charged with indecency and non-social conduct while existing under conditions which destroyed decency and social conduct, his annals in this free land of ours are its reproach and its tragedy. Part of the divine account against us for our treatment of him was paid in the strife of sixty years ago. A further settlement is inevitable unless we put into active and effectual working those measures of equity and benevolence which are intrinsic in a genuinely democratic government.

The incentive to insist on a "square deal" for the negro is furthered by his remarkable advance since emancipation. In 1866 he owned but twelve thousand homes in the country; today he owns six hundred thousand homes. Fifty-three years ago he operated less than twenty thousand farms; today he operates exclusively more than a million farms. One year after Lincoln's death the negro conducted two thousand one hundred business establishments. Today he conducts fifty thousand of these establishments. There was no regular schooling for his children when Lee and Grant met at Appomattox. Now forty thousand negro schools have been built, with an attendance of one million eight hundred thousand children and an annual expenditure of $15,000,000 for education. Nearly fifty thousand churches minister to the negro's religious needs. They have a membership of five million adults and young people, and represent an investment of $85,000,000. These statistics are unequaled for magnitude and significance in the history of any similarly enslaved race since time began. Consider the Israelites, who knew the bitterness of human bondage, and filled their early records with their tears. Yet they did not inherit as much during their first five hundred years of residence in the Promised land as the negro has created in the last half century by his own arduous efforts in this land. How much more he might have created had his struggle against a hard fate been sooner welcomed and aided by his white brother!

But the tide of passion and ignorance against him is on the ebb. North and South, Christian-minded people and generous men and women of the Hebrew race are bent upon his betterment. The Georgia Plan for the settlement of racial troubles by having in every county in that great State a committee of pacification consisting of both white and colored members is a most timely and wise arrangement. The Urban League of this Boro of Brooklyn insists that we shall work, not as colored people, not as white people, for the narrower interests of any single group, but "together," as American citizens, for the common good of our common city and our common country. In other words, as Mr. W. H. Baldwin puts the case, "The Urban League offers to the negro a platform on which he can stand as an equal, and join with his white neighbors in making the whole community a better, cleaner place in which to live." He is not to be scorned as an animal and an outcast, nor to be humiliated by senseless doles and benefactions. On the contrary, he is to be regarded by us as a fellow being, with like responsibilities and claims, and his point of view, his influence, his assistance are earnestly solicited for the increase of the general welfare.

EDITORIAL

Let us suppose that this platform is rejected by extremists of both races. The alternatives are that the negro will either sink into inertia and sullen discontent or else build up his own organizations for improvement. In both cases he remains isolated, and the isolation is anything but healthy for us all. What temporary advantages he may secure will be at the sacrifice of constructive contact with the whites. Nor does it need great prevision to detect in that isolation abundant material for further race friction. One could scarcely censure the negro if he decided to go forward independently. He has been rebuffed, cheated, made the pawn of politicians and the butt of dishonest tradesmen and landlords. If a colored Sinn Fein should start and prosper and undoubtedly reasons could be adduced in its behalf—it would be a dangerous development. Yet how can we expect the negro to act reasonably and take a far-sighted stand while the whites play blind man's buff on this issue?

How many negroes in this and other cities are up and doing with men like Dr. Proctor, William Elzy, Mr. Baldwin and with the splendid Georgia Plan for Racial Betterment? Surely there is no need of race hatred in this republic. The best men and women of both races involved should combine against their common enemy. And he is that man, be he black or white, who sows disaffection, contempt, calumny and lies. In this relation I advise you to procure and read the Report on the Chicago Race Riots issued by the committee appointed by ex-Governor Lowden. Mark how in that disgraceful episode yellow journalism, foul quarters, bad housing and the plunderbunds which rob the negro played a principal part. The old dodge of suppressing these causes of serious trouble will not serve again. To punish the negro for defending himself and his home against wanton and unprovoked attacks is a sure way of arousing the slow but inevitable and righteous wrath of the American people. Our Southern brethren are increasingly determined to end the lynchings which have stained the annals with barbarism and butchery. Our Northern brethren are nonplussed and outraged by those ferocious exhibitions of animus against the negro from which they were wont to think themselves immune. Unless the States, North or South, cleanse themselves of this iniquity of lynching, the Anti-Lynch law will be made sternly effectual against those whose unspeakable savageries have made Americans blush for their nation. Public sentiment is crystallizing on this question, and the economic situation of the South, which requires colored labor for the cultivation of its crops, accelerates the process. I send forth a word of good cheer to our colored citizens, and bid them stand fast, play the man, and by self-improvement, thrift and perseverance build a solid foundation for their sons and daughters. To be productive instead of non-productive, to be polite instead of boorish, to endure today what can and shall be abolished tomorrow because of your patience; these are the routes to fair play and justice. The standards of negro loyalty, religiousness and devotion to benefactors are, on the whole, still intact and maintained. But the hour has struck when every negro must either be a credit to his race or else its betrayer, and when every white man who treasures our domestic unity and integrity will have to cheerfully co-operate for these ends with all like-minded people.

S. P. C.

Editorial Correspondence

Samuel C. Benson's Approach to New York

THE British Churches were greatly interested this fall in the ideas on "Bible Healing" advanced by Samuel C. Benson, Ph.D., a young American. Dr. Benson, whose father is a Presbyterian minister in Portland, Oregon, is himself likewise a Presbyterian minister and has been a pastor. During the war he served first in an ambulance corps with the French army and later as a chaplain in the American army. On his return to America he became secretary for the Eastern Agency of the American Bible Society.

Some years ago, Dr. Benson was pronounced incurably ill of tuberculosis. We tell the story as he told it to us. His reading of the Bible convinced him that, as God had cured disease in the past without medical intervention, He could do so now. Strengthened, as he felt, by this faith, he recovered, so that today he has no difficulty in passing a life insurance examination. He testifies that the doctors tell him that his respiratory system is perfectly healthy. Moved by this experience and by what he had seen in the war, two years ago he wrote an enthusiastic book entitled "Bible Healing and Guide to the Bible."

After he settled down in Brooklyn in his work with the Bible Society, he interested a number of other men in his idea. This idea is, in his own words, that "regular orthodox Christianity possesses all the power, and all the blessing, and all the healing secrets which any of these outside movements of psychology, autosuggestion, mental healing, psycho-analysis and what-not possess, with the additional strength that it offers personal salvation for the soul as well, and that it has the divine, and spiritual power in unlimited degree to re-inforce the mind or the will or the imagination at the point to which these often come when they are so weak and so depressed that they can no longer, so to speak, try to lift themselves up by their own boot-straps. When all else inside fails, Bible Healing still has God left, who is outside as well as inside, and who has all-power, which He puts at our disposal. In other words, a harmonizing of the whole man, body, mind, and spirit, through one—ness with God, is the basis of all healing. The supreme key of life is spiritual."

EDITORIAL

That idea of course is not new. The Emanuel Movement in Boston was based on practically the same foundation. (The leaders in the Emanuel Movement were careful to secure the co-operation of trained physicians.) James Moore Hickson has much the same idea as Dr. Benson. So does Dr. Thomas E. Calvert, of the Episcopal Church of St. Michael in New York. Indeed, as we all know, the idea has developed so strongly in the Episcopal Church in this country that its General Convention passed a resolution recognizing a place in the church for the ministry of healing.

Dr. Benson, however, has excited particular interest just at present. About a year ago the men who had become interested in "Bible healing" formed, under his inspiration, a little organization. Last spring two Brooklyn pastors, Rev. E. L. Tibbals, of the Homecrest Presbyterian Church, and Dr. Charles W. Dane, of Saint Mark's Congregational Church, conducted healing meetings with Dr. Benson's aid. There were a number of cases of apparently genuine healing. Dr. Benson tells of the case of a young woman, about eighteen years of age, who had been subject to epileptic fits for eight years. According to her mother she sometimes had thirteen or fourteen a day. The family were not church people, but they were interested in Dr. Benson's message. Almost immediately after coming in touch with him, the young woman began to improve. Her mother reported that in a whole week she had had only one very slight attack, recovering very rapidly from that. While he was in England this fall Dr. Benson received word anew that the cure was maintained.

Convinced more and more of the importance of the message of healing, Dr. Benson last summer resigned his position with the Bible Society in order to give himself entirely to the other work. About this time he brought out a new book, a "Bible Healing Prayerbook," for practical use in the ministry of healing.

On giving up his position in Brooklyn, Dr. Benson sailed for Europe, to take his message thither. He had met Dr. Norwood, of the London City Temple, while the latter was preaching at the Broadway Tabernacle, New York last spring. Arrived at London, Dr. Benson found Dr. Norwood ready to redeem his promise to let him hold a meeting at the City Temple. Dr. Benson approached some fourteen of the leaders of the British Free Churches. Twelve of them were so much impressed with his message that they united in sending out an announcement of the meeting. "We are aware," they said in the notice, "that a similar movement has received the endorsement of a large number of bishops and clergy of the Established Church, and the question arises whether it will not be wise for us of the Free Churches to carefully consider our attitude to this question.

"A meeting will, therefore, be held in the Lecture Hall of the City Temple on Wednesday, September 27th, at 3 o'clock, when Dr. Benson will make a statement on this matter, and an opportunity will be given for the careful discussion as to how far, in the judgment of those present, it is wise to take steps in the same direction."

The twelve signing the card included the veteran Dr. John Clifford; James Cregan, Chairman of the London Congregational Union; F. B. Meyer; Dr. Norwood; Thomas Nightingale, Secretary of the Free Church Council; Dr. R. C. Iillie, formerly President of the Council; Dinsdale Young, of Wesleyan Central Hall, and the minister of Wesley's and Whitefield's Chapels.

For a week before the meeting the daily and religious press of London discussed Bible healing. When the day of the meeting came, queues of people formed in the rain at the doors of the City Temple. The lecture room, which holds five or six hundred, was far too small for the crowd. The meeting adjourned to the auditorium. A dozen reporters were on hand. The whole British press carried reports of the meeting the next day and cable dispatches about it went out over the world.

Typical of the press reports was such an account as this in "The Westminster Gazette":

With the united uplifting of a thousand hands at City Temple yesterday, an audience which for two hours had listened to Dr. Samuel Benson, a New York Presbyterian Minister, gave their approval to his call to the English churches to reincorporate in their program the Bible Healing ministry.

"During the last few years," said Dr. Benson, "it has seemed to me that the world has passed through a veritable hell, and now demands something more than mere oratory once a week. I have come to that impelling conviction through seeing tens of thousands of people drifting away from the Church.

"Recurring throughout the Bible almost with monotony," declared the Doctor, "Jesus said, Preach the Kingdom, Heal the Sick." And for four centuries the healing gospel was preached by his apostles, but for sixteen centuries there has been a lapse.

"Three points of paramount interest are contained in the Holy Book:

"1. Jesus never preached the gospel without healing the sick.

"2. He never commissioned his followers without especially commanding them to heal the sick.

"3. His very last words of the Great Commission admonished its continuance—'Lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover.'"

"The Manchester Guardian" the same day said:

Dr. Benson, a boyish, enthusiastic figure with a clean shaven face and well modulated voice, at the opening of his address at City Temple emphasized the fact that Christ had always commanded, "Heal the sick." He pointed out that the Church of England had recognized this, and a committee had been appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury to consider the question. Yesterday the Anglican Church in America at its triennial conference enjoined every clergyman who believed in it to prepare himself by study and prayer for the practice of it. "God bless the Anglican Church." The only gospel he believed in was that "which works." He had no idea of saying anything extreme or sensational, but wished to face the searchlight of the Scriptures upon the gospel of healing. He answered questions dealing with theological and scientific points with ease, courtesy and good humor, insisting that common sense must be observed.

EDITORIAL

"The British Weekly's" account of the meeting ran:

A young looking man in a grey lounge suit, Dr. Benson is the last person likely to provoke exciting scenes. His manner is composed, his language simple. He gave a well argued plea for the literal obedience on the part of Christian teachers to our Lord's command, "Heal the sick." "The healing gospel for body and for soul is the one big gospel I find in the Bible." The Church will lose ground, he fears, if she neglects to carry into practical application the commands and example of our Lord. "I have given up everything that this world offers, and my conviction is so strong that I am willing to move out on this ground alone."

The attitude of British Free Church leaders on the topic appears from such statements as these: "Healing," said Dr. F. B. Meyer, "certainly was an early prerogative of the Christian Church. Then the Church became corrupt and embodied a great deal of paganism. Dr. Benson has come with very high credentials, and a few of us thought it would be quite well for the matter to be canvassed, for there is no doubt, a spiritual power available if the conditions are carefully observed."

James Cregan, Chairman of the London Congregational Union, commented, "I think Dr. Benson is a very sane man. He is not an extremist. He believes God has power to heal the sick. I too do not think the Church has lost the power."

Dr. Norwood himself was unable to be at the meeting. But he preached on the topic next Sunday. "I myself think," he said, "a truly spiritual life should radiate health. The last word in bodily sickness does not lie with drugs. It lies back in the mind and in the spirit. We have been pushing God off His universe. God is the great healing force."

Dinsdale Young, preacher at the great Wesleyan Central Hall, said of Dr. Benson, "He preaches a full gospel, and such teaching is greatly needed everywhere."

Dr. Benson purposely had not attempted to enlist Dr. Jowett among the sponsors for the meeting. But Jowett himself came out in two articles in "The Daily Telegraph" saying in the first, published October 17, "Dr. Benson has a vital cause and we cannot push it to one side." In his second article, published October 29, he wrote, "He (Dr. Benson) believes there should be a spiritual clinic in every church. It should concentrate its ministries upon those who are physically ailing, and so complete the full circle of the redemptive work appointed her by her Lord, and I think the whole question is fully ripe for the most searching investigation we can give it. It calls for reverent and patient exploration."

On October 23 the Metropolitan Free Church Federation held a meeting for ministers at Memorial Hall, where over a thousand Free Church clergymen gathered to hear Dr. Benson and "Billy" Poole, F. B. Meyer's successor at Christ Church.

Benson returned to this country some six weeks ago.

On Sunday, January 14, at 4 P. M., he will hold a meeting at the West Side Y. M. C. A. (318 West 57th Street), New York, to give to New York the same message which so greatly interested the church leaders of London. A very distinguished group of New York and Brooklyn ministers stand sponsor for the meeting. Among them are Dr. Cadman, Frank Crane, Dr. Jefferson, Dr. A. Ray Petty, of the Judson Memorial Church; John F. Steen, of Ascension Memorial Episcopal Church; John Roach Straton, of Calvary Baptist Church; Robert Watson, of the Second Presbyterian. The fact that British religious leaders have given Dr. Benson serious attention is enough to interest many American churchmen.

What we have written here is purely objective, a matter of news. After Dr. Benson has begun his work in America we can better gauge its importance. At any rate, Dr. Benson is genuine and he is intensely interested in his message.

HENRY S. HUNTINGTON.

Home Missions in Utah

It is very pleasant to learn that the home mission forces are working in Utah with a more adequate program than in the past. Two years ago an interdenominational conference, considering the problems of the State, agreed that there ought to be better equipment in property and men for the churches; closer co-operation in an educational policy; a better grade of literature, especially addressed to intelligent Mormons; a better system of colportage for the smaller towns of the State, and a course of lectures upon distinguishing religious themes by eminent men whose statements carry weight and be repeated in the papers of the State. The churches are proceeding to carry out this program. They have begun to improve this propaganda literature and are caring for colportage more adequately. They are now planning to co-operate in the support of Westminster College at Salt Lake City. Westminster College was founded by the Presbyterians. It is proposed now that all the fitting schools maintained by the different denominations shall feed into this one central college and that the different denominations, represented as they are in the Board of Management, shall also be represented in the faculty and in the financial support of the institution.

THE OBSERVER

Expository Preaching

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

THERE are hardly any books which I read with more interest than the lectures on preaching which are constantly being published. I think there must have been at least ten such books this year. I remember reading those by Bishop McDonald, Doctors Merrill Bull Patterson Smythe, Roland Cotton Smith, Hutton and Garvan, and there are others. The last to appear are the Lyman Beecher Lectures delivered at Yale University last month by Dean Charles R. Brown: "The Art of Preaching" (The Macmillan Company.) These are eight lectures and they deal very frankly and detailedly with preaching and sermon making. There are such topics as The Significance of the Sermon, Its Basis, Its Content, Its Measure, Its Delivery, Its Setting and Its Soul. Dr. Brown has long been famous as a preacher and as a teacher of homiletics. The lectures are very evidently drawn from his long experience as a preacher and I imagine they are in substance what he gives in the class room. They are very suggestive and stimulating, full of personal touch and there is a delightful sense of humor running through the book. They will prove very helpful as well as encouraging to the preacher.

One thing especially interested me, namely, Dr. Brown's plea for expository preaching and extemporaneous delivery. The question of preaching is so vital just now and is being so much debated that I want to take up these two subjects separately, in the light of Dean Brown's recommendations. (It will be remembered that in a recent number of the Yale Review Dr. Francis E. Clark attributed the decline in church attendance in Protestant churches to the undue emphasis put upon the sermon.)

Dr. Brown's plea for expository preaching will not be new to readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, only in the way of emphasis; for I have long been urging this method, especially for beginners in preaching. I have contended that except in the case of geniuses it is the only way to secure variety of treatment, richness of content, and security against the well running dry. The young man who uses the topical method entirely is very, very apt to fall into the habit of preaching upon the one or two themes which possess him—sometimes obsess him—whereas if he draws his sermons from the Bible he touches every phase of human thought and feeling, and every phase of human aspiration and defeat, every problem that vexes human life, every pain that flesh or soul is heir to. Not only does the expository preaching thus assure richness and variety of treatment, and due emphasis upon all the Biblical doctrines and Christian teachings but it provides the preacher with an inexhaustible resource. He need never worry about where his next week's sermon is to come from. If he is taking his people through the parables of Jesus for instance the selection of sermon has been made for him in advance. Then, too, the expository preaching helps the preacher toward the extemporaneous method, which is greatly to be desired in general, much faster than the topical method.

When I turned to Dr. Brown's lectures I found him urging this as earnestly as I have and for the same reasons: "I am a firm believer in the expository style of preaching," he says. "The advantages of this type of preaching are many. It has the historic warrant of being apostolic. The apostles used it. The expository method of preaching insures a more thorough knowledge of the Bible on the part of the preacher himself. This method of preaching also develops a more thorough knowledge of the Bible on the part of the people. The expository form of preaching gradually develops both in the pulpit and the pew the Scriptural point of view, than which there is none better. By using the Scripture in this larger way, all the great doctrines of faith and prayer, of atonement, of regeneration, of inspiration, and all the great moral problems as well, are viewed in the light of Scripture taken in the large. The systematic exposition of book after book of the Bible gives also the advantage of order. There are few forms of serious effort which are carried on in such slap-dash, hit-or-miss, go-as-you-please, catch-as-you-can fashion as the work of preaching."

Later on Dr. Brown calls attention to the fact I have emphasized above, namely, that the expository preacher is saved all solicitude and indecision about sermon topics: "He has a certain program already laid out for him. He is in process of developing the truth of some one of the great books of the Bible. He wastes no time, therefore, in making his decision, but sets to work at once upon the task in hand." One point made by Dr. Brown is very interesting. He says the expository style of preaching "also brings a man naturally but inevitably to some of those difficult themes which the minister, left to his own miscellaneous, extemporaneous choice from Sunday to Sunday might avoid." There are a good many such themes, both doctrinal and relating to human conduct and relationships. Dr. Brown illustrates this from a cursory glance of the Old and New Testaments. He closes his plea for a return to expository methods by saying that he has practiced what he is preaching. It is so suggestive a little bit of autobiography that I quote it here: "I have practiced what I preach in this matter. If I had not done so I should never have had the face to stand here and urge this method of preaching upon you as furnishing the best possible basis for the staple articles of spiritual commerce which we undertake to offer in our sermons. In the last church I served, the First Congregational Church of Oakland, California, where I was pastor for nearly fifteen years, I find from an examination of my record book that during those years, I preached courses of expository sermons to that one congregation as follows: From the Old Testament, six months on Joshua, three months on Judges, two months on the life of Elijah as recorded in Kings, two months on Job, six months on Isaiah, two months on the minor prophets. And I had in preparation a six months' course of sermons on first and second Samuel. In the New Testament, I preached for six months on Matthew, six months on Mark, twelve months on Luke * * * * six months on John, six months on Acts, two months on Romans, three months on first and second Corinthians, and two months on the Book of Revelation. When this is added up it means that there was some course of expository sermons in process of delivery for six entire years of my pastorate there. And I believe that the testimony of at least two-thirds of the people in the church would confirm my own belief that this was the most profitable portion of my preaching from that pulpit."

I do not mean by expository preaching the use of the Bible in the pulpit as one would use it in a Sunday School class and I am sure Dr. Brown does not. I am simply urging that the basis and content of the sermon be Biblical, at least for the first years of preaching. Expository sermons are sermons which take a verse or passage of Scripture and derive from it the message for our day. In addition to this it recognizes the unity of the Bible and so moves in orderly sequence. The message of the Epistle to the Corinthians is one message, but it touches every phase of human experience. The message of the Parables is one message, the Kingdom of God, but they touch every phase of life in the Kingdom. Again I want to add my plea to Dr. Brown's for more use of the Bible in our preaching, both for the sake of unity and variety and for power and vision.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Public School and Free Institutions

By Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis, D. D.

Minister of the Plymouth Congregational Church, Brooklyn

IN his "American Commonwealth," the late Ambassador Bryce passed in review the gains of the republic during the past one hundred thirty years, and characterized the epoch of Washington as the era of gains in constitutional government, the earlier era of Webster, the era when men's minds were clarified as to the nature of the Union, "which has proven itself to be the strongest possible form of government, easily outliving the autocratic forms of George the Third, William the Second, and the Czar's reign in Russia." Now comes a time when it should be said of President Harding's era, in connection with his annual message on education, and the setting aside of the first week in December as Educational Week, that no era and no President has stressed so fully the importance of education as has President Harding. At the very outset of his Administration, he sent out a message to all educators and also to all school boys and parents, warning them that ignorance is wasting the resources of the republic, that education alone can increase the worker's wage and the nation's wealth; that the losses through sickness and death are largely losses of ignorance, and that the great need of the hour is the need of an invasion of knowledge and the coming in of wisdom with the depth and majesty of a tidal wave. Under the direction of our President, the National Commissioner of Education has sent out a warning that he wishes to be read in all our schools and churches, to the effect that we have starved one hundred thousand teachers out of the schoolroom salaries that have not been raised within ten years, during which time expenses have nearly doubled; that our cities have school buildings equal for only three-fourths of their children; that hundreds of thousands of boys and girls are upon half time; that most of our schoolhouses are without central auditorium, gymnasium and rooms for manual training, cooking, dressmaking and the study of the means of earning one's livelihood and improving one's condition in life. The President's message is a trumpet blast, calling the American people back to the old ideals, when every boy and girl was to be educated toward the intellect, and made obedient towards the laws of God and their native land.

In sending out his message on education, President Harding has the noblest examples and precedents behind him. Not one outstanding man in our republic but has insisted that the public school is essential to the permanence of our free institutions. Washington stood for free schools, the diffusion of knowledge. Daniel Webster believed that in "Plato and Aristotle, all the intellectual life of Europe for two thousand years could be found," and said that the task of our school teachers was, "to hand forward that knowledge together with all information newly acquired." It was Lincoln who held that if "Luther and Wyclif gave the Bible and freedom of conscience to the masses, that our forefathers, with their free schools, taught the people how to think." It was Roosevelt also who quoted from Burke the statement that if the republic ever fell it would fall because of the difficulty of educating our masters, namely, the people whose votes make our laws. In this republic, every November, burning questions arise, with keen debates upon financial law, tariff laws and tax laws. One day an Athenian scholar attended the Supreme Court. He heard the case argued by four jurists and saw it decided by the ballots of 500 jurors. An hour later, a citizen asked Anacharsis, "What do you think of Athenian liberty?" "I think," said he, "wise men argue cases, and fools decide them." In that spirit Carlyle scoffed: "Democracy will prevail when men believe the vote of Judas as good as that of Jesus." And all autocrats who want to scoop out the brains of their subjects, shout, "Don't worry, I'll think for you; you need only obey." It seems to have escaped the attention of the autocrats that Judas belonged to the educated, ruling class, rather than to the poor whom the aristocrat distrusts. Ignorance has been called "the brother of sleep"; but ignorance and sin are not taken out of a man as Eve was taken out of Adam by putting him to sleep. Wendell Phillips once said that Europe greeted our announcement of universal suffrage with the words, "A congress of madmen! A republic of lunatics!" In that spirit we were given forty years before the shipwreck; to which Fisher Ames answered: "A monarchy or an autocracy is a man-of-war, staunch, iron-ribbed, and resistless when under full sail, yet a single hidden rock sends her to the bottom. Our republic is a raft hard to steer, but you can send two cannon balls through every log in the raft and you cannot sink her." It is this that explains the fact, that the republic is the only permanent form of government that has ever been discovered. Assassinate one man, the czar, and you slay an autocracy. To slay a republic, you must kill one hundred twelve million and there are not bomb-shells enough to go round.

Now among the architects of this American public school system so vital to our Government we must make a large place for Horace Mann. One of the noblest ideas ever made for the free education of all the people is found in Horace Mann's historic statement on "What God does and what He expects man to do for the education of children." What God does is to create the human body as an instrument of fine thinking, and to equip the body with many powerful impulses, that untrained bring disaster, but well drilled bring happiness and good fortune. Every farmer knows that it is unsafe to leave a garden to itself, for the clods seem to have a kind of natural bias toward thistles and weeds but no powerful impulses toward wheat and corn, or apples and grapes. Not until man, the worker, enters the scene and takes charge of the field does the garden turn toward the palm and the olive. The history of the fall of cities and the decline of states is the story of ignorant and selfish men who refuse all warnings from experience and turn their backs on obedience to law.

There is a second consideration bearing upon the education of all children and youth, namely, while the state through the death of the parents, can hand all material treasures over to the children—all ships, engines, stores, factories, goods, gold, fields, herds and flocks—it is not possible for parents to transmit their education and their character. Solomon was the wisest man of his time, but Solomon could not bequeath any of his knowledge to his children. The wise man's little son had to learn his letters as did the child of the slave in the king's palace. No Sir William Jones, with his knowledge of forty-six languages and dialects, could exempt his son from the necessity of beginning where the father began. The real argument for man's being the lord of all creation is in the fact that childhood, with its plasticity of memory, belongs to all for twenty years, while to the occasional few, possessed of talent and genius, it is given to acquire knowledge at seventy as easily and to retain it as readily as at seven. The sand-fly is mature at the end of one day; the robin and lark at the end of two months; the horse at five years; but man stretches his scepter over all things that creep, run and fly, in that he has a childhood with plasticity of memory, reaching across full twenty and sometimes forty years. Helpless, also, for physical reasons is a little child to escape from parents and teachers, and being wax to receive, the child is steel to hold. The first duty of the parent, therefore, is to give the child good habits that are the best possible friends. When Ruskin was asked what was the most important thing for the improvement of England in knowledge, art and liberty, he made answer, "A generation of parents able to give to the child the gift of instant obedience to the laws of nature and of God"—a gift to be valued beyond that of millions expressed in gold.

More important still, if possible, is the task of educating the occasional gifted child of exceptional ability. God's best gift to a nation is the birth of a child that has the gift of leadership, by discovering some truth, as did Isaac Newton or Charles Darwin; some law as did Curie and Roentgen, some institutions as did Hamilton and Lincoln. It is a proverb that "the poet is born and not made," but so are the painter, the philosopher, and the statesman. We cannot create a ten talent gift—we discover it. No miner creates his gold—he uncovers the precious lode. No pioneer creates his diamonds—he finds them. No Socrates ever created a Plato—he simply helps that gifted boy to develop himself. Every Lincoln and Webster represents the entrance of an angel of God into the earthly scene. These sons of genius cry out, "Give me knowledge, or I die!" Unfortunately the State has never known how to discover the occasional children of genius, nor how to develop them when they appear. The cruelty and neglect that society returns to its greatest benefactors is the most amazing fact of which we have any knowledge. When a noble and ingenious youth has made his first struggle toward the goal and wins the prize, a little praise and recognition brings the flush of pride to his cheek, clarifies his thinking, stirs a high resolve to repeat that struggle and win a nobler goal as a contribution to the State through his painting, his drama, his song, his epic. Be the reasons what they may, practically always the recognition is denied. And when in old age some little wreath is given, the broken hearted man can only take it out and lay the blossoms in the frost and snow upon his mother's grave. Great Britain broke the heart of her greatest novelist, Sir Walter Scott; of the greatest poet of his generation, John Keats; of her greatest painter, the greatest landscape painter who ever lived, Turner; while jealousy and envy embittered Shelley and ruined Byron. All that we can say is that the noblest men that God has given to the State have been neglected in their youth, maligned in their manhood and broken hearted in their old age. The task of discovering the occasional gifted boy or girl, the strengthening of their hand during the years of preparation, and their support and backing during the creative years is the greatest task that confronts the American people.

Another problem that confronts the Republic in matter of education is the discovery of a two-fold method of education; the one for the occasional creative intellect, and the other for those who revolt from a life of reflection and deliberately choose routine work. Two years ago I published a letter from Mr. Edison—a document that seemed to carry certain revolutionary principles within its pages. In that statement, Mr. Edison said that he had had under his direction many, many thousands of young men, from whose number he had selected a little handful of leaders. Becoming interested in the problem, how they came to develop leadership, Mr. Edison sent out a list of questions and soon discovered that without exception these creative minds had, between the ages of twelve and eighteen, received some great influence, as for example, the death of the parent, or the loss of the father's property, that had entered into the soul like leaven into the dough, and created a new form of life. Unfortunately, the ninety-nine boys out of one hundred refused to accept suffering or the angel of adversity as a friend, saying: "I do not want to think about this trouble," with the result that their minds began to stiffen, until by twenty their faculties were hard, without suppleness, and by twenty-five they were "dead ones." They had become incapable of thinking out new plans, better methods of work or the saving of wastes, and insisted upon being tread-mill workers, fulfilling routine tasks, and wholly averse to solving any hard problem. A boy who thinks and thinks, and never stops thinking, till he has found his way through his barrier, or around it or over it, discovers a new tool, a new art, a new scientific law. Now this occasional man, by a single discovery, namely, the electric bulb, can add one hour to every man's working day, which means one-tenth addition to the daily or annual income. How to find, therefore, these occasional boys and girls, how to lead forth their ability, how to encourage them, how to wing their words, and ease their burdens, and lift them up and forward until they lift the millions to their level—this is the problem that confronts people. Unfortunately, the whole tendency is for the little jealous men, in envious spirit, to spend all their time striking at those who have the spirit of service, until they succeed in paralyzing the creative intellect of some, in clipping the wings of others, in stabbing to death or poisoning all the best influences that make for creative work. England has a method and so have France and Italy. They give a title to the young author; give honors to the painter and architect; lend distinction to the name of the statesman and reformer. It is a part of our youth, our immaturity, and our great body of unleavened folk, that through a false idea of democracy, the Republic, to show its hatred of England's method in 1776, decided to stamp out all gratitude for favors received. Should some father and mother say, "Never praise the child for good work!" Never thank any friend for a kindness! Be as stolid as a mummy when some friend makes a gift as precious as life. Be as unfeeling as an oyster—you would have the exact replica of the method of our Republic. Good women and men do not do great work for a reward—they do it for the work's sake. But there never lived a gifted child but did better work as the result of a few judicious words of recognition that the work was well done.

Sometimes, in studying the public school system of our country, critics have spoken of the schools as the machine method of culture. This criticism represents a half truth and a partial falsehood. Strictly speaking, not one boy out of a hundred is willing to devote his life to the ideas involved in a profession. His great passion is to work with his hands in the fields, with the herds and flocks, or in the orchards and vineyards, or else he wants to work in factory or mine, in street or store. He feels that his best gift is the gift of a trade and an occupation, and because he loves that trade he revolts from what is called the higher education, the sciences. To him they are all dry as dust. The fine arts—better a stone pile drudgery! The professions?—the very thought nauseates the youth. But wherever he can use the years under fourteen and live in homes where producing and exchanging goods, there he finds happiness and contentment. The best education, therefore, for these multitudes, should end as far as the school room is concerned, at about fourteen years of age, thus leaving the boy four critical years for the memory before eighteen for mastering his occupation and earning his livelihood. But, unfortunately, multitudes refuse to use the years under fourteen and live in homes where the parents, conscious of their own ignorance, do not want their children to acquire knowledge, lest that carry superiority. Mark Twain brings this out in his story of Huckleberry Finn. Huck's father, coming into the village after a week of drunkenness in the woods, finds the boy he has deserted going to school with a book in his hand. The father asks the child to read a page, and when the boy has dutifully filled the task, tears the book into shreds, shakes the child until he is half conscious, and then hisses the words: "I never could read a word! My father couldn't read a word! and I'll cowhide you well if you don't give up these highfalutin' ideas. No child of mine is ever going to know more than its father and its grandfather." In that spirit, some years ago, out in Chicago, and a little later in Milwaukee, several thousand boys and girls told their parents who insisted upon having teachers who spoke only in a foreign language, organized a rebellion and finally went on a strike, and at last in their revolt, burned the parish church and the parish school before they broke down the opposition to our language of their religious teachers and their own parents. It is this spirit that has given us the ignorance that curses our land. Think of the seven million of illiterates! Of a group of foreigners who were asked to mention the names of our greatest Presidents, and the entire group of newcomers called out the names of three Presidents, Wilson and Lincoln and Roosevelt! While another foreigner shouted, "Barnum," another said it was "Bailey," another called out "Shakespeare," and the fourth waved both hands as he yelled, "Pershing." And this allied with the fact that but forty-six children out of every one hundred of our fifteen million rural children are in the schoolhouse, at any given day, modifies our hope for the future of the Republic!

The complexity of our tools, our institutions and our social life has redoubled the necessity for mental culture. An ignorant man can drive a mule and a two-wheeled cart; he can hoe cotton or cut sugar cane, but he cannot drive a high-power locomotive, and every telegraph operator and even the boy who carries the message must be able to read and write correctly and quickly. Thousands of new shapes of industry are now developing. Theodore Parker once expressed the wish that a "plough and a loom might become the mere accident of a man, and not man the accident of the anvil or the plough." To enrich the man, therefore, our schools have been established. Our libraries have been enriched to increase the worth of the individual. Men who once were satisfied with a loaf of bread and a blanket have now added to their needs a book, the newspaper, the comforts of a home. It is no longer enough that the colored man is free—he now longs for enough education to fit him for a trade, or an occupation. One of our educators is quoted as saying that the average boy leaving school at fourteen has given nearly as much time to arithmetic as to nearly all other subjects put together. And he adds, "The children cipher all day, because the idea has gotten all through the nation that the chief end of man is to be found in adding small amounts of money" Things are not well with any republic whose millions are fond of figures and care little for morals. Guizot once said that much of the "European culture and personal liberty and worth came from the homes of a few feudal lords, where a noble man of gentle manners assembled the children of the peasants and taught them a better way of living." But in the republic, where every man's house is his castle, and is also the castle of the State, the parent should add his teaching power and influence to that of the teacher.

It has been wisely said that the best way to improve the Mississippi River is to improve the people who dwell upon its banks, and that high schools are far more important to the nation than government piers and lighthouses. "It is singular, therefore, that government supplies oil lamps for sailors on the sea, but questions its right to give mental and moral light to the millions on the land." It is well known that more youth are wrecked by storms of passion in a single city than upon the whole Atlantic in any period, and yet, should a Congressman tomorrow rise in his place and present a bill to dig mud out of the mouth of any river he would be highly praised, but if another man were to rise and ask for ten millions of dollars for visual education, for the teaching of industries to show a boy how to earn his livelihood, he would be laughed at as an individual ignorant of the ends for which the nation was founded. For the genius of our legislators seems to be exhausted in acts related to property. Yet the business of the nation is the creation of men and women of great personal worth. Back of every great tool or ship stands some Fulton, some Watt, and back of every great cathedral stands some Von Rile or Christopher Wren. Back of every noble epic stands some Virgil, some Milton. Back of every great law stands Phocion, or Justinian. Back of the Constitution stand Hamilton and Franklin and Washington. The great law or art is the shadow flung across the land by some great soul. The measure of the nation's greatness, therefore, is the number of great citizens it has produced. When any country allows its free public schools to be discredited by secret enemies, who are always undermining the foundations of the nation, the decline of property, the decay of literature and good manners, and the fall of its liberties cannot be long postponed.

Baltimore Cooperative Women's Civic League

When we are hearing so much of the ill feeling between the whites and negroes, it is encouraging to reverse the shield occasionally and see something of the growing good feeling between them. In Baltimore the Baltimore Co-operative Women's Civic League, which includes women of both races, has taken on new life. Miss Elizabeth Gilman, daughter of the late President of John Hopkins University, started the league in 1912. But, because of the war the organization lapsed for several years. Since its revival, in 1920, it has held public demonstrations of the value of milk as a food and also as a necessity in the case of infants and of people afflicted with tuberculosis; it has opened an annual flower market in March and May; and has conducted meetings of working mothers to discuss the care and training of the adolescent girl. Working together has helped bring the women of the two races into sympathy. Moreover the white clergymen of Baltimore have joined with the colored people in forming an inter-racial committee, which is already at work promoting a better housing plan for the colored people.

The Church and Recreation

By Rev. Roy B. Guild

Executive Secretary, Commission on Councils of Churches of the Federal Council

A GROUP of church leaders at the close of the war were seated around a table in the Union League Club in New York City, discussing some of the things that we had learned from our war experiences. Bishop Reese of Ohio said, "There are two words that have come out of the war that ought to be wonderfully helpful to us all, because they are now enriched by those experiences—the word community and communion." We had been talking about the need of the churches being closer together. We had agreed that there ought to come a closer communion of communions. Let us use the word communion—not the word denominations—thus denoting fellowship. Community and communion. The church and the community—how closely they ought to be linked.

In a typical Texas town of about five thousand people, I met a typical Texan, six feet two inches in height, broad shouldered, an altogether delightful man. In that town there had been a series of depredations. Several stores had been broken into. These depredations had been occurring with marked regularity. The persons committing them had not seemed to want money, but each time there would be missing so many cans of salmon and sardines and so many boxes of cookies, and other things of that character. Only once was a till broken into. The town marshall kept an eye on every train that arrived, but the robberies went on. One day some of the boys of the town disappeared. It was a source of anxiety to some parents, but a relief to the rest of the community. Stories began to come from down the river. Finally came the news that those boys had been arrested for stealing about twenty boats, which they had picked up on the way down the river. The immediate result was that everybody called the boys "the boat gang." The boys wanted a vacation, and having no money to finance the expedition, they had broken into the stores to get their provisions, and had taken the boats for transportation. The big Texan already referred to said: "Let me go down after them." He brought the boys back. Instead of taking them to the lockup, he took them on to a playground. He went to the merchants of that town and said: "Let us give these boys a place to play which is their own." He raised the money, and the boys built their own fence. He had never studied the psychology of the boy, nor attended playground conference, but he knew the sense of proprietorship that every boy has. Some of us have not discovered the fact that we must let a boy have his own corner of the house where he can do anything he pleases. So he gave them a playground with a fence around it.

Then this Texan acted as a splendid churchman should. He did not say what the church ought to do, but he went about securing money for a winter building. The boys erected the building and made the furniture. The man worked out a ritual for the club life, which made membership mean more to them. They did not smash the furniture. The outcome was that in that town they had the finest lot of boys in Texas.

What are the implications of this story? In the first place, the boys were bad citizens and were becoming worse. In the second place, the Church was concerned about the citizenship of those boys. In the third place, the Church believed that pleasure and citizenship had something to do with each other. In the fourth place, they all combined in a community proposition to develop those boys into good citizens.

The Church must be tremendously concerned about citizenship or fail. The chief objective of the Church is to make good citizens. Let me repeat it. The chief objective of the Church is to make good citizens, not good citizens up in heaven, but the chief, immediate task of the Church is to make good citizens now and here on earth. My authority for that statement is the work and the teachings of Jesus Christ. The Founder of the Church had as the objective of his life the establishment of a kingdom, and his disciples were to be the first citizens with Him. They were to go out and develop other citizens. Do you recall the accusation on which He was sent to Calvary? It was because he declared he had come to set up a new kingdom. How many of you have seen the Passion Play? It is most interesting to note that at the beginning of the play there comes the evidence on the part of the Christ as He moves out in triumphal procession, that it is an act of his citizenship in establishing His kingdom, His fight for righteousness. And another interesting thing is that the children are there. When they come in the triumphal procession, among those who join in the press are the children. The interest of Jesus in the children is shown as he enters into conversation with those who would silence them. He tells them that if the children were to keep quiet the very stones would cry out. Then Jesus turned from the children and went after the Temple grafters. Then it was that trouble began for Him. Immediately his enemies determined to put Him to death. It was the effort to establish a present kingdom that brought that about.

I do not need to dwell upon the point that the objective of Jesus was the establishment of a kingdom. "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." I do not know all the meanings of that word, heaven, but when we think of the movement of the stars in all the heavens, and of this as the manifestation of the will of God in the heavens, of the mind and heart of God in the universe, it staggers us. To think that every star in that immeasurable universe moves in perfect rhythm. In some way or other the object of the Church is the establishment of citizenship in the kingdom which must be in conformity with the law that as all nature is in perfect rhythm with the will of God, so mankind must obey His laws.

Let us keep in mind that there is a close relationship between religion and pleasure. Piety and pleasure are inseparable. We have not always thought so. We have thought that a pious person must have a long face. In Old Testament times, they held the dance and the prayer meeting at the same time. There has come some change in the dancing, I will confess, and likewise some change in the prayer meeting. There was the twofold expression of happiness. When I read in the Psalms: "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the House of the Lord," I think of Johnny's mother who wanted her boy to be an ideal man and so she kept him away from the other boys. She wanted him to like to go to prayer meeting, so she would say to him, "Now, Johnny, if you are a good boy, I will let you go to prayer meeting with me." Well, the circus came to town and finally Johnny's mother was prevailed upon to let him go. When he came home she asked him if he had enjoyed the circus. He said, "Did I enjoy it? Oh, Mother, if you would go to the circus once you would not want to go to prayer meeting at all." There has come a separation of pleasure and piety in this country, and the small boy prefers the circus. I believe that we must link the two together, so that we may have some of the praise meetings of ancient times that there may come out of them something of that spirit of the grand old psalms that, like them, will go on down through the ages. Pleasure and religion are inseparable. We must see to it that we have the two. "Who for the joy that was set before him."

Then in all our work to bring up the citizen, we must recognize what has been said again and again, that play makes for character. The important thing in citizenship is character. The better of two citizens is not the one who knows all the methods of government. Sometimes he is the worst citizen. The very best citizen is the one who knows all about the method and has the character along with the knowledge. I have been more concerned with my three boys about how they played than about how they worked, so far as their moral character goes. As the boys play in school day life, so the men will play the game later in the business world. The Church, if it is going to make good citizenship must be concerned about these things.

There are two or three ways in which the Church may do this. There is, first, the play and recreation life of the local church. That used to cause us a good deal of trouble. I believe in having a gymnasium in the church. We have fine accommodations for the women—kitchen and dining room and parlors. And in them the women serve dinners for the men. But many churches have not thought to spend anything for the boys in the church. In Topeka there was a physician who believed that the boys of high school age could be held to big things. He brought four other men together to help, and the story of how they held the boys is a wonderful one. Dr. Van Horn was a physician with a large practice. More than once when he was with the boys in the club room of the church, the telephone would ring, summoning him to a sick room. Repeatedly he would call another doctor to take care of the patient, while he would stay with his boys' club. This explains his success. Those boys grew to love that church. We had billiard tables—one family left because of that. One of the boys was crippled. Here in the club he could play with others. When he grew worse and was about to die, he expressed his faith in a simple way: "Everything is all right. I am not afraid to die. I have been square with every fellow." I wish all of the deacons and trustees and officers of the churches could say the same thing. We were making citizenship there. Practically every fellow went over in service in the Great War.

Another thing,—we must have home play. The average boy can have one object of loyalty, and that should be his home. I thank God that all over this United States homes are taking up the problem of the home life and home play.

The next thing is to mobilize the good forces of the community for the protection of the boys and girls. That is the thing to which I am giving my life. "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, on earth"—that prayer will be answered in any city when it becomes safe for the home and for every boy and girl. I wish in all your cities you who are interested would have a great meeting and, as Jesus did, set a little child in the midst, and say, "What is there in this city that may hurt the character of this child? Let us write it down." I have seen two great programs for public welfare made up of the things that might menace the growth of a child. Those things challenge the playground association, and other social service organizations. That is the negative side. On the other side let us put down the things that will help to make character. Try that out, and you will have no trouble laying out a program of work for your community.

What can we do? The churches are co-operating as never before. We can point to results. In forty towns the churches have come together with all other agencies to form a sort of board of strategy, for the protection of its boys and girls. In Norfolk the pool rooms decided they would like to make more money, and so they planned to lower the age limit. They employed the best attorney in town to go to the City Council and put in a petition that the law be changed in regard to the age limit so that boys of eighteen might enter pool rooms. In that town the churches had followed the plans of the Chamber of Commerce and organized the Council of Churches. When this petition was presented in the City Council a man there telephoned the Secretary of the Council in regard to it. He called the other people who he knew would be interested. The Chairman of the Women's Department of the Council, social service chairman and others. They went to the City Council at its next meeting to protest. One man made a statement for the churches, a good woman made a statement for the Women's Clubs; another man spoke for the men of the city. At this point the attorney was becoming nervous. Then came a letter from the Judge of the Juvenile Court, saying that he had long ago discovered that most of the depredations of the boys were hatched in the pool rooms, adding, "If you are going to change the age limit you will have to create another Juvenile Court to take care of the increased delinquency." The attorney then threw up his hands and exclaimed, "For heaven's sake call them off!" He withdrew the petition and congratulated the officers of the Council of the Churches on the ability to mobilize so quickly and to speak so unitedly in the interest of the youth of Norfolk.

In Indianapolis, in a theatre a show was being given that was so bad that the Secretary of the Council of Churches called up the chief of police. The chief knew the whole moral force of the city was on the other end of the wire. He replied, "If what you say is true, I will stop it." It was stopped, under threat of permanently revoking the theatre's license. Why is the church concerned with the character of commercialized amusement? When that Secretary with two social workers saw the high school boys in that theatre the first day, by the time that act was to go on a second time they had counted two hundred boys of high school age in the audience, and they said, "We must strike together for the moral sentiment of the town." Mobilize so that these things that are detrimental to the training for citizenship may be prevented. The Church may be imperfect, but the Church has kept us in touch with that One who called us to serve in the kingdom. The important thing is that there shall not be duplication, but co-operation. We value this principle, and our object is that in any city where there is an organization that is looking after recreation, the business of the Church Council is to throw the whole moral force of the churches back of that movement, or back of any other organization that is peculiarly fitted for a certain purpose, so that in all this work for the social welfare, there may be on your part the consciousness of a very real—not just a prayerful—but a very real support of your efforts. When any organization for recreation has a full program we will aid with all the strength that is in the churches.

It is a great game to build up all these forces for good. What is the objective that brings people in line? What is the goal? "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth," now and here,—that is the great objective which all of us have. That is the real citizenship which we must establish, because, friends, make sure of this: you have no greater assurance of your citizenship hereafter than you have of your citizenship now, and the one is in proportion to the other. What a privilege ours is! God grant that we get all the people of our city to consider the youngest child, and accept the challenge to make that city the best place in all the world into which a boy or girl may be born.

Serbia and the Serbians

By Rev. Henry A. Atkinson, D. D.

Secretary of the Church Peace Foundation

MY task in making preparations for the World Alliance Conference at Copenhagen took me to the Balkan States where I spent some six weeks in June and July of this year. Like most of my fellow countrymen I had little idea of conditions in this part of the world. I knew Serbia, Bulgaria, Albania, Montenegro, as names of remote places from which came human machines to tend other machines in our American factories. Of ancient Greece I had learned in school; but of the actual conditions in these lands and their human problems I had but very vague notions. I saw and learned much during my visit, and propose to share with my readers some of my experiences in the new kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, popularly-known as Jugo-Slavia, and of which kingdom Serbia is the heart.

The train on which we rode as we came into Serbia by way of Italy ran along the side of the beautiful river Save. On both sides we saw, the most wonderful farms, with their growing crops, their beauty doubled by the picturesque people at work in the fields, which were literally full of these toilers. The last season was a good one with plenty of rain and warm sunshine. In the fields of wheat and other grains was a wealth of poppies. Their red color made the whole world look gay, as if it were the time of some grand carnival. The method of harvesting in this part of the world is very primitive. The grain is cut with old-fashioned scythes and then raked up by hand. The women do a great deal of the work, but as we got farther south we saw more men in the fields with the women. We also noted a difference in the clothing of the people, for the Slavic peasant wears white in the fields and some of their costumes are very elaborate and all are picturesque. We saw a few storks and a few wild pigeons, but it was noticeable how little wild life there was in evidence. Perhaps it is due to the war, more likely, however, it is because nearly every foot of the land is under cultivation, and this cultivation has driven away the birds.

Serbia is fundamentally a rich country; the people appear contented and happy. The land produces abundant crops and is owned and worked by the people themselves. Here there is no landed aristocracy living simply to drain the life blood of industry, and with all these material good things there is a hopeful facing of the future on the part of the people, which speaks volumes for that future.

It was dark when we reached Belgrade and the city is very disappointing at first sight. We drove directly to the Hotel Moscow, where we were given a good clean room, but alas it was on the fifth floor, and the elevator was not working. This hotel has one hundred and sixty rooms and is very imposing to look at from the outside, but it has only one bathroom in the whole establishment! Life, however, can go on even if there be "no skittles and beer"—and baths. The people at the hotel were courteous and seemed anxious to make us as comfortable as possible. I was told that a fine new hotel with one hundred and fifty rooms, each with a private bath and telephone, "just as you have in America," was being built and would be ready for occupancy early next year.

Belgrade is really a big peasant village. There are about one hundred and thirty thousand people in the city, but as there are accommodations for not more than one hundred thousand, it is easy to imagine how crowded everything is at the present time. This condition is being remedied, for many of the small buildings in town have been condemned, and the owners given two years in which to tear them down and replace them by large structures approved by a Commission which is remaking the city on a plan that when completed will present to Europe one of the finest if not the largest capitol in all the Balkan States. At present there are one thousand new buildings under construction. The government has subsidized this extensive building scheme by providing the property owners with money for the buildings at a low rate of interest, and the loans covered by mortgages are to run for a long period of time.

The low rate of exchange makes living very hard in the city for the people who have to live here. I received seventy-two dinars for a dollar, whereas the normal rate of exchange is five dinars. As in other countries of central Europe it is the middle class people who are hardest hit. The common laborers and the peasants are fairly well off, but the cultured group are suffering severely. Rents are very high. I was told that a family must pay for a very ordinary apartment a thousand dinars a month per room. This means that for an average family, one that required an apartment of five rooms, sixty thousand dinars a year has to be paid out for rent alone. This sum is more than the total annual salary of most teachers, preachers, lawyers, doctors and government employees.

Everyone is happy because the United States government had approved of a loan to Jugo-Slavia amounting to one hundred million dollars. This money is being spent in rebuilding the railroads, and developing the industries of the country; it has been loaned so as to be paid in small amounts. Five million was given early in the summer, the remainder is to be paid as needed. The question of the loan was under discussion in the Parliament while I was there and I went to the Chamber to look on, but of course could not understand anything that was said. It was interesting, however, to see the representatives of the people and their distinctive costumes and watch the eagerness with which they took part in all the important debates. The Parliament is housed in barracks, built during the war. The State is now putting up a fine new Parliament House, but for the present the old building does very well. The Constitution of the Kingdom provides for ample representation from each State within the domain. The delegates come in their native garb, and it is, therefore, a very attractive picture that one sees in the hall with its three hundred and thirty lawmakers. In 1912 Serbia had about three million population, and at present it has thirteen million people, and a vast area extending from Italy and Austria on the north, Greece on the south, and from the borders of Rumania and Hungary on the east to the Adriatic on the west. According to the Constitution there is the utmost freedom in both politics and religion. There are about seven million members of the Greek Orthodox Church, about eight hundred thousand Mohammedans who are Turks, and about six hundred thousand Mohammedans who are true Serbians. Croatia-Slavonia is almost solidly Roman Catholic. The minority groups represent about a million people in all. Now it is easy to imagine what contrasts there are in a Parliament composed of all of these elements. I saw clericals, Mohammedan priests, Montenegrins, Croats, in fact representatives from all the provinces sitting together to make laws for a common country. Three of the members are Mohammedan priests and were dressed in their distinctive garb, with turban and robe. The constitution gives wide range for differences of opinion and in consequence there have developed a number of parties. Pasitsch is the prime minister. The radical party of which he is the leader, is one of the strongest. There is also a clerical party, a socialist party and a republican party, besides numerous small, rather insignificant groups that call themselves parties. There was quite a strong Bolshevik party here some years ago, but the majority in the Parliament voted all of the elected Bolshevik delegates out of Parliament and passed a law making it practically an act of treason to belong to this or the communist party. This is a high-handed but effective way of dealing with a question which is afflicting so sorely every country in Europe today. Whether it is an ultimate solution is open to discussion. Socialist, clerical and republican parties join frequently in opposition to the government. On the question of the budget they made a direct attack on the Minister of Finance and for a long time refused support on the question of the United States loan. However, after much debate and a noisy session which lasted until 2 A. M. one morning late in June the question was put to a vote, and the opposition lost by an overwhelming vote for the budget and the terms of the loan.

It is very difficult to distinguish between the different national groups in this country. I asked a friend how one could learn to tell the differences. "For instance," I said, "I would like to know when I see a man from Montenegro." "It is easy," he replied, "just look for a group of men working on the street. If there are ten men in the group working and an eleventh man standing by looking on, you may be sure he is a Montenegrin." This is characteristic of the provincial feeling of the people, and yet it seemed to me that it is no more pronounced than it is in America. The Albanian feels that he is much superior to the Serbian. The Serbian is sure that the Montenegrin is beneath him, while those who live in the north in Croatia have a feeling that everyone south of them belongs to a distinctly inferior race. This is characteristic of all of South Central Europe at the present time. I am not sure that it is unique—not sure that it is a thing that you cannot find in every country, for I have heard just as severe things as these said in America by northern people of the southerners, and of southerners concerning the northern people. In fact it seems to me that in a very considerable degree there is unity among the people of this new kingdom. They are all very proud of their young King and have rallied about him in splendid style. He was recently married to a Princess of Rumania thus forming a very close bond of unity between the Kingdom of Rumania and the Kingdom of Jugo-Slavia. The young king and his bride are back in their kingdom now living in the Palace at Belgrade, which having been refurnished and redecorated makes a very handsome appearance standing as it does in the heart of the city.

There is much evidence of poverty in Belgrade. Very few of the people are well dressed, but everybody is at work. It is one of the busiest cities that I have seen anywhere. The city goes to bed early. At eleven o'clock there are but few people left in the cafes or on the street and by midnight there is hardly a person to be seen. Then they get up early to go to work. "Early to bed and early to rise" seems to be the rule. A friend said to me, "There is no virtue in going to bed early here, there is nothing to stay up for." But I remember being in Warsaw two years ago when it seemed that there was absolutely nothing to make one want to turn night into day, yet the usual time for dinner there was eleven o'clock at night. It seemed to me that the whole attitude of the Serbian people as well as their habits denoted a set purpose to get on in the world.

Although I saw many signs of poverty I saw not a single beggar in the city. Poor, ragged refugees and wounded men from the war, women with babies in their arms selling matches, flowers and favors were everywhere, but none were begging. In the restaurant at dinner on the second night of our stay a handsome old fellow came to our table to sell a paper. He spoke English, French, German. "And," as he said to us in his perfect English with a polished style, "fourteen other languages, but they do me little good." His clothes were ragged, but his fine face showed culture in every line. I asked my friend who he was and he told me that he was one of the Russian refugees—that he had been a general in the Russian army but was now being partially supported by the government and selling papers to eke out a slim existence. I could well believe he had been a man of rank and position, for just as Lear even in his rags was "every inch a king," so this poor old chap who must be nearly eighty years of age is "every inch a general."

Jugo-Slavia is caring for two hundred thousand Russian refugees. This new State out of its poverty is expending in relief for these people alone the colossal sum of five hundred thousand dinars a year, amounting in American money to seventy-five million dollars at the present rate of exchange. We in America have done much to relieve suffering in Europe, but we out of our abundance of wealth have done but little compared to what this nation is now doing.

I had the pleasure of meeting some of the leading men in Belgrade. I would put among the very first in this group the Prime Minister Pasitsch. He is an elderly man, I should think seventy-five years of age at least. He has a long white beard, impresses one as being a man of strength and of decisive character, and yet under the mask of his hard level-headed common sense there is a kindness that shows in every word and every gesture.

Another man who greatly interested me and one who stands very high in the present government is Dr. Janitch. I called on him at his home, but just as I was entering the door I met him coming out to attend a meeting of the National Educational Committee. He told me that he was on nearly every committee that has been set up within the last two years in Belgrade. He promised to meet me as soon as his committee was dismissed, and true to his promise came to the hotel in about an hour and a half. Janitch is the leading member of the Jugo-Slavian Council of the World Alliance. He is most attractive, full of energy and life, is well educated and has had a varied and interesting career. He has been in his time a member of a Monastic Order, an Orthodox Greek Priest, has sung in Grand Opera and served the Church in an official capacity outside of the regular life of the Priesthood. He joined the army at the time of the Balkan wars and fought several years—afterwards he went into the World War, and during its last years was transferred to London where he served as Chief of the Serbian Propaganda Bureau. After the Armistice he went into politics in earnest. He was elected to Parliament; is Secretary of this body, and as its Secretary is one of the recognized leaders of the radical party and right hand man of the prime minister. Janitch is a big man in every way and will go far in his chosen path of life. The Serbian is a natural born politician. The game of politics is the very breath of life to him. Much of the literature and most of the discussion turn on this all-engrossing question of politics. He is a good politician too. One of the stories told on Dr. Janitch which was put into a cartoon in a popular paper has to do with his extravagant promises to the people when he was running for office. Janitch showed me the picture and seemed highly pleased because I could see the humor in it. It is said that he was addressing a group of peasants in a small village in the very heart of the agricultural country. In his enthusiasm he said, "If you elect me to Parliament as your representative I will build you a very fine bridge over your river." "But," shouted one of the bewildered countrymen, "we have no river to build a bridge over." "Never mind that," replied Janitch, "Elect me and I will get you a river also."

Through the kindness of Dr. Janitch I was able to meet the Greek Minister in Belgrade, also the representative of Bulgaria, Rumania and the representative from Czecho-Slovakia, Markovitch. I called on Mr. Dodge the American Minister and found him a quiet, affable gentleman. All of these men expressed themselves as greatly interested in the effort to bring together the churches and church people of the nations. They all agreed that now was the time when the religious sentiment of the world must exert itself to save what is left of civilization. They were kind enough to give me letters of introduction and suggestions that greatly helped me in meeting the leaders of church and government in all the countries I visited.

As I left Belgrade it was with a different feeling in regard to the Serbians. It seems to me that in this nation we have the key to unlock all the Balkan questions. The relations between Serbia and her surrounding neighbors are not ideal, but from what I learned they are improving. One of the leaders expressed it this way, "With Italy we have correct relations, with Rumania and Greece we have cordial relations, with Bulgaria correct relations, with Austria correct, bordering on cordial, with Hungary correct for the present, but we fear she is our enemy." Somehow and in some way the relations between all these small nations must be made not only correct but cordial. The seeds of the great world war were sown here in the Balkans, and what a harvest we are reaping. The causes of war are still here. Serbia, I am satisfied, is trying to walk in a proper pathway. The little entente of which Serbia is the keystone has in it possibilities of a real solution which lies in the creation of a United States of the Balkans and Serbia I believe favors such a solution.,

An Italian's Experience in Smyrna

By Theodore Bortoli

[Before the Smyrna horrors, Theodore Bortoli was a wealthy young resident of Smyrna, of Italian nationality, a man of influence and weight. In the massacre he was bereft of practically all that he had. But as soon as the task of evacuating the survivors of Smyrna—about three hundred seventy-six thousand of them—was complete, Bortoli hurried to Naples and took the boat for America to plead that the refugees who had blood-relatives here, able to guarantee their support, might be allowed to land, and to try to arrange for the mass movement of the others to Canada and the various countries of South America.]

Representatives of the Federal Council of Churches, the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., and other organizations have endorsed his appeal. American Consul-General George Horton of Smyrna vouches for him. Though he has lost a large part of his fortune by the disaster he is devoting the balance to the relief of the refugees. Already he has made considerable progress with his plans.

When the Greek defeat occurred in Asia Minor and the Turks advanced Bortoli realized that there was some danger, but because of the friendly relations existing between the Turks of Smyrna and the Greeks and Armenians and because of the promises made by Kemal he hoped for the best. He did not believe a massacre possible.

When dark clouds foretelling the destruction of the city and the population began to arise on September 9, he took his two sisters to his country villa of Boudja, twenty-two miles outside the city, so that they might be safe while he put his mother on board a ship and made arrangements for their passage. They were armed, but because it was so far from Smyrna he believed they were safe and hardly needed the revolvers he gave them. Returning, he endeavored to take his mother to a place of safety on one of the warships in the harbor. She was an Italian citizen and entitled to the protection of the Italian warships.

Bortoli's story of the destruction of Smyrna, as reported by Arthur E. Hungerford, is as follows:]

Kemal's troops entered Smyrna quietly and in an orderly manner on September 9. Within half an hour the Greek Archbishop Chrisostomes was arrested by two Turkish officers and taken in an automobile to Konak, the palace of the Turkish commander. While passing through the Turkish quarter the Turkish population tried to remove him forcibly so that they might cut him to pieces.

The officer in command stopped the machine and told the crowd: "This man is a religious authority. He has been sentenced by our national government. He belongs neither to you nor to me." Upon arriving at the palace the Archbishop was introduced to the commander, who greeted him with the words: "You are welcome. I heard that in one year I was to be hanged. Your turn has now come."

The soldiers removed the Archbishop's clothes and put a white garment on him. The firing was done ten minutes later. Then they tied a rope around his neck, fastening the other end to the automobile, and paraded the Turkish quarter with his body dragging behind. Afterward he was cut into pieces by the infuriated rabble. Then came the turn of Tzouronchzoglon, director of the newspaper "La Reforme," who also was shot.

The Turks kept quiet for two days and the inhabitants of Smyrna thought the danger was over. No one dreamed of a general massacre in Smyrna. It seems now impossible to contemplate. It was on September 11 that I saw the Turks spraying the streets with oil from sprinklers. I saw Turkish soldiers visiting Armenian homes ostensibly searching for firearms but in fact they were secretly planting bombs in every house. They were quickly followed by other groups of Turkish soldiers who "discovered" the bombs. This was sufficient to massacre the inhabitants, rob their homes and set fire to their houses. They began killing at that time. The news spread quickly and the Armenians began to fill up their churches.

Any warship in the harbor could have prevented what followed had it fired two warning shots. None did so. After the massacre was under way only an army could have saved the people.

Many hundreds gathered for protection in the great Armenian Church of St. Stephano. Turks surrounded it and demanded its surrender. Some five hundred persons were killed while trying to escape. Then the Turks entered the church, sprinkled it with petroleum, set it on fire and all the rest perished in flames. The horror was repeated in two Greek churches containing many hundreds of Greeks, all of whom perished in the flames.

The whole Christian population sought the waterfront, placing themselves under the protection of sailors of different nations—France, Italy, England and America. Outside of American protection the others did nothing. The English could not help because every Englishman was shot on sight. To aid the spread of the fire the Turks threw bombs or hand grenades to feed it.

I went with my mother towards the quay to which everybody was fleeing. It was crowded. We turned and went down another street. Some Turkish soldiers came. Whether they knew we were Italians and whether they fired at us deliberately I do not know, but they did fire at us and my mother dropped at my feet with a hole through the center of her forehead.

I placed her body to one side and went for help. I secured the assistance of two American sailors. One of them was John McCrackin of the destroyer "Simpson." We moved her body to a place of safety.

Then I went for my sisters. My heart sank as I approached the villa. There were signs of destruction all around. As I entered the door I was almost overcome, for I saw that the place had been ransacked and what had not been carried off had been destroyed. The Turks had been there.

I called my sisters by name. They were young girls.

I ran from room to room and found them lying dead side by side. They had revolvers in their hands and I realized that they had killed themselves to save themselves from the Turks.

I heard a noise and found a woman, Eliza Garraventine, one of our servants, hidden in the upper part of the house. The Turks had reaped their vengeance on her, but she told me that my sisters had escaped by killing themselves. I dressed her in men's clothes and took her to Smyrna. Because of my Italian citizenship the Turkish commander gave me fifteen soldiers, for whom I had to pay fifteen pounds each, to serve as an escort while I buried my sisters and my mother.

My knowledge of English—I am a graduate of the International College at Smyrna and speak seven languages—enabled me to serve in American relief work. On the quays it was horrible to see the refugees crowded there with Turkish bands coming along and dragging the young girls from the arms of their mothers. Sometimes they carried them off, sometimes they pinned them to the debris with bayonets and assaulted them. They killed men whenever they pleased.

I saw some Turkish soldiers struggling with a man. I could not see his face but recognized from his coat sleeve that he was my brother. I picked up a big cobblestone and threw it with all my might. It hit a soldier on the head. I grabbed my brother by the arm and he screamed frightfully. I pulled him to the edge of the quay and jumped overboard with him.

The soldiers fired at us. We got on the other side of the English warship and in answer to my calls in English they pulled us up and my brother was saved. His arm had been broken in two places and that was why he screamed. Because he was an Italian he was taken to Naples on an Italian boat, but the things he saw drove him insane and he is in a sanitarium. Recently I got a cable telling me that because gangrene had developed in his arm it had been amputated. He is all that I have left.

Had it not been for the American destroyers I am convinced that not a soul would have been left alive in Smyrna, Dutch, French, Italian, English or American. One American was killed. The commander of the French warship "Le Tonquinnois" in the harbor was killed, though this news has not been published in France. The native guards at the British consulate were killed. I saw them nailed to the remains of the walls by bayonets, each holding a Turkish flag. Every Englishman found on the streets was killed.

Smyrna is dead.

I left Smyrna on October 14, leaving behind me hardly a Christian.

All the men from seventeen to forty-five have been sent to the interior by the Turks. The French have disgraced themselves forever. French officers promenaded arm in arm with Turkish officers. The French flag and the Turkish flag were flying side by side from the newly-occupied French consulate.

In the hope of reaching the Allied warships and thus escaping death hundreds of victims crowded into the large barges moored alongside the quay. I personally saw one of these barges containing five hundred persons set on fire by the Turks. The people perished. I have a photograph in my possession showing a tug flying the French flag towing one of these barges back to the quay where the men were separated from the women by the Turkish authorities and sent to the mountains.

I am an Italian citizen but I am ashamed of my country, for the Italians and the French did nothing to save a single soul. They will be condemned forever for their inaction and their refusal to help. I will have nothing further to do with my country. This will make many persons angry but it is the only thing I can do to impress upon them the great crime of Italy. The worst of it is that they will allow the same thing to occur in Constantinople and wherever the Turks hold possession should the Turks decide to massacre the Christians.

It was under the protection of American destroyers that the refugees were moved. Six ships for ten days carried refugees. The first ship at the quay took only two hours to load eight thousand persons. During this period three hundred seventy-six thousand men, women and children were carried from Smyrna. Hundreds of thousands of others have fled before the Turks and now more than a million of them are in Greece. Greece is an agricultural country that was barely able to take care of its own population of about five million persons. It is swamped by the new arrivals and cannot absorb them.

The Christians throughout Asia Minor are fleeing before the Turks and hundreds of thousands of additional refugees will land in Greece in addition to the million already there. Something must be done to relieve them. Havens of refuge for these people must be found.

Unless they are moved to other countries they will perish. Europe cannot take them because Europe is too poor as a result of the war. Their hope is the United States, Canada and the South American countries. I am appealing to America to accept at once the blood-relatives of Greeks and Armenians in this country who have promised to guarantee their support. I have appealed to the Canadian representatives and the ambassadors and ministers of the South American countries to receive these refugees. I believe they will do so, but each day of delay hundreds perish.

The Americas are the only place for them.

America is the hope of the situation.

The Faithful Many

"When I was West," recently wrote the secretary of the missionary organization, "I was impressed anew with a realization of the immense amount of unrecognized faithful service. I traveled almost eight thousand miles. Every train arrived on time. Fourteen nights I spent on sleepers, and I journeyed in safety. There was an unflinching watchfulness about me all the time,—human, not divine alone. I had a new sense of my dependence upon other men, and of their fidelity to me, and to thousands of others. Men who work for wages, work also for higher purposes and fit in with other plans, and make a social whole, which may well be called a divine economy."

A Prayer for Landlords

Few people are aware of the fact that the old English prayer book once contained a prayer for landlords. That is, the tenants did the praying and the ungodly landlords were supposed to be divinely influenced by the petitions to walk in the paths of righteousness. Just why the prayer was discarded, is not known. Maybe the landlords had something to do with that; but, at any rate, we are informed that it does not appear in the modern Anglican prayer book. On the other hand, the tenants may have decided that it was useless to pray for the landlords, and determined to devote their supplications to seeking grace for themselves alone. To be perfectly fair, we think there are some tenants that need praying for quite as much as some landlords. Anyway, it is said that in the "Prayer Book of Edward VI." the following appears:

"We heartily pray Thee to send Thy Holy Spirit into the hearts of them that possess the grounds and pastures of the earth, that they, remembering themselves to be Thy tenants, may not rack or stretch out the rents of their houses and lands, nor yet take unreasonable fines or moneys, after the manner of covetous worldlings, but may so let them out that the inhabitants thereof may be able to pay the rents and to live, and nourish their families, and remember the poor. Give them grace also to consider that they, too, are but strangers and pilgrims in this world, having here no dwelling place but seeking one to come; that they, remembering the short continuance of this life, may be content with that which is sufficient, and not join house to house and land to land, to the impoverishment of others, but may so behave themselves in letting their tenants, lands and pastures, that after this life they may be received into everlasting habitations. Amen."

Index

July-December, 1922

- ACHIEVEMENT OF THE CO-OPERATIVE COMMONWEALTH, THE.
Mrs. James P. Warbasse, p. 806.
- ACROSS THE CONTINENT.
Peter Ainslie, p. 666.
- AINSLIE, PETER.
Across the Continent, p. 666; The Church's Evangelization of Itself, p. 695.
- AKED, CHARLES F.
Is the Labor Union Sacrosanct, p. 543.
- ALLEN, WILLIAM C.
Christianity in China, p. 336; The Golden Glory, p. 8; Human Orchids, p. 601; Why, p. 197.
- AMBASSADORS OF GOOD WILL, THE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 153.
- AMERICA THE LAND OF UNKNOWN DESTINY, I & II.
Fred B. Smith, pp. 233, 265.
- AMERICA AND THE WAR DEBTS.
John Grier Hibben, p. 739.
- AMERICAN COUNTRY LIFE ASSOCIATION, THE.
p. 649.
- AMERICAN PREACHER IN AN ENGLISH PULPIT, AN.
Frederick Lynch, p. 43.
- AMERICA'S CONTRIBUTION TO EUROPE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 764.
- AMPLER PURITANISM, THE.
Lynn Harold Hough, p. 637.
- ANGLICAN AND THE ORTHODOX CHURCH, THE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 101.
- ANSWER OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, THE, I & II.
Fred B. Smith, pp. 334, 364.
- ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.
Sermon to the League of Nations, I & II, pp. 391, 412.
- ASHWORTH, ROBERT A.
The Need of Religion in Social Service, p. 217.
- ATTACK ON DR. FOSDICK, THE.
Henry S. Huntington, p. 504.
- ATTERBURY, ANSON P.
The Opening Service of the Assembly of the League, p. 396.
- AUSTRIAN LOAN, THE.
Carl Beth, p. 744.
- AUTUMN DAYS.
Harriet M. Hodgman, p. 295.
- BAILEY, W. L.
The Town as a Field of Church Work, p. 778.
- BAINES-GRIFFITHS, WALTER.
Real India: A Series of Letters, pp. 84, 114, 171, 219.
- BAKER, PAUL E.
The Proctorship, p. 22.
- BARRATT, ALFRED.
Children's Sermon, pp. 29, 117, 172, 309, 341, 491.
- BASIS OF CHURCH UNION, THE.
Bernard J. Snell, p. 155.
- BEFORE AND AFTER TAKING.
R. H. Rolofson, p. 714.
- BELOVED PHYSICIAN, THE.
Howard Chandler Robbins, p. 569.
- BERRY, CLEMENT.
The Gap in the Wall, p. 580.
- BERRY, SIDNEY M.
The Example of Jesus, p. 442; A Letter from England, pp. 398, 709.
- BETH, CARL.
The Austrian Loan, p. 744; A Letter from Austria, p. 170.
- BISHOP'S ENCYCLICAL, THE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 406.
- BRENT, CHARLES H.
The Call to the Church to Develop a Christian International Life, p. 801; The Peace of Christ, p. 541.
- BRIMELOW, JAMES A.
Children's Sermon, pp. 221, 553.
- BRITAIN FOUR YEARS AFTER THE WAR.
Charles E. Jefferson, p. 642.
- BRITAIN'S ATTITUDE TOWARD US.
Charles E. Jefferson, p. 707.
- BRITISH EMPIRE, THE: THE LAND OF UNFAILING COURAGE, I & II.
Fred B. Smith, pp. 184, 208.
- BRITISH INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS.
Alva W. Taylor, p. 280.
- BROWN, CHARLOTTE HAWKINS.
A Negro View, p. 165.
- CADMAN, S. PARKES.
The Final Faith, p. 471.
- CALL TO THE CHURCH TO DEVELOP A CHRISTIAN INTERNATIONAL LIFE, THE.
C. H. Brent, p. 801.
- CAMPAIGN FOR INTER-AMERICAN FRIENDSHIP, A.
Samuel Guy Inman, p. 728.
- CAN WE FOLLOW JESUS TODAY?
Fred K. Stamm, p. 359.
- CAN THE OLD FAITH LIVE WITH THE NEW KNOWLEDGE.
R. F. Horton, p. 792.
- CERTAIN EMPHASES REQUIRED FOR THE TRAINING OF MODERN MINISTERS.
U. L. Mackey, p. 249.
- CHAMBERS, S. D.
Children's Article, p. 371.
- CHANGE.
N. S. Thomas, p. 131.
- CHILD AND NATIONALISM, THE.
T. Rhondda Williams, p. 207.
- CHILD REPRESSION.
T. Rhondda Williams, p. 182.
- CHILDREN'S ARTICLES.
pp. 85, 117, 172, 196, 221, 253, 286, 371, 372, 458, 490, 524.
- CHILDREN'S SERMONS.
pp. 29, 85, 117, 172, 221, 309, 341, 491, 553, 651, 747.
- CHORLEY, E. CLOWES.
The General Convention of the Episcopal Church, pp. 325, 502.
- CHRISTIAN CRUSADE FOR A WARLESS WORLD, THE.
Sidney L. Gulick, p. 369.
- CHRISTIAN SOLUTION, THE, I & II.
Sherwood Eddy, pp. 664, 697.
- CHRISTIAN TREATMENT FOR MEXICO, A.
Sidney L. Gulick, p. 408.
- CHRISTIANITY IN CHINA.
William C. Allen, p. 336.
- CHRISTIANITY AND ECONOMIC PROBLEMS: HOW CAN INDUSTRY BE MADE TO PRODUCE MORE GOODS AND BETTER PEOPLE?
p. 52.
- CHRISTIANITY AND ECONOMIC PROBLEMS: WHAT CHANGES IN CONTROL WOULD MOST BENEFIT INDUSTRY?
p. 110.
- CHRISTIANITY AND ECONOMIC PROBLEMS: WHY IS PRESENT PRODUCTION INADEQUATE?
p. 27.
- CHRISTIANITY, A FORCE IN NATIONAL LIFE.
W. A. Curtis, p. 45.
- CHRISTMAS PRAYER FOR PEACE, A.
p. 705.
- CHURCH IS A COMMUNITY ASSET, THE.
Benson Y. Landis, p. 57.

- CHURCH'S EVANGELIZATION OF ITSELF, THE.
Peter Ainslie, p. 695.
- CHURCH LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY, THE.
Richard Wallace Hogue, p. 331.
- CHURCH AND THE PRESENT INTERNATIONAL CRISIS, THE.
E. Guy Talbott, p. 503.
- CHURCH AS THE SEAT OF AUTHORITY IN RELIGION, THE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 38.
- CITY TEMPLE, THE.
Charles E. Jefferson, p. 773.
- CLARK, FRANCIS E.
Some Surprises in the Europe of Today, p. 306.
- CLEAN UP CAMPAIGN IN CHINA, A.
Eugene A. Turner, p. 618.
- CLEMENCEAU IN NEW YORK.
Frederick Lynch, p. 699.
- CLIFFORD, JOHN.
Making Disciples, p. 237.
- COLLEGE AND RELIGIOUS EDUCATION, THE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 383.
- CONFERENCE OF LIFE AND WORK OF THE CHURCHES, THE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 321.
- CONTINENTAL EUROPE SUFFERING FROM ACUTE NERVOUS PROSTRATION, I & II.
Fred B. Smith, pp. 40, 73.
- CO-ORDINATING THE RELIGIOUS FORCES OF AMERICA.
Frederick Lynch, p. 667.
- COPENHAGEN.
Frederick Lynch, p. 10.
- COUNTRY MINISTER'S VACATION, A SYMPOSIUM, THE.
p. 15.
- CRANE-KING REPORT ON TURKEY, I & II.
pp. 742, 775.
- CREED FOR A WARLESS WORLD, A.
p. 705.
- CULTURE OF PRAYER, THE.
Edith Armstrong Talbot, p. 670.
- CURTIS, W. A.
Christianity, a Force in National Life, p. 45.
- DEFENCE OF FRANCE IN THE NEAR EAST, A.
Andre Monod, p. 745.
- DELAYED CHRISTMAS, THE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 759.
- DEISSMANN, D. ADOLF.
When Cometh the Kingdom of God, p. 354.
- DENNY, MARY PUTNAM.
Children's Article, pp. 286, 372, 524.
- DICKINSON, WILLOUGHBY.
Religious and Racial Minorities, p. 771.
- DISARMAMENT.
William I. Hull, p. 336.
- DR. FRANK W. NORWOOD.
Linley V. Gordon, p. 138.
- DU MAURIER, EUGENIA.
Children's Article, p. 221.
- DURHAM, PLATO T.
War, Force and Police, p. 702.
- EDDY, SHERWOOD.
The Christian Solution, I & II, pp. 664, 697; The Faith of a Modern Christian, p. 795; Is Our Religion Worth Exporting, p. 472; Propaganda and the Press, p. 96; The Race Problem, p. 151.
- EDE, W. MOORE.
The Gospel and Politics, p. 668; Unity and Authority of the Church, p. 302.
- EDUCATION FOR DEMOCRACY.
William Allen Harper, p. 239.
- EGAR, JOHN H.
The Religious Basis of Business, p. 97.
- ELDRIDGE, L. EUGENIE.
Children's Article, p. 172.
- EUROPE AND AMERICA IN ONE ROOM.
Frederick Lynch, p. 298.
- EXAMPLE OF JESUS, THE.
Sidney M. Berry, p. 442.
- FAITH OF A MODERN CHRISTIAN, THE.
Sherwood Eddy, p. 795.
- "FALL IN," THE WORLD CALL, I & II.
Lee Vrooman, pp. 23, 51.
- FEDERAL COUNCIL AT INDIANAPOLIS, THE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 799.
- FELLOWSHIP IN INDUSTRY.
Harold A. Hatch, p. 47.
- FERRIN, ALLAN C.
Have We a Balanced Conception of God? p. 187.
- FIGHT FOR PEACE, THE.
David Lloyd George, p. 244.
- FINAL FAITH, THE.
S. Parkes Cadman, p. 471.
- FOREIGN POLICY OF THE CHURCHES: A WORD OF EXPLANATION, THE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 635.
- FOSDICK, HARRY EMERSON.
Jesus, the Revelation of God, p. 603.
- FRENCH HUGUENOT VIEW OF THE NEAR EAST PROBLEM, A.
Georges Gallienne, p. 703.
- FROM CZECHOSLOVAKIA.
p. 284.
- GALLIENNE, GEORGES.
A French Huguenot View of the Near East Problem, p. 703.
- GAMBLING: IS IT RIGHT OR WRONG?
R. F. Horton, p. 797.
- GAP IN THE WALL, THE.
Clement Berry, p. 580.
- GARVE, A. E.
Is Reunion Worth While? p. 157.
- GENERAL CONVENTION OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH, THE.
E. Clowes Chorley, pp. 325, 502.
- GEORGE, DAVID LLOYD.
The Fight for Peace, p. 244.
- GOD KEPT WAITING.
T. Rhondda Williams, p. 39.
- GOD OF NATURE AND OF THE MORAL LIFE, THE.
T. Rhondda Williams, p. 566.
- GOD THE RESTORER.
J. D. Jones, p. 103.
- GOLDEN GLORY, THE.
William C. Allen, p. 8.
- GORDON, GIFFORD.
pp. 444, 483.
- GORDON, LINLEY V.
Dr. Frank W. Norwood, p. 138.
- GOSPEL AND POLITICS, THE.
W. Moore Ede, p. 668.
- GRAVES, A. G.
The Mettle of the American, p. 308.
- GREEK AS GREEK.
Charles Hatch Sears, p. 303.
- GROSE, HOWARD B.
The Y. M. C. A. Convention at Atlantic City, p. 693.
- GULICK, SIDNEY L.
The Christian Crusade for a Warless World, p. 369; A Christian Treatment for Mexico, p. 408; Japan's New Policies, p. 538.
- HAMILTON, KENNETH G.
Various "Teachers" Among the Heathen, p. 338.
- HAMMOND, W. E.
Jesus and Religious Institutions, p. 568.
- HARPER, RALPH M.
The Various Elements in the Episcopal Church, p. 327.
- HARPER, WILLIAM ALLEN.
Education for Democracy, p. 239.
- HATCH, HAROLD A.
Fellowship in Industry, p. 47.
- HAVE WE A BALANCED CONCEPTION OF GOD?
Allan C. Ferrin, p. 187.
- HENRY VAN DYKE, FISHERMAN.
Tertius Van Dyke, p. 13.
- HIBBEN, JOHN GRIER.
America and the War Debts, p. 739.
- HILLIS, NEWELL DWIGHT.
Why Impossible to be an Infidel, p. 80.
- HOCKING, JOSEPH.
The Passion for Life, p. 25.
- HODGMAN, HARRIET M.
Autumn Days, p. 295.
- HOGUE, RALPH WALLACE.
The Church League for Industrial Democracy, p. 331.
- HOLD FAST AMERICA, I & II.
Gifford Gordon, pp. 444, 483.
- HOLLING, T. E.
Children's Sermons, pp. 651, 747.
- HOLY SPIRIT, THE.
T. Rhondda Williams, p. 72.

- HOOKER, ELIZABETH.
Migrants at Canneries in Harford County, Maryland, p. 140.
- HORTON, R. F.
Can the Old Faith Live with the New Knowledge, p. 792; Gambling: Is It Right or Wrong, p. 797.
- HOUGH, LYNN HAROLD
The Ampler Puritanism, p. 637.
- HULL, WILLIAM I.
Disarmament, p. 355.
- HUMAN ORCHIDS.
William C. Allen, p. 601.
- HUMPHREY, HELEN.
A Prayer Meeting Program, p. 336.
- HUNTINGTON, ELLSWORTH.
The Open Door for the World, p. 726.
- HUNTINGTON, HENRY S.
The Attack on Dr. Fosdick, p. 504; What Should a Christian America Do for the Near East? p. 382.
- IMPRESSIONS OF THE ORIENT.
Robert E. Speer, p. 211.
- IN THE "DANGER ZONE" OF THE DARDANELLES, THE BOSPHORUS AND CONSTANTINOPLE, I & II.
Fred B. Smith, pp. 98, 127.
- INDIAN AND THE GOVERNMENT, THE.
G. E. E. Lindquist, p. 167.
- INFLUENCE OF ITALIAN AMERICANS ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE OF AMERICA, THE.
Charles Hatch Sears, p. 162.
- INMAN, SAMUEL GUY.
A Campaign for Inter-American Friendship, p. 728.
- INTERNATIONAL PROTESTANT CHURCH CONGRESS FOR INVESTIGATING THE CONDITION OF PROTESTANTISM IN EUROPE, THE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 296.
- INTERPRETATION OF THE NOVEMBER ELECTIONS, THE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 661.
- INVESTIGATING THE MOVIES, I & II.
Charles N. Lathrop, pp. 113, 169.
- IS THE LABOR UNION SACROSANCT?
Charles F. Aked, p. 543.
- IS THE PROTESTANT CHURCH PASSING? THE REMEDY.
Clarence E. Macartney, p. 191.
- IS OUR RELIGION WORTH EXPORTING?
Sherwood Eddy, p. 472.
- IS REUNION WORTH WHILE?
A. E. Garvie, p. 157.
- JAPAN'S NEW POLICIES.
Sidney L. Gulick, p. 538.
- JEFFERSON, CHARLES E.
Britain Four Years After the War, p. 642; Britain's Attitude Towards Us, p. 707; The City Temple, p. 773; The Need of Interpretation, p. 607; Religious Life in Britain, p. 804; The Spirit of Christ, p. 270.
- JENNINGS, J. W.
Children's Articles, p. 490.
- JESUS AND RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS.
W. E. Hammond, p. 568.
- JESUS, THE REVELATION OF GOD.
Harry Emerson Fosdick, p. 603.
- JONES, J. D.
God the Restorer, p. 103.
- JONES, M. ASHBY.
War, Force and Police, p. 702.
- JONES, RUFUS M.
The Prophet and His Tragedies, pp. 440, 730; The Search for a Refuge, p. 630; Where the Beyond Breaks Through, p. 662.
- JOWETT, J. H.
What Has the Church of Christ to Say? p. 394; What Will the Churches Do? p. 478.
- JOY IN THE JOY OF OTHERS.
T. Rhondda Williams, p. 294.
- KEEPING THE SOUL ALIVE.
T. Rhondda Williams, p. 695.
- KELLER, ADOLF.
Relief Work for Protestant Churches in Europe, p. 647.
- LABOR SUNDAY MESSAGE FOR 1922.
p. 263.
- LADY ASTOR'S IMPRESSIONS OF AMERICA.
Frederick Lynch, p. 129.
- LAND OF WANDERING, THE.
T. Rhondda Williams, p. 320.
- LANDIS, BENSON Y.
The Church is a Community Asset, p. 56.
- LATHROP, CHARLES N.
Investigating the Movies, I & II, pp. 113, 169; Problems in Regulating Movies, p. 137; Recommendations of the Movie Survey, p. 194.
- LETTER FROM AUSTRIA, A.
Carl Beth, p. 170.
- LETTER FROM ENGLAND, A.
Sidney M. Berry, pp. 398, 709.
- LETTER FROM PARIS, A.
Wilfred Monod, p. 115.
- LEVERMORE, CHARLES H.
The Third Assembly of the League of Nations, p. 510.
- LIGHT IS BREAKING IN.
Frederick Lynch, p. 470.
- LINDQUIST, G. E. E.
The Indian and the Government, p. 167.
- LINES, EDWIN S.
Take Your Journey, p. 322.
- LITERARY SUPPLEMENT.
pp. 275, 418, 511, 573, 674.
- LIVERMORE, MARY W.
Children's Article, pp. 85, 117.
- LIVING BY THE FAITH OF OTHERS.
p. 760.
- LOYD GEORGE AND THE CHURCHES.
Frederick Lynch, p. 236.
- LOYD GEORGE ON MAZZINI.
Frederick Lynch, p. 209.
- LOYD GEORGE AND RUSSIA.
Frederick Lynch, p. 78.
- LOVER OF THE BEAUTIFUL, A.
Frederick Lynch, p. 390.
- LYNCH, FREDERICK.
The Ambassadors of Good Will, p. 153; America's Contribution to Europe, p. 764; An American Preacher in an English Pulpit, p. 43; The Anglican and the Orthodox Church, p. 101; The Bishop's Encyclical, p. 408; The Church as the Seat of Authority in Religion, p. 38; Clemenceau in New York, p. 699; The College and Religious Education, p. 383; The Conference on Life and Work of the Churches, p. 321; Co-ordinating the Religious Forces of America, p. 667; Copenhagen, p. 10; The Delayed Christmas, p. 759; Europe and America in One Room, p. 298; The Federal Council at Indianapolis, p. 799; The Foreign Policy of the Churches, p. 635; The International Protestant Church Congress for Investigating the Condition of Protestantism in Europe, p. 297; The Interpretation of the November Elections, p. 661; Lady Astor's Impressions of America, p. 129; Light is Breaking in, p. 470; Lloyd George and the Churches, p. 236; Lloyd George on Mazzini, p. 209; Lloyd George and Russia, p. 78; A Lover of the Beautiful, p. 390; Lyman Abbott, Personal Reminiscences, p. 601; Lyman Abbott, Some Cherished Memories, p. 540; Margot Asquith's Impressions of America, p. 731; Music in England, p. 352; No More War, p. 206; "No More War" Movement, p. 186; On Minding One's Own Business, pp. 350, 598; The Opportunities of the Ministry, p. 94; The Persecuted Minorities, p. 318; The President and World Responsibilities, p. 791; Religion Before the Christian Era, p. 506; The Report of the Joint Conference of Anglicans and Churchmen on the Lambeth Appeal, p. 70; The Response to Dr. Jowett, p. 535; School Boys and the Ministry, p. 441; Simplifying Great Books for Children, p. 567; The Situation in Ireland, p. 126; Some Observations in Germany, p. 236; Thanksgiving, p. 629; The Tragedy in the Near East, p. 474; A Week of Conference, p. 268; What Mr. Chesterton Saw in America, p. 410; Will the Church Rise to Dr. Jowett's Challenge, p. 438.
- LYMAN ABBOTT: PERSONAL REMINISCENCES.
Frederick Lynch, p. 601.
- LYMAN ABBOTT: SOME CHERISHED MEMORIES.
Frederick Lynch, p. 540.
- MACARTNEY, CLARENCE E.
Is the Protestant Church Passing? The Remedy, p. 191.

- MACFARLAND, CHARLES S.
A Nation's Opportunity, p. 633.
- MACKEY, U. L.
Certain Emphases Required for the Training of Modern Ministers, p. 249.
- MAKING DISCIPLES.
John Clifford, p. 237.
- MARGOT ASQUITH'S IMPRESSIONS OF AMERICA.
Frederick Lynch, p. 731.
- MCCALL, OSWALD W. S.
The Way of the Immortals, p. 11.
- MCCLURE, JAMES G. K.
A Symposium on "The Gap in the Wall," p. 814.
- MEAD, LUCIA AMES.
Responsibility for the War, p. 183; Samuel Adams: Prophet of International Justice, p. 351; Why the Peace Treaties Need Revision, p. 617.
- MERRILL, WILLIAM P.
Revising our Conception of Stewardship, p. 584.
- METTLE OF THE AMERICAN, THE.
A. G. Graves, p. 308.
- MIGRANTS AT CANNERIES IN HARTFORD COUNTY, MARYLAND.
Elizabeth Hooker, p. 140.
- MILLER, KENNETH P.
Of Austrian Currency, Roman Priests and Waldensians, p. 550.
- MILLS, JOHN NELSON.
A Royal Actor and Playwright, p. 55.
- MINISTERING CHURCH, THE.
p. 600.
- MISREPRESENTING JAPAN.
Frederick Starr, p. 158.
- MISSIONARY BARRELS.
Mrs. J. B. Rideout, p. 614.
- MITCHELL, E. KNOX JR.
"Fall In," the World Call, p. 51.
- MOHAMMEDAN WOMEN, I & II.
John T. Theodore, pp. 454, 486.
- MONOD, ANDRE.
A Defence of France in the Near East, p. 745.
- MONOD, WILFRED.
A Letter from Paris; The Protestant Week, p. 115; The Relations Between French and German Protestants, p. 456.
- MOORE, JOHN M.
The Spiritual Discoveries of Twenty-five Years, p. 507.
- MORAL SIDE OF AMERICA'S WORLD POSITION, THE.
E. Y. Mullins, p. 700.
- MUDGE, WILLIAM L.
The Value and Possibilities of Country Church Federations, p. 711.
- MULLINS, E. Y.
The Moral Side of America's World Position, p. 700.
- MUSIC IN ENGLAND.
Frederick Lynch, p. 352.
- MY EXPERIENCE IN CHURCH ADVERTISING.
William M. Young, p. 282.
- NATION'S OPPORTUNITY, A.
Charles S. Macfarland, p. 633.
- NEED OF INTERPRETATION, THE.
Charles E. Jefferson, p. 607.
- NEED OF RELIGION IN SOCIAL SERVICE, THE.
Robert A. Ashworth, p. 217.
- NEGRO VIEW, A.
Charlotte Hawkins Brown, p. 165.
- NEWTON, JOSEPH FORT.
The Prophetic Day, p. 766.
- NEXT STEP IN RELIGION, THE.
David R. Piper, p. 366.
- NICHE OF JESUS CHRIST, THE.
W. Robertson Nicoll, p. 210.
- NICOLL, W. ROBERTSON.
The Niche of Jesus Christ, p. 210; The Reading of the Bible, p. 232.
- NO MORE WAR.
Frederick Lynch, p. 206.
- "NO MORE WAR" MOVEMENT.
Frederick Lynch, p. 186.
- NO SUBSTITUTE FOR RELIGION.
T. Rhondda Williams, p. 407.
- NORWOOD, FREDERICK W.
Without Conscience no Reformation, p. 475.
- OF AUSTRIAN CURRENCY, ROMAN PRIESTS AND WALDENSIAINS.
Kenneth P. Miller, p. 550.
- ON MINDING ONE'S OWN BUSINESS.
Frederick Lynch, pp. 350, 598.
- ON THE TRAIL OF THE PEACEMAKERS: CONCLUSIONS.
Fred B. Smith, p. 384.
- ONE BOOK A WEEK.
Bible Plays, p. 373; China at the Conferences, p. 58; The Church in America, p. 554; The Crisis of the Churches, p. 492; Great Missionaries for Young People, p. 780; The Jesuits, 1534-1921, p. 174; Labor: The Giant With the Feet of Clay, p. 142; The Legacy of Greece, p. 342; The Life and Letters of Walter H. Page, p. 748; Memoirs of the Crown Prince of Germany, p. 30; My Discovery of England, p. 310; On the Trail of the Peacemakers, p. 459; The Play Movement, p. 373; Random Memories, p. 118; Religion and the Future Life, p. 652; The Revolt Against Civilization, p. 715; Sex and Common Sense, p. 222; Shall It Be Again, p. 198; A Sheaf of Books on Preaching, p. 620; Social Work in the Churches, p. 254; The Use of Art in Religion, p. 373; The Victory of God, p. 86.
- OPEN DOOR FOR THE WORLD, THE.
Ellsworth Huntington, p. 726.
- OPENING SERVICE OF THE ASSEMBLY OF THE LEAGUE, THE.
Anson P. Atterbury, p. 396.
- OPPORTUNITIES OF THE MINISTRY, THE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 94.
- OUR ATTITUDE TOWARDS THE RUSSIAN CHURCH.
p. 631.
- PASSION FOR LIFE, THE.
Joseph Hocking, p. 25.
- PASTORAL LETTER OF THE BISHOPS OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH, THE.
p. 428.
- PATTISON, H. A.
Social Service and the Church, p. 246.
- PEACE OF CHRIST, THE.
Charles H. Brent, p. 541.
- PERSECUTED MINORITIES, THE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 318.
- PIPER, DAVID R.
The Next Step in Religion, p. 366.
- POSSIBILITIES OF "A RELIGIOUS BLOC," THE.
Fred B. Smith, p. 789.
- PRAYER MEETING PROGRAM, A.
Helen Humphrey, p. 336.
- PRESBYTERIANS OF NORTHERN MEXICO, THE.
W. Reginald Wheeler, p. 681.
- PRESIDENT AND WORLD RESPONSIBILITIES, THE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 791.
- PROBLEMS IN REGULATING MOVIES.
Charles N. Lathrop, p. 137.
- PROCTORSHIP, THE.
Paul E. Baker, p. 22.
- PROPAGANDA AND THE PRESS.
Sherwood Eddy, p. 96.
- PROPHET AND HIS TRAGEDIES, THE.
Rufus M. Jones, pp. 440, 730.
- PROPHETIC DAY, THE.
Joseph Fort Newton, p. 766.
- RACE PROBLEM, THE.
Sherwood Eddy, p. 151.
- RADIO IN THE COUNTRY CHURCH.
p. 339.
- READING OF THE BIBLE, THE.
W. Robertson Nicoll, p. 232.
- REAL INDIA: A SERIES OF LETTERS.
Walter Baines-Griffiths, pp. 84, 114, 171, 219.
- RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE MOVIE SURVEY.
Charles N. Lathrop, p. 194.
- RELATIONS BETWEEN FRENCH AND GERMAN PROTESTANTS, THE.
Wilfred Monod, p. 456.
- RELIEF WORK FOR PROTESTANT CHURCHES.
Adolf Keller, p. 647.
- RELIGION BEFORE THE CHRISTIAN ERA.
Frederick Lynch, p. 506.
- RELIGIOUS BASIS OF BUSINESS, THE.
John H. Egar, p. 97.
- RELIGIOUS LIFE IN BRITAIN.
Charles E. Jefferson, p. 804.
- RELIGIOUS AND RACIAL MINORITIES.
Willoughby Dickinson, p. 771.

- REPORT OF THE CONFERENCE OF ANGLICANS AND FREE CHURCHMEN ON THE LAMBETH APPEAL. p. 82.
- REPORT OF THE JOINT CONFERENCE OF ANGLICANS AND CHURCHMEN ON THE LAMBETH APPEAL, THE. Frederick Lynch, p. 70.
- RESPONSE TO DR. JOWETT, THE. Frederick Lynch, p. 535.
- RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE WAR. Lucia Ames Mead, p. 183.
- RESURRECTION OF THE SPIRITUAL LIFE, THE. T. Rhondda Williams, p. 262.
- RESURRECTION OF THE UNITAS FRATrum, THE. Harry E. Stocker, p. 20.
- REVISING OUR CONCEPTION OF STEWARDSHIP. William P. Merrill, p. 584.
- RIDEOUT, MRS. J. B. Missionary Barrels, p. 614.
- RIDGEWAY, WILLIS EVERETT. The Road to Bethlehem, p. 762.
- RIGGS, ERNEST W. A Vision That Failed and a Vision That Must not Fail, p. 727.
- ROAD TO BETHLEHEM, THE. Willis Everett Ridgeway, p. 762.
- ROBBINS, HOWARD CHANDLER. The Beloved Physician, p. 569.
- ROLOFSON, R. H. Before and After Taking, p. 714.
- ROYAL ACTOR AND PLAYWRIGHT, A. John Nelson Mills, p. 55.
- RURAL PARSON, THE. Alva W. Taylor, p. 586.
- RUSHMORE, JULIA CARTER. Children's Article, p. 253.
- SAMUEL ADAMS: PROPHET OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE. Lucia Ames Mead, p. 351.
- SCHOOL BOYS AND THE MINISTRY. Frederick Lynch, p. 441.
- SCHOOL AND CHURCH IN HOLCOMB. p. 252.
- SEAL OF THE SPIRIT, THE. p. 539.
- SEARCH FOR A REFUGE, THE. Rufus M. Jones, p. 630.
- SEARS, CHARLES HATCH. Greek as Greek, p. 303; The Influence of Italian-Americans on the Religious Life of America, p. 162.
- SELF-VALUATIONS OF PAUL. T. Rhondda Williams, p. 150.
- SERMON TO THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS, I & II. Archbishop of Canterbury, pp. 391, 412.
- SIMPLIFYING GREAT BOOKS FOR CHILDREN. Frederick Lynch, p. 567.
- SITUATION IN IRELAND, THE. Frederick Lynch, p. 126.
- SITUATION IN RUSSIA, THE. John Sheridan Zelle, p. 809.
- SMITH, FRED H. America the Land of Unknown Destiny, I & II, pp. 233, 265; The Answer of the Christian Church, I & II, pp. 334, 364; The British Empire, the Land of Unfailing Courage, I & II, pp. 184, 208; Continental Europe Suffering from Acute Nervous Prostration, I & II, pp. 40, 73; In the "Danger Zone" of the Dardanelles, the Bosphorus and Constantinople, I & II, pp. 98, 127; On the Trail of the Peacemakers, Conclusion, p. 384; The Possibilities of a "Religious Bloc," p. 789.
- SNELL, BERNARD J. The Basis of Church Union, p. 155.
- SOCIAL DANCING IN CHURCH PARISH HOUSES. Helen Ward Tippy, p. 107.
- SOCIAL SERVICE AND THE CHURCH. H. A. Pattison, p. 246.
- SOCIETY OF FRIENDS TODAY, THE. Charles E. Tebbetts, p. 736.
- SOME OBSERVATIONS IN GERMANY. Frederick Lynch, p. 236.
- SOME SURPRISES IN THE EUROPE OF TODAY. Francis E. Clark, p. 306.
- SPEER, ROBERT E. Impressions of the Orient, p. 211; Whose We Are, p. 572.
- SPIRIT OF CHRIST, THE. Charles E. Jefferson, p. 270.
- SPIRITUAL DISCOVERIES OF TWENTY-FIVE YEARS. John M. Moore, p. 507.
- STAMM, FRED K. Can We Follow Jesus Today, p. 359.
- STARR, FREDERICK. Misrepresenting Japan, p. 158.
- STEVENSON, J. SINCLAIR. Children's Article, p. 196.
- STEWARDSHIP IN GETTING, THE SOLUTION. p. 613.
- STEWARDSHIP AND PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS. p. 611.
- STOCKER, HARRY E. The Resurrection of the Unitas Fratrum, p. 20.
- STONES MADE READY. T. Rhondda Williams, p. 536.
- SUMMER SCHOOL FOR TOWN AND COUNTRY MINISTERS. p. 195.
- SUMNER, MARY C. Training Yugoslav Leaders in America, p. 547.
- SYMPOSIUM ON "THE GAP IN THE WALL." James G. K. McClure, p. 814.
- TAKE YOUR JOURNEY. Edwin S. Lines, p. 322.
- TALBOT, EDITH ARMSTRONG. The Culture of Prayer, p. 670.
- TALBOTT, E. GUY. The Church and the Present International Crisis, p. 503.
- TAYLOR, ALVA W. British Industrial Progress, p. 280; The Rural Parson, p. 586.
- TEBBETTS, CHARLES E. The Society of Friends Today, p. 736.
- THANKSGIVING. Frederick Lynch, p. 629.
- THAT WHICH IS FOREVER. T. Rhondda Williams, p. 6.
- THEODORE, JOHN T. Mohammedan Women, I & II, pp. 454, 486.
- THIRD ASSEMBLY OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS, THE. Charles H. Levermore, p. 510.
- THOMAS, N. S. Change, p. 131.
- TIPPY, HELEN WARD. Social Dancing in Church Parish Houses, p. 107.
- TOWN AS A FIELD OF CHURCH WORK, THE. W. L. Bailey, p. 778.
- TRAGEDY IN THE NEAR EAST, THE. Frederick Lynch, p. 474.
- TRAINING YUGOSLAV LEADERS IN AMERICA. Mary C. Sumner, p. 547.
- TURNER, EUGENE A. A Clean Up Campaign in China, p. 618.
- UNITY AND AUTHORITY OF THE CHURCH, THE. W. Moore Ede, p. 302.
- VALUE AND POSSIBILITIES OF COUNTRY CHURCH FEDERATIONS, THE. William L. Mudge, p. 711.
- VAN DYKE, TERTIUS. Henry Van Dyke, Fisherman, p. 13.
- VAN EPS, FRANK S. Your Right to be Happy, p. 733.
- VARIOUS ELEMENTS IN THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH, THE. Ralph M. Harper, p. 327.
- VARIOUS "TEACHERS" AMONG THE HEATHEN. Kenneth G. Hamilton, p. 338.
- VICTORY FOR LIBERTY AT THE BAPTIST CONVENTION, THE. p. 8.
- VISION THAT FAILED AND A VISION THAT MUST NOT FAIL. A. Ernest W. Riggs, p. 727.
- VROOMAN, LEE. "Fall In," the World Call, p. 23.
- WARBASSE, MRS. JAMES P. The Achievement of the Co-operative Commonwealth, p. 806.
- WASTE AND EFFICIENCY IN RURAL RELIGION. p. 488.

- WATSON, AMELIA G.
Children's Article, p. 458.
- WAR, FORCE AND POLICE.
C. B. Wilmer, M. Ashby Jones, and Plato T. Durham.
- WAY OF THE IMMORTALS, THE.
Oswald W. S. McCall, p. 11.
- WEEK OF CONFERENCES, A.
Frederick Lynch, p. 268.
- WHAT HAS THE CHURCH OF CHRIST
TO SAY?
J. H. Jowett, p. 394.
- WHAT HAS THE CHURCH OF CHRIST
TO SAY? LETTERS AND COM-MENTS ON DR. JOWETT'S MANI-FEST.
Pp. 414, 447, 482, 521, 549.
- WHAT MR. CHESTERTON SAW IN AMERICA.
Frederick Lynch, p. 410.
- WHAT SHOULD A CHRISTIAN AMER-ICA DO FOR THE NEAR EAST?
Henry S. Huntington, p. 382.
- WHAT WILL THE CHURCHES DO?
J. H. Jowett, p. 478.
- WHEELER, W. REGINALD.
The Presbyterians of Northern Mexico, p. 681.
- WHEN COMETH THE KINGDOM OF GOD.
D. Adolf Deissmann, p. 354.
- WHERE THE BEYOND BREAKS THROUGH.
Rufus M. Jones, p. 662.
- WHERE EAST MEETS WEST.
Robert P. Wilder, p. 644.
- WHOSE WE ARE.
Robert E. Speer, p. 572.
- WHY?
William C. Allen, p. 197.
- WHY IMPOSSIBLE TO BE AN INFIDEL.
Newell Dwight Hillis, p. 80.
- WHY THE PEACE TREATIES NEED RE-VISION.
Lucia Ames Mead, p. 617.
- WILDER, ROBERT P.
Where East Meets West, p. 644.
- WILL THE CHURCH RISE TO DR.
JOWETT'S CHALLENGE.
Frederick Lynch, p. 438.
- WILLIAMS, T. RHONDDA.
The Child and Nationalism, p. 207;
Child Repression, p. 182; God Kept Waiting, p. 89; The God of Nature and of the Moral Life, p. 566; The Holy Spirit, p. 72; Joy in the Joy of Others, p. 294; Keeping the Soul
Alive, p. 695; The Land of Wandering, p. 320; No Substitute for Religion, p. 407; The Resurrection of the Spiritual Life, p. 262; Self-Valuations of Paul, p. 150; Stones Made Ready, p. 536; That Which is Forever, p. 6.
- WILMER, C. B.
War, Force and Police, p. 702.

Are you satisfied with the services in your Church?

RESPONSIVE SCRIPTURES

(for Worship in Church and Home)

By Robert Cluett

Author of "Day by Day with the Master" and "Every Morning"

A foreword by Dr. S. Parkes Cadman states, in part: "Mr Cluett has made an admirable selection in this volume. . . . It should be used for domestic as well a public devotion. . . . Pastors, teachers and religious educators may employ this lectionary as the basis for their work."

"These Responsive Scriptures have been arranged with the hope that they may deepen the devotional spirit of that part of the service in which minister and congregation alike engage. Each selection relates to a given topic, and, with few exceptions, the passages bearing on a subject have been chosen from different portions of the Old and New Testaments. The readings are also intended for use in the home for family devotion."

—Preface

Cloth, $1.25

At your bookstore or from us

Association Press

Pub. Dept. Inter Comm. YMCA

347 Madison Avenue

New York

WITHOUT CONSCIENCE NO REFORMA-TION.

F. W. Norwood, p. 475.

Y. M. C. A. CONVENTION AT ATLANTIC CITY, THE.

Howard B. Grose, p. 693.

Y. M. C. A. WORLD CONFERENCE IN COPENHAGEN, THE.
p. 296.

YOUNG, WILLIAM M.

My Experience in Church Advertising,
p. 282.

YOUR RIGHT TO BE HAPPY.

Frank S. Van Eps, p. 733.

ZELIE, JOHN SHERIDAN.

The Situation in Russia, p. 809.

UNIVERSITY BIBLE COURSES at home. Use spare time. Enroll now. Finest books. Best courses. Hundreds studying. Lose no time from your regular work. Catalogue free. Write Prof. C. J. Burton, Bible University Eugene Ore.

SEND FOR CANDY

To sell for us. Churches, Societies, Sunday Schools, Lodges, Schools, etc. make liberal profits handling our very popular assortments of 5 cent Chocolate Bars, etc. Send for Illustrated Circular, Price List, Order Blank and full particulars. Our goods sell quickly. Prompt Express shipments.

FRED D. LESURE COMPANY

9 Broad Street

Fitchburg, Mass.

Says President

Ozora S. Davis

Chicago Theological Seminary

"There are some things that a man cannot get along without in these days; The Christian Century is one of them. You are fearless and constructive and are leading the way."

EDITORIAL STAFF

Charles Clayton Morrison
Herbert L. Willett Orvis F. Jordan
Joseph Fort Newton John R. Ewers
Lynn Harold Hough Edward Shillito
Alva W. Taylor Thomas C. Clark

The Christian Century is distinguished by its candid discussion of living issues in the light of the mind of Christ

Mail Coupon to-day. Foreign postage extra

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Dear Sirs: Please enter my name (a new subscriber) for a year's subscription to The Christian Century at your regular rate of $4.00 (ministers $3.00). I will remit upon receipt of bill and you will please send me without extra charge a copy of ☐ "The Reconstruction of Religion," by Ellwood, or ☐ "The Crisis of the Churches," by Leighton Parks, or ☐ "The Mind in the Making," by Robinson, or ☐ "What Christianity Means to Me," by Lyman Abbott.

Name .....

Address .....

C. W.

When answering advertisements please mention the Christian Work

A Church Guest Book

One of the Schenectady, N. Y., Churches provides a guest book in the vestibule and guest cards in the pews. The pastor promptly sends a note to any stranger inscribing his name in the book or on a card, with the result of attracting to the church a number of strangers in the city.

COLLECTION ENVELOPES—8c per pack of 52, in Cartons (Also Storehouse Tithers' Envelopes) write Dufold Trifold Company, Asbury Park, N. J.

Tusculum

A thorough Christian-character-building College. Established 1794. Address

President O. O. GRAY, D. D., Greenville, Tenn.

Pulpit Gowns

and Choir Vestment
Custom Tailoring
FOR CLERGYMEN

Pulpit Hangings and Bookmarkers

Cox Sons & Mining

131-133 East 23rd. New York City

Crannell's Pocket Lessons

Full Bible text for all the International Lessons for 1923, with Analyses, References, and Daily Bible Readings. Vest-pocket size, 2 3/4 x 5 3/4 inches. 207 pages. Strong cloth binding. 35 cents

The Judson Press

1701-1703 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

The Woodlawn Cemetery

Is readily accessible by Harlem trains from Grand Central Station and by subway. Small lots at reasonable prices. Write or telephone (4855 Gramercy Park) for Book of Views or representative. Office 20 E. 23d st., New York City

Quick Relief to BRONCHIAL SUFFERERS

Coughs, nasal and bronchial colds are relieved promptly by the vapor of Cresolene—the standard drugless treatment with forty years of successful use its guarantee. The most widely used remedy for whooping cough and spasmodic croup.

Introduced in 1879

Vapo-Cresolene

"Used while you sleep"

Send for Descriptive Booklet 63C For Sale by Druggists
VAPO-CRESOLENE CO. 62 Cortlandt St., New York

Have You Ordered YOUR COPY?

The
LARGEST
and
BEST
Lesson Handbook
in
the World

At All Booksellers $1.90 (Postpaid $2.00)

FLEMING H. REVELL COMPANY

158 5TH AVE., NEW YORK 17 N. WABASH AVE., CHICAGO

MENEELY BELL CO.

TROY, N.Y. AND
220 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.

BELLS

IRRESISTIBLE

Join Our Delightful "Christian Work" Party

ON THE GREAT WHITE STAR LINE "S. S. BALTIC" SUMMER CRUISE TO THE HOLY LAND, EGYPT, TURKEY, GREECE, SPAIN ITALY, ETC.

61 Days, $600 and up, Starting June 27, 1923

A SURPASSING SUMMER VACATION OPPORTUNITY

For Ministers, College Professors, Teachers and Business Men

IDEAL SUMMER WEATHER ON SHIP BOARD

With the Average Temperature on Shore lower than Boston,
New York or St. Louis, Nights Cool. Practically no Humidity

Clark's 20th Cruise
to the Orient

STOP-OVERS IN EUROPE

Return tickets first class
good on Adriatic, Baltic,
Cedric, Celtic, etc.

Until

January 1, 1924

S. S. BALTIC

A FASCINATING ITINERARY

Madeira, Cadiz, Seville (Cordova, Granada and the Alhambra), Gibraltar, Algiers, Athens (Corinth, Eleusis), Haifa, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Bethany (Nazareth, Sea of Galilee, Samaria, etc.), Alexandria, Cairo Naples, Pompeii, Aome (Capri, Sorrento, Amalfi), Monte Carlo, Cherbourg (Paris and the Battlefields, London, etc.), Liverpool to New York.

D. E. Lorenz, Ph.D., Author of "The Mediterranean Traveler" and Managing Director of Clark's Orient Cruise of 1922, and "Round the World" Cruise of 1923, is organizing a party of Christian Work readers. Why not take advantage of this remarkable opportunity and spend your vacation months visiting the most fascinating countries in the world? No travel worries—just rest and enjoyment. Rates include regular shore trips, landings, drives, guides, hotels, railroad fees, etc.—everything first class.

WE INVITE OUR READERS TO JOIN OUR PARTY

ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET (70 pages) AND SHIP DIAGRAM SENT FREE POSTPAID.

Note.—A few vacant rooms are available on our Mediterranean Cruise, Feb. 3, 1923, and on our Round the World Cruise, Jan. 22, 1923.

Address: Cruise Department, CHRISTIAN WORK

70 Fifth Ave., New York City

When answering advertisements please mention the Christian Work

Luxurious White Star
Transatlantic Liner

S. S. BALTIC

23,876 tons register.

Three great promenade

decks — Sumptuous

Public Rooms, 24 Suites

with Private Bath.

The Climax of
Luxurious
Travel

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

A Religious Weekly Review

JANUARY 20, 1923

---

Co-operation

T. Rhondda Williams, D. D.

The Foreign Missionary Conference

Rev. Henry Strong Huntington

The Way to a New World

Rev. Sidney M. Berry, M. A.

The National Church of Bulgaria

Pastor D. N. Furnajieff

Some Aspirations of the Chinese Church

C. Y. Cheng, D. D.

Russian Personalities and American Food Parcels

John Sheridan Zelig, D. D.

---

Three Dollars a Year

Ten Cents a Copy

Dr. Ernest H. Cherrington to Address Annual Union
Ministers' Meeting, New York, January 22nd

January 10, 1923.

To the Pastors of New York City and Vicinity:

The annual Union Ministers' Meeting of New York City and vicinity under the auspices of the Anti-Saloon League will be held Monday, January 22d, (one week from next Monday) at eleven o'clock sharp, in the auditorium of the Madison Avenue Baptist Church, corner Madison Avenue and 31st Street, New York City. The speaker of the day will be Ernest H. Cherrington, LL.D., Litt. D., General Manager and Editor-in-Chief of publications for the Anti-Saloon League of America, and General Secretary of the World League Against Alcoholism.

It was Dr. Cherrington's vision and faith and constructive organizing ability that brought the "World League Against Alcoholism" into being, that has kept it functioning for three years, and established it beyond question as a going concern by the unparalleled International Congress recently held at Toronto, at which there were one thousand one hundred and eleven registered delegates and sixty-five different nations, exclusive of Canada and the United States, actually represented by persons who were present and took part in the deliberations of the gathering.

This is a "League of Nations" that is already functioning. It is one of the most marvelous world movements of the day. Dr. Cherrington, who is a young man, is a speaker of rare charm. His address to the International Congress was of exceptional literary merit, in addition to its tremendous weight and potency.

Dr. Cherrington will discuss the world prohibition problem in its various aspects. His message will be encouraging and stimulating, as well as calculated to broaden our vision. He will give some idea of the extent to which the world looks to America. It will be necessary, in order to give him ample time, to commence the meeting promptly. This meeting has an enviable record for beginning right on time. Please bear this in mind and come in punctually, so as to hear everything that Dr. Cherrington has to say.

At the close of the address of the day the State Superintendent will have some important things to say respecting the State situation and issues as they have thus far shaped-up.

Yours very truly,

WILLIAM H. ANDERSON,
State Superintendent.

Home Service Courses at Union

Dr. Paul L. Vogt, widely known as a student of rural church problems and director of this branch of the work of Home Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is to conduct two courses at the Union Theological Seminary, New York City, according to an announcement of the Seminary's Department of Home Service. These courses which are to be given on Monday afternoons during the second semester, beginning February 5, are entitled "The Church and the Country Community" and "Problems of the Rural Church." Tendencies in rural religious life, programs of rural community service, and the opportunity of the Church for leadership and co-operation will be discussed in the first course; the second will deal with the practical problems which arise in the experience of the members of the class.

It is Dr. Vogt's intention to treat the subjects in such a way as to be of value, not only to pastors of distinctively rural churches, but also to men working in semi-rural and suburban communities. The Director of the Seminary's Department of Home Service is Rev. Gaylord S. White, from whom full information may be obtained.

John—"Teacher, can anyone be punished for something they didn't do?"

Teacher—"Why, no; of course not."

John—"Well, I haven't done my arithmetic."

—Howard University Record.

Just Out

JAPAN IN TRANSITION

Loretta L. Shaw, B. A., missionary in Japan
"The change that is going on in Japan is graphically described, and the opportunity for Christianity outlined in this most attractive, illustrated volume."—The Record.
12mo. Net, $1.25

SCIENTIFIC CHRISTIAN THINKING FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Rev. Howard Agnew Johnston, Ph.D., D.D., President of Chicago Church Federation
Specially prepared to meet a definite need among young people. It vindicates the fundamental positions of Christianity as being in harmony with present-day scientific thought.
12mo. Net, $1.25

THE CHILDREN'S SIX MINUTES

Rev. Bruce S. Wright
Original little sermonettes by one who has been conspicuously successful as a preacher to children. Pastors, parents and teachers will find them very suggestive.
12mo. Net, $1.25

RELIGION AND BIOLOGY

Ernest E. Unwin, M. Sc.
A scholarly and illuminating discussion of the biological approach to religion, especially of the problem of God in Nature.
12mo. Net, $1.75

THE WORLD'S BEST HUMOROUS ANECDOTES.

Wit and Repartee Selected from Many Sources and Arranged Topically

J. Gilchrist Lawson, Author of "Greatest Thoughts About God," etc.
A collection of about 1500 of the world's best humorous anecdotes covering about every subject of interest to public speakers.
Thoroughly classified. 12mo. Net, $2.00

THE SERVANT OF

JEHOVAH. The Sufferings of the Messiah and the Glory That Should Follow. An Exposition of Isaiah LIII.

Rev. David Baron
"A book of great value—a masterpiece. Its interpretation of every detail in the chapter is most instructive. It leaves no standing ground for destructive criticism."—Dr. R. A. Torrey.
12mo. Net, $2.00

THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE BIBLE

Philip Mauro, author of "Evolution at the Bar," etc.
Meets a real need for a concise and careful treatise for students and Christian workers. The complete table of dated Bible events is a very useful feature.
12mo. Net, $1.00

SEEING THE BEST. Sermons and Addresses

*Rev. George W. McDaniel, D.D., LL.D., author of
"The Churches of the New Testament," etc.*
Dr. McDaniel is one of the outstanding preachers of America, and this collection of his discourses should be included in every preacher's collection of modern sermons.
12mo. Net, $1.50

THE WINDS OF GOD.

Five Lectures on the Intercourse of Thought with Faith during the Nineteenth Century

Rev. John A. Hutton, D.D., author of "Victory Over Victory," etc.
"These essays are worthy of the highest praise. They are cautious, penetrative, and illuminating."—Life and Faith.
New Edition. 12mo. Net, $1.25

At Your Religious Book Store
 GEORGE H. DORAN COMPANY
Publishers in America for Hodder & Stoughton
244 Madison Avenue New York

COLLECTION ENVELOPES—8c per pack of 52,
in Cartons (Also Storehouse Tithers' Envelopes) write Dufold Trifold Company, Asbury Park, N. J.

Tusculum

A thorough Christian-character-building College. Established 1794. Address

President O. O. GRAY, D. D., Greenville, Tenn.

UNIVERSITY BIBLE EDUCATION
at home. Prepare for fall and winter study. Finest books. Best courses. Hundreds studying. Catalogue free. Lose no time from your regular work. Write Prof. C. J. Burton, Bible University, Eugene, Ore.

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

CONTINUING

THE EVANGELIST AND NEW YORK OBSERVER

Vol. 114.—No. 3

January 20, 1923

Whole No. 3006

CONTENTS

WORLD OF TODAY .....	67
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE:
In the Far East—Japan: William C. Allen.....	69
EDITORIALS:
Things Present and Things to Come: Dr. Rufus M. Jones, LL.D. ....	71
Co-operation: Rev. T. Rhondda Williams.....	72
Heresy Hunting and Oppression: Benson Y. Landis..	73
EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE:
The Foreign Missionary Conference: Rev. Henry S. Huntington .....	74
OBSERVER'S LETTER:
Extemporaneous Preaching .....	77
THE WEEKLY SERMON:
The Way to a New World: Rev. Sidney M. Berry, M.A. ....	78
GENERAL:
The National Church of Bulgaria: Pastor D. N. Furnajieff .....	83
Misconceptions About Force and War: Mrs. Lucia Ames Mead .....	84
Some Aspirations of the Chinese Church: Rev. C. Y. Cheng, D.D. ....	86
Russian Personalities and American Food Parcels: Rev. John Sheridan Zelig, D.D.....	90

THE CHRISTIAN WORK: Published weekly; 10 cents a copy, $3.00 a year in the United States, $3.52 in Canada, and $4.04 in all other countries (postage included.)

Publication and circulation office, 75 Baker Street, Providence, R. I. Editorial and advertising office, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Subscriptions may be forwarded to either of the above offices.

Entered as second class matter November 18, 1922, at the U. S. post-office, Providence, R. I. under the act of March 3, 1879.

Printed in U. S. A.—Published by The Christian World, Inc., Frederick Lynch, President; Henry Strong Huntington, Vice-President; Benson Y. Landis, Secretary-Treasurer.

Printed by Norman C. Lynch Co., Incorporated, 75 Baker Street, Providence, R. I.; 70 Fifth Ave., New York.

The World of To-day

THE FRENCH ADVANCE INTO THE RUHR

The Allied authorities determined the other day that Germany had defaulted in her deliveries of lumber and of coal. These defaults were so small in comparison with the total of both commodities produced by Germany that it is hard to see how they could have been anything but wilful. Since the Premiers of France, Great Britain, Italy and Belgium failed to agree in regard to the plan for German reparations at their recent conference in Paris, France has set out to enforce her demands on Germany, with the nominal aid of Belgium and Italy. French troops have occupied Essen and neighboring cities in the Ruhr Valley. The Germans have given only passive resistance, but France is threatened with the greatest difficulty in securing any good by the occupation. Our Administration has virtually declared its disapproval of the French policy by ordering back home the thousand and American troops still left on the Rhine. Great Britain takes no share in the French advance, and British sentiment of getting out of Europe altogether is increasing. Ill advised though the French advance may seem, one can quite understand the sentiment behind it. France sees German wealth increasing and German taxes lighter than her own, but Germany always crying that she is too poor to pay for the damage she has wrought. At the present rate, France will go bankrupt if Germany does not pay. No wonder the French want to do something to bring Germany to time.

INTER-AMERICAN FRIENDSHIPS

Before a recent gathering of editors and publicists in New York Samuel Guy Inman, the Secretary of the Committee on (Missionary) Co-operation in Latin America, emphasized the fact that Anglo-Saxons and Latin-Americans are drifting apart, misunderstanding one another and seemingly unable to unite for that service which the rest of the world is needing in order to save all concerned. Even now, Dr. Inman says, there is a disposition in the South American States to waver in choosing their relations between the United States on the one hand and the countries which are comprised in the League of Nations on the other. But at the same time a signal opportunity is offered for this country not only to retrieve its former position in the affection of the South American nations, but to increase and cement a friendship that would mean everything for the welfare not only of this continent but of the whole world. This opportunity comes in the shape of the Fifth Pan-American Conference, which is to meet in Santiago,

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

Chile, next spring, which may prove to be the greatest event in the history of Pan-American relations. "That conference," Dr. Inman says, "can easily make or break inter-American friendship now so delicately poised. If all Americans can get together for a constructive and helpful program of co-operation it will mean the salvation of the world. If the Santiago Conference is allowed to close its sessions without a frank and full understanding between the twenty-one American republics and without a program of co-operation, we shall see the world further divided and an international conflict which will destroy our very civilization will have come very much closer to us."

THE BERWIND-WHITE INVESTIGATION

The New York City Administration recently made public the report to the Board of Estimate and Apportionment of the special committee appointed to investigate conditions in the mining operations of the Berwind-White Coal Mining Company in Pennsylvania. The investigation was occasioned by the fact that the Berwind-White Company, which furnishes coal to the New York subways, has been short on its deliveries owing to its refusal to settle with its striking miners. It appears that the principal owner of the Berwind-White Coal Mining Company is Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company of New York, which buys Berwind-White coal. These circumstances led the city administration to investigate conditions in the mining districts on the theory that the city suffering inconvenience due to the continuing coal strike and that it is perhaps also helping to pay for the strike through its obligation to appropriate ten million dollars annually to pay interest on the money borrowed by the city to build the subways. The report is couched in highly colored language and gives a clear impression of being a political document. The committee was composed entirely of city officials. The city administration has been fighting the Interborough for some time. The value of the report is lessened, also, by certain evident inaccuracies. The statement that the head of the Berwind-White Coal Mining Company is a director of the Pennsylvania Railroad appears to be an error. The report, however, adds new testimony to the fact that miners and their families, evicted from the company houses because of their refusal to work save under a union contract, are living under the most distressing conditions, some of them, according to the present report, "in tents on the bare ground, without stoves or other protection from the cold." Families were seen also "living in hen houses, cowsheds, cellars and under tents." The committee records having seen children barfooted and scantily clad, their feet and legs scarred and bleeding from walking on ice and stones and through underbrush. The committee's statement that it was harrassed by company spies and that its rooms were ransacked and its mail tampered with, whether justified or not, is in accord with a considerable amount of evidence of the activities of company agents elsewhere. The same is true of reports concerning the complete control of community life by the mining companies. One company, according to the report, owns the bank, the theatre, a number of public halls, a newspaper and all the public service plants in one of the mining towns. In this same town all the public officials, including the burgess, squires, councilmen and the police, are connected in some way with the company. The refusal of the companies to appear before the committee or to recognize it in any way is, to be sure, open to the interpretation that the operators regarded the investigation as a political enterprise, but the bitterness with which some of the coal companies, and notably the Berwind-White Company, have fought the effort to unionize their employes has been amply established from other sources. Also, the committee's statements regarding conditions in mining towns are supported by much corroborative evidence and have considerable significance.

THE DEVELOPING PEACE DETERMINATION IN THE CHURCH

Nothing in our editorial experience has been more noteworthy than the response to our ballot on Church Councils of Peace. Such ballots continue to drop into the office even now, weeks after the proposition was laid before our readers.

In order to work out the essence of Dr. Jowett's message the Church Peace Union, the World Alliance for International Friendship, the World Peace Foundation and the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America have united in a campaign calling for the United States to come into real relationship with other nations of the world. Their proposition has met with a tremendous response on the part of the churches and pastors throughout the country. Over ten thousand requests for literature and expressions of willingness to co-operate reached the central offices within ten days of the mailing of the preliminary announcement. Peace Sunday was observed in the churches of almost every community in the United States. The overwhelming sentiment of our moral leaders is for America's entrance into complete association with Europe.

A SAMPLE OF THE INTERNATIONAL MIND OF THE CHURCH

The Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Maine, Dr. Benjamin Brewster, recently sent out a very telling pastoral letter. A challenge has come to the Church in the sphere of international relations, he declares. Now, if ever, the world needs the old teaching of peace and good will. The House of Bishops at the recent general convention adopted as their own the creed for a warless world, issued by the Federal Council of Churches, so that practically now the whole Protestant body of America has spoken with one voice. He urges upon his clergy that they carry this message to the people. He counsels, "On the vital question of the policy of the United States toward the League of Nations (or some better 'Association' if it can be created) try to know your ground, and then let the pulpit be free and bold to speak with prophetic voice." He calls attention to the passage in the famous King-Crane Report on the Near East which says that in 1919 both the Syrian and Turkish peoples believed that America had a passion for peace and intimates that these nations would have listened to her voice.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

He says: "It is not too late—though to our shame we have lost precious time—for America to do much for a 'righteous peace' for which our brothers in the Great War gave their lives." We have evidence that bishops and leaders of the churches and pastors throughout the United States were as enthusiastic in bringing this great message to their people as was Bishop Brewster in Maine. After all it is in Church that the hope of international good will and an enduring peace lies.

A CALL FOR HELP FROM THE CANAL ZONE

The following cable from the Union Church on the Canal Zone, received by the Federal Council of Churches' Committee on Religious Work on the Canal Zone, is of interest to the Protestant Churches which are concerned in the welfare of the men of the Army and Navy:

"Combined fleet arrives Canal Zone February 20th for two months. Can you secure $2000 from churches in the States to serve the boys of the fleet while here? The devil has unlimited means."

It is a notorious fact that every effort has been made across the border from the Canal Zone, which is under United States control, both in Colon and Panama City, to prepare for the coming of the great fleet of the United States. Saloons, brothels, gambling dens, have been made ready to prey upon our boys. The Union Church on the Canal Zone, composed of members of all denominations, and heartily endorsed by the denominations having membership in the Federal Council of Churches, is doing all it can to combat these conditions. This Church is entirely self-supporting, but must have aid from without to do what should be done to serve the men of the Navy. Protestantism is fortunate in having two very capable pastors for the four congregations of the Union Church. Contributions sent at once to the Committee on Religious Work on the Canal Zone, Room 65, 105 East 22nd Street, New York City, will be forwarded in time to be of service during the next few weeks. Checks should be made out to Mr. Alfred R. Kimball, Treasurer of the Committee.

It has become almost a matter of course in this country that a woman accused of murder will be acquitted. The British are far less morbidly sentimental than we. They are ready to enforce the law on women as well as men. The execution of Mrs. Thompson in London last week as an accomplice in the murder of her husband ought to help make Americans ashamed of the essential lawlessness which allows women here to murder when they will.

Dr. Henry Van Dyke, who celebrated his seventieth birthday two months ago, has resigned as Professor of English Literature at Princeton. "I am not ill, and not tired," he says, "but I am quietly stepping out to make room for a younger man. I have no plans for the future other than to devote my time to reading and writing. There are always half a dozen stories that I want to write." Princeton will scarce be Princeton without Dr. Van Dyke.

The World Alliance for International Friendship through the churches is meriting its name more and more fully as time goes on. It is helping not only in Europe, but in Asia. Within the last year it brought together a hundred Christians from Korea and Japan in Tokio, to talk together, frankly, in a brotherly spirit. We may yet again come to deserve the old tribute, "Behold, how these Christians love one another."

Foreign Correspondence

In the Far East --- Japan

ONE of the privileges of foreign travel is found in meeting interesting people. In Tokyo I met with Ito Kojima, a beloved Christian of Japan, who is considered to be the oldest Christian in that country. He is of very striking appearance, with his venerable face and long white beard, and attired in the old-time silk kimono of Japan. He was born in 1844, and when eighteen years of age became interested in Christianity. This required no small courage. The houses of the few-known Christian teachers were watched by the police, so he took the novel course of being secretly instructed in the Bible by those engaged in that work. In 1874 he was put into prison, where for two and a half years he was kept part of the time in stocks and suffered much physical distress. He was subjected to the tests of allegiance to the Emperor and of disavowing the Gospel. These at that time consisted in demanding of Christians that they first honor or salute an official, next salute a Buddhist priest, and finally tread upon a cross. This last he refused to do. It was most absorbing to hear through an interpreter reminiscences of his youthful experiences, as the old man, with flashing eyes and earnest gesticulations, narrated the story of the official efforts to destroy Christianity at that period. But with the year 1868 a change had already commenced, and in due course his trials diminished. He is a devout member of the Episcopal Church, but holds all Christians as his brethren, and among other enjoyments delights in the quiet method of worship of the Society of Friends.

While in Tokyo, I addressed a called meeting of the Japanese Christian workers of Japan, held in the Y. M. C. A. A serious-faced group greeted me, and I spoke to them on the question of international peace, relating numerous stories revealing conditions during and since the Great War, and pled that they do all possible to promote a better order in the world. The matter of the Anti-Japanese legislation in California was uppermost in their minds. They had been much disturbed by alleged utterances from Governor Stephens of that State, to the effect that he had not long before declared that now as the Washington Conference has secured peace for ten years at least the people of California could do all they desired to annoy or make unbearable the residence of their countrymen in the United States. I had no means of knowing the accuracy of these telegraphic reports, but met a good many anti-American arguments, and am very sure that good developed from the Conference. We parted in an excellent spirit of sympathy and fellowship.

Whilst in Tokyo, I participated in a dinner at the Bankers' Club. It is a beautiful building and one could easily imagine oneself in a clubhouse in New York or London. On this occasion I met many eminent men of Japan who are dedicated to, and feel the great economic and moral necessity of, the maintenance of international peace. They are genuine and sincere friends of America. The venerable Viscount Shibusawa presided. I had full opportunity to enlarge on the possibilities associated with the spirit of internationalism, as it develops from a genuine conception of the Christian faith. I told of the attitude assumed by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and its activity associated with concentrating the millions of church people of America to petition Congress on behalf of the success of the Washington Conference. I ventured to call attention to the fact that by Japanese admission many dangerous questions had been cleared up at that Conference, leaving only what they call the "California Question" unsettled to their satisfaction. This I declared was a great gain. As to this relatively local matter I could see no other course to pursue than that of patience on the part of all concerned. I concluded with suggesting some practical ways in which we could all assist in promoting international welfare with an appeal for the application of the Golden Rule all round, reminding them of our common heritage as children of the one great Father of us all, Christians and non-Christians alike. This address was favorably received and replied to at length by some of the leaders present.

When in Kobe, I addressed the theological students in the Kwansei Gakkuin (Methodist College.) Dr. Matsumoto, the Vice President, in conversation remarked: "The Churches of the world must unite their spiritual forces to abolish war." Then the question arises as to how much spiritual force the world Church organizations possess; and, is the fact that the Churches generally support war, when their support is demanded, an indication that their spiritual power is limited. Some think so.

Whilst in Kobe, that city was glorying in the visit of the Prince of Wales. The Japanese gave themselves over to much joy on this occasion. The sides of the shops were uniformly decorated for many blocks with red and white bunting, draped in long lines for hundreds of feet at a stretch. Big gay lanterns were hung from the roofs and doorways of the shops, often at regular distances apart, for many blocks at a time. Many windows had big signs painted on the glass with these words, only in English: "Welcome, Prince of Wales." The whole effect was extraordinarily effective.

Two things I have particularly observed since my visit to Japan eight years ago. First, one sees in the big ports that fully two-thirds of the business men wore European clothes. They were well-dressed, but somehow or other, to my mind, did not look altogether comfortable or as well in them as in the graceful garments of the preceding generation. Second, the manners of the ordinary people on the streets and in the crowded tramcars did not seem to have improved within the past decade. Whilst the cultured people seemed to be generally most quiet in their manners, the general public pushed and crowded one another or the foreigners more than they did a few years ago. Have they acquired the Western assertiveness and are they forgetting their rare courtesy of the past as the result of adopting our Western push and business methods? I hope not. Meanwhile, I see but small difference in the gentle ways and smiling women of Japan, as, in kimonos and shod in getas they tread their ways through the crowded streets.

Between Kobe and Nagasaki our beautiful ship cleaved her way through miles of jellyfish in the Inland Sea. As evening fell upon us the soft greys of the misty ocean, backed by the mountains of lovely tints and forms, and at whose bases were picturesque villages and faintly seen barley fields, made a lovely picture. Then the moonlight became very radiant over the dark water. Most impressive were the lights of the fishing nets, which for miles were distributed over the sea in all directions about five hundred feet apart. They danced and swayed in a most delightful fashion, whilst near them were the sampans with the fishermen in them keeping watch.

So is it given to God's people to put out the Gospel nets in all waters and with simple faith watch over them by night and day.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

EDITORIAL

EDITORIAL STAFF

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

Frederick Lynch

ASSOCIATE EDITOR

Henry Strong Huntington

MANAGING EDITOR

Benson Y. Landis

LITERARY EDITOR

Tertius Van Dyke

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Edmund de Schweinitz Brunner

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT

Violette Reynolds

CONTRIBUTING STAFF

Henry A. Atkinson

Peter Ainslie

Hugh Black

S. Parkes Cadman

Sidney L. Gulick

Rufus M. Jones

E. Guy Talbott

T. Rhonda Williams

EDITORIAL COUNCIL

Nehemiah Boynton

Williams Adams Brown

Howard Duffield

Sherwood Eddy

Irving Fisher

J. W. Johnson

George Foster Peabody

George A. Plimpton

Howard C. Robbins

Fred B. Smith

Cornelius Woelfkin

Shailer Mathews

Charles S. Macfarland

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS

Austria: Professor Carl Beth

Canada: Dr. J. Lovell Murray

Czechoslovakia: Professor Francis Zilka

France: Rev. Professor Wilfred Monod

Germany: Direktor A. Hinderer

Great Britain: Rev. Sidney M. Berry

Hungary: Dr. S. Szabo

Switzerland: Pastor Adolf Keller

Things Present and Things to Come

ANAXAGORAS said twenty-five hundred years ago that men are always cutting the world in two with a hatchet. William James, in one of his living phrases, says with the same import that everybody dichotomizes the cosmos. It is so. We all incline to bisect life into alternative possibilities. We split realities into opposing halves. We show a kind of fascination for an "either-or" selection. We are prone to use the principle of parsimony, and to be content with one side of a dilemma. History presents a multitude of dualistic pairs from which one was supposed to make his individual selection. There was the choice between this world and the next world; the here and the yonder; the flesh and the spirit; faith and reason; the sacred and the secular; the outward and the inward, and many more similar alternatives. This "either-or" method always leaves its trail of leanness behind. It makes life thin and narrow where it might be rich and broad, for in almost every case it is just as possible to have a whole as to have a half, to take both as to select an alternative. St. Paul found his Corinthians bisecting their spiritual lives and narrowing their interests to one or two possibilities. One of them would choose Paul as his representative of the truth and then see no value in the interpretation which Apollos had to give. Another attached himself to Apollos and missed all the rich contributions of Paul. Some of the "saints" of the Church selected Cephas as the only oracle, and they lost all the breadth which would have come to them had they been able to make a synthesis of the opposing aspects. St. Paul called them from their divided half to a completed whole. He told them that instead of "either-or" they could have both. "All things are yours; whether Paul or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present or things to come, all are yours; and ye are Christ's and Christ is God's." This is the method of synthesis. This is the substitution of wholes for halves, the proffer of both for an "either-or" alternative.

That last pair of alternatives is an interesting one, and many persons make their bisecting choice of life there. One well-known type of person focuses on the near, the here and now, the things present. Those who belong to this class propose to make hay while the sun shines. They glory in being practical. They have what doctors call myopia. They see only the near. Their lenses will not adjust for the remote. They believe in quick returns and bank upon practical results. Those of the other type have presbyopia, or far-sightedness. They are dedicated to the far-away, the remote, the yonder. They are pursuing rainbows and distant ideals. They are so eager for the millennium that they forget the problem of their street and of the present day. Browning has given us a picture of both these types:

"That low man seeks a little thing to do,

Sees it and does it:

This high man, with a great thing to pursue,
Dies ere he knows it.

That low man goes on adding one to one,
His hundred's soon hit:

This high man, aiming at a million,
Misses an unit."

Browning's sympathies are plainly with the "high man" who misses the unit, but it is one more case of unnecessary dichotomy. What we want is the discovery of a way to unite into one synthesis things present and things to come. We need to learn how to seize this narrow isthmus of a present and to enrich it with the momentous significance of past and future. Henry Bergson has been telling us that all rich moments of life are rich just because they roll up and accumulate the meaning of the past and because they are crowded with anticipations of the future. They are fused with memory and expectation, and one of these two factors is as important as the other. If either dies away the present becomes a useless half, like the divided parts of the child which Solomon proposed to bisect for the two contending mothers.

We are at one of those momentous ridges of time at the present moment. Some are so busy with the near and immediately practical that they cannot see the far vision of the world that is to be built. Others are so impressed with past issues that have become paramount, with the glorious memories of the blessed Monroe Doctrine, for instance, that they have no expectant eyes for the creation of an interrelated and unified world. Another group is so concerned with the social millennium that they discount the lessons of the past, the message of history, the wisdom of experience, and fly to the useless task of constructing abstract human paradises and dreams of a world-kingdom which could exist only in a realm where men had ceased to be men.

EDITORIAL

What we want is a synthesis of things present and things to come, a union of the practical, tested experience of life and the inspired vision of the prophet who sees unfolding the possibilities of human life raised to its fuller glory in Christ, the incarnation of the way of love, which always has worked, is working now, and always will work.

R. M. J.

Co-operation

CO-OPERATION in itself is not necessarily good. Men may co-operate to build a tower of Babel; there is co-operation among a gang of thieves; a vast amount of evil co-operation may be witnessed in the world today. What is a gigantic trust that exploits both worker and consumer but co-operation that must be condemned? Co-operation, to be a social good, must have worthy aims and wise methods, it must be moved by a worthy spirit from within, and proceed by worthy means to the attainment of its end. The first thing to remember about it is that it is the co-operation of human beings, and the appreciation of human worth is fundamental to the movement; human value should be deemed the highest value, the human end the only true end, and no methods should be adopted that do violence to the quality of the human being. Whether the co-operators be employers or workmen, politicians, professional men, teachers or scholars, they should always remember that they are humans first and that all their dealings with one another and with the world should be worthy of that fact. An ideal of human life worthy of the best in humanity should be the controlling factor in all co-operative endeavors. If co-operators are producers they should produce good commodities, and produce them in such a way to help the human life of the worker and the consumer. We are told that the great need of the world is more production, a greater output. We are not told much about what production is proposed, what sort of output is needed. There is a vast amount of labor expended on things which are not needed. And then another great volume of labor is expended in advertising those things, to try and make people think they need them. The real object of most advertisements is not to acquaint people of the existence of things they want, but to stimulate them to think that they want things which they do not need at all. The object of the quack medicine advertisements is not at all to let people who are ill know what will cure them, but to get them to buy the stuff for the profit of the seller, and get as many people as possible who are well to think they are ill, that they too may buy. So much production is production for profit, not for use, hence the need of a large army of men to exercise their ingenuity, and give their time and their energy to devising advertisements. This kind of thing not only vitiates the public taste, but degrades the worker. There are hundreds of thousands of people in our country today who feel that the work they do for a livelihood degrades them. They give their labor to pander to tastes which are unhealthy and ought not to be encouraged, and often to create such tastes. Many of them know this, and they work with a deep discontent in their hearts. They know they cannot use their true selves in their work. No amount of co-operation in production will serve social progress unless the output is of the right kind. Again, co-operation if it is to serve social progress, must not only produce good commodities, but must produce them in such a way that the workers' human value shall be respected. The introduction of machinery and the sub-division of labor have made this exceedingly difficult. John Ruskin saw very clearly this effect of those two factors. When a man becomes a mere machine-minder, with no need of putting either brain or feeling into his work, it is difficult for him not to suffer degradation even though he may be turning out a useful article. This is one reason why the hours of mechanical labor should be as few as possible, i. e., as will produce what is necessary, so that a man should have a range of life outside the exercise of his craft. It is no use protesting against machinery, nor against the sub-division of labor, but their evil effects should be counteracted by every possible means. Shorter hours will be one means, provided that the workman knows how to use his leisure. Another means is to deliver production from being production for profit into being production for use, so that the worker may have in his mind the fact that even when he is doing a thing that is merely mechanical he is doing it for a good purpose. That will give him a sense of human value in his work. Through the culture of imagination he may also be taught to realize how his part of the work contributes to a whole which benefits mankind. This will exalt him. Everything should be done to cultivate these ideas in the mind of the worker so that he may not feel, even in the minding of a machine, that he is less than a man. In addition to this, a direct voice, through his own chosen representative, in the management of the concern, will be another item in that self-respect in which the worker can pursue his work. To feel that he is a member of a co-operative body which is co-operating for useful and worthy ends, and in wise methods, will heighten for him the value of his own life, as he will be a better man for it. Besides all this, education should have a humanitarian basis, and should enable a man to furnish for himself a mental world in which he can live while doing purely mechanical work, as a cultured lady can enjoy reading a book while she is knitting. A great deal of work is being done mechanically by men's hands, and if they had well-furnished minds they might be living in another world at the same time. We have got to realize that the unrest in the industrial world is a deeper thing than any agitation for wages and hours of work; it is really at bottom the struggle for a fuller life, a fuller manhood. The men who agitate do not always themselves understand this, their grievance is deeper than the one they are conscious of, their need greater than they know, and their agitation therefore fuller of significance than they themselves realize. It is this feature of industrial unrest that ought to make a special appeal to the Church. The special message of the Church is to the man, and the full development of manhood should be her peculiar care. The Church ought to cast a very critical eye upon all those arrangements in life that tend to degrade the man. The Church has always been alive to the evils of drink, gambling, and immorality as degraders of manhood, but the Church has been slow to recognize the terrific evil of industrialism as it exists in the world today. Millions are losing their life in earning their livelihood, while others are as surely losing their lives in making fortunes. Without at all aiming at equality of income, the Church of Christ should not be satisfied with any system which does not give to the lowest down the opportunity of a full human life. That cannot be secured until a great deal of the present competition has given way to co-operation.

EDITORIAL

T. R. W.

Heresy Hunting and Oppression

RECENTLY among a group of twenty people, all but one thought that heresy hunting and repression of opinion seem to be at their height at the present time. Most of them agreed that this seems to be one of the "peaks in the curve." The one who disagreed thought there was no more than at any other time, that the present happenings were mere aberrations. The frenzy of the war time, with all of its repressions, has been followed by various outbursts, perhaps not as intensive as those of the war, but nevertheless serious enough to make the past two or three years go down as one of the most fruitful periods for heresy hunters and the oppressors of those who disagree.

The present period is marked, for instance, by the Scott Nearing experience at Clark University in Worcester. President Atwood arose during Professor Nearing's speech at a student organization, on the control of opinion by press, church and university, and announced that the meeting was over. It all furnished a forceful illustration of Professor Nearing's thesis. This same President Atwood, by the way, is now said to be in charge of the "Information Service" of the new magazine, "Our World." We may perhaps console ourselves by believing that only his name is being used and that he really does not touch the information about the world, or that he conducts himself differently for "Our World" than for Clark University.

There was the Ku Klux attack on Professor E. C. Lindeman at the North Carolina College for Women, at Greensboro, because he was an atheist and allowed the colored cook to entertain in his home. The first charge was absurd, the second proved to be a lie, and the Klan protest came to nought, but it illustrates that the bigoted Protestants in the invisible empire are keeping a watchful eye over the activities of churches and schools.

Down at Baylor University, Waco, Texas, there has been agitation about Darwinism for several years. The smelling committee, however, recently acquitted the institution of the charge of upholding Darwinism, and could not find the two professors who were said to have believed that the account of creation as recorded in Genesis might be an allegory. The Missouri Baptists were stirred up by the teachings of Professor William Slaten at William Jewell College at Liberty, Missouri. He expressed theological views contrary to those of the majority of clergy and laity then interested in a money-raising campaign. The faculty called on Professor Slaten to resign. He refused. Then the trustees, after an examination, ousted him. The Baptists in Kentucky will withdraw aid from denominational institutions which teach "the rationalistic theory of evolution as a fact." We may be sure that if they adhere strictly to the warning no one will be found guilty.

Among the Northern Baptists the Fundamentalist activities have been fairly well advertised. The Committee of Twenty-five undertook to purge the schools and colleges of heresy, but received severe rebuffs from Dartmouth and Crozer. The story of their attack on Professor Vedder at Crozer was told in THE CHRISTIAN WORK last summer. Individual fundamentalists are keeping up the crusade, as evidenced by Dr. John Roach Straton's preaching and his publication of his list of "infidels." Those who believe they are peculiarly appointed by the Almighty to sit in judgment are keeping up the good fight.

The case of Rev. J. D. M. Buckner of Aurora, Nebraska, and his retirement by the Methodist Conference, has been told in his pamphlet on "How I Lost My Job as a Preacher." It may be secured from him. It is simply the story of a man condemned by his conference and his bishop for his theological views. He gave forty years of service to his denomination, his church wanted him back, but the conference placed him on the retired list. An employe of the Board of Home Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church said to the writer within the past few weeks that it is a dangerous thing to be a Methodist and a progressive, and that only a few "get away with it."

EDITORIAL

"The Survey" tells us that at the University of Michigan, G. D. Eaton, a student, wrote a formidable review of John Kenneth Turner's book, "Shall It Be Again," and made some critical remarks about "most history teachers." He shortly thereafter departed from the university by order of the authorities. "The Christian Century" recently told the story of the experience of a student at a famous training school which sends many men into the ministry of several denominations. He packed his trunk after the President had told him he must answer questions as the Professors explained and not as he himself thought.

These stories, and many others that might be given, are, of course, merely old ones retold with the names of new actors inserted. The issues are old, too. They are simply disagreements as to interpretations of the Bible, as to ideas about God, the person of Jesus, evolution, and as to social and economic views. A man like John Haynes Holmes is hated by the majority in the churches perhaps as much for his social and economic views as for his theological position. Let a man express ideas about God or Jesus which differ from those of the majority of Christians, let him profess to think kindly about some theory of evolution, or let him believe that the economic system should be changed, and he becomes a dangerous person to a very large section of Protestant clergy and laity.

B. Y. L.

Editorial Correspondence

The Foreign Missionary Conference

THE Foreign Missionary Conference, pried loose five years ago from its old meeting place at Garden City, New York, betook itself this year to Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. I never heard of any church conference at Bethlehem before. Probably the conference came down here through the influence of Dr. De Schweinitz, secretary of missions of the Moravian Church and vice president of the Moravian Society for the propagation of the gospel among the heathen.

Hotel Bethlehem, where the conference met, is as good a hotel as one can ask for. True, it had not room enough for all the delegates. It generously turned some of its rooms into five bed "wards," and even some of the three hundred delegates had to spill over to poorer hostleries. But despite any small inconveniences Bethlehem has been a beautiful place in which to meet. It is one of the religious shrines of America. Hither came the Moravians, the Unitas Fratrum, with their religion of the spirit, nearly two hundred years ago.

The first of them arrived here in 1741 from their beloved Heronhut. The conference of the Lehigh river and the Monacacy Creek made the place attractive. Still better to the immigrants was the big spring spouting forth a generous stream of water from the hillside. The old Moravians, by the way, piped the water through hollow logs through the streets of Bethlehem, so that the town had a water system before Philadelphia or New York, indeed before any other town in the United States. The great spring was the city's one water supply until ten or fifteen years ago.

On the top of the hill on the north side of the Lehigh, within a block of the conference meeting place, clusters the old Moravian buildings, their house for the sisters, the widows' house, the girls' school and college, and the really noble church, one hundred and seventeen years old. After the battle of Brandywine, the American forces brought some five hundred wounded to Bethlehem. For months these men occupied the girls' school as a hospital. If to-day as many wounded, in proportion to the population, were poured into the town it would mean the arrival of forty-two thousand patients.

The first meeting of the conference was held at the Moravian Church. The church had very graciously left their Christmas decorations in place; a really fine picture of the nativity behind the pulpit, the representation of rocks about the picture and over the pulpit, and a very forest of evergreens leading up to the cavern, and with each window made Christmasy with two or three little trees.

This session of the conference was opened to the public a new departure, Dr. De Schweinitz welcomed the delegates on behalf of Bethlehem and the Moravians, and Dr. Speer, President of the Federal Council, made the principal address on the great elements of hope in the missionary situation. We expect to publish the body of the address next week.

The next morning the conference betook itself to its business. It devoted its first session to China, first of all to a rapid sketch of the great survey of China, made by Rev. Milton T. Stauffer, of Shanghai, under the auspices of the China Continuation Committee (the organization through which the missions in China co-operated until the organization of the Chinese National Christian Council last May). As a result of four years work he has turned out a great volume of charts and figures which show any inquiring church leader or mission secretary the present status of each mission's work and suggest the present need of every district in China's four million square miles.

After Dr. Stauffer's address, the American members of the China Christian Educational Commission summarized their conclusions as the result of four or five months of first-hand investigation in China. First spoke Bishop McConnell. Bishop McConnell is one of the brilliant men of the Church in America to-day. He is as open of mind as he looks at China as he is in his survey of the economic and social state of America, as ready to see what there is to see and draw the natural conclusions. He said what Dr. C. Y. Cheng reiterated in the evening of the same day, that everything that comes from the West now is subjected to searching scrutiny in China. You cannot expect, with second rate intellectual life, to meet the demands and the question of present China. There is no lack of courtesy toward the Christian on the part of the Chinese teacher, but many a Chinese teacher is to-day a philosophic atheist. China drank in the words of Bertrand Russell. And Bertrand Russell is the exponent of a mathematical philosophy, pluralism, which is avowedly atheistic. Peking's remarkable reception the other day to Joffe, the representative of Soviet Russia, illustrates the radical temper of the Chinese today. If the Church is not ready to meet the new questions, the Church is not adequate to cope with the situation. Protestant education formerly was practically the only modern education in China. To-day, as Professor Burton reckons, it represents only one twenty-seventh of it. Roman Catholicism represents the same proportion, private schools five times as much, and Government education the other twenty twenty-sevenths.

E D I T O R I A L

Dean William F. Russell, of the Iowa State Teachers' College, led in the pedagogical examination of our Christian schools in China. Dean Russell found our mission schools seriously deficient in buildings and equipment, and in the training of their teachers. What the mission schools pre-eminently possessed was a staff of men and women of remarkable personal interest in their pupils, the sort of interest that produces character. But Chinese Government officials look on external things.

Dean Russell found only two training schools under missionary auspices that he would regard as good, over against two hundred fine Chinese Government normal schools. The character and devotion of the teachers in the mission primary schools will not offset their other lacks in the Chinese official mind.

But while conditions remain as they are in the Christian village schools, while the teachers are miserably supported, are forced to collect their own pay, are supplied with poor living quarters and have no opportunity for advancement, there is no chance to secure properly trained material for the teaching force. Dean Russell found mission education very greatly over-extended.

A very interesting and a very valuable member of the China Education Commission was Kenyon Q. Butterfield, of the Massachusetts Agricultural College. With eighty-eight per cent. of the Chinese living in villages of ten thousand or less, China is a land of villages and farmers. Every one of her hundred thousand villages, with its outlying hamlets, is a natural community and a potential parish. A program of rural education for China, education in agriculture, agricultural experiment stations, and training of Chinese pastors to fit them to lead in farming communities, would make a great appeal to the churches of America, to the country churches, if you will, to everyone interested in agriculture.

Professor Burton, head of the New Testament Greek department in the Theological Department of the University of Chicago, agreed that what Dean Russell had said was true; but for all that, such is the character of the men and women who teach, especially in the Christian middle and upper schools, that many, many non-Christians send their children thither. And so effective is the evangelizing influence of the schools that while eighty per cent. of the children come from non-Christian homes, the same proportion graduate Christians.

The early converts to Christianity came from the lower classes. The churches of China to a large extent are still illiterate. "I can," said Professor Burton, "take you to six mission stations in one city, every one of them in an obscure street, in a very poor building, with small congregations, almost all the people illiterate." The pastor of one of those churches is so ignorant he can only repeat the few sermons he learned in school. And these preaching stations are the only Christian churches in the city. The case of this city can be multiplied time after time. Yet the same board that supports these preaching stations is pouring out young men and young women well educated from the Chinese point of view. "Will they go to these churches? Would your children do so?" Dr. Burton pointedly asked.

Or consider the thousands of Chinese students who are coming back from Europe and America. In only six or eight cities in all China are there churches which in building, equipment and services are calculated to hold these Christian educated young people.

"I fear," said Professor Burton, "we are already losing fifty per cent. of these people."

The call is for a better educated and better sustained ministry, better buildings and services with more dignity. Why should we hesitate to build them churches, as we do schools? And why hesitate to take the best of their men as we send out the best of our own?

J. Leighton Stuart, President of Peking Union University and another member of the Commission, told how glad are even professing atheists among the Chinese to have our colleges among them. They only wish that to-day, as in the past, they were ten years ahead of the rest of the educational system. "The greatest failure in our Christian Colleges," said President Stuart, "is the failure to secure the best Chinese on their faculties." These Chinese pass by our schools because they do not see the opportunities for service in them that they do elsewhere. They should be able in our colleges to look forward to being the peers and in time the ranking associates of our American and European teachers.

We have quoted enough to give the fine flavor of the meeting, the frankness of speech, the fair facing of the shortcomings of mission work, the welcome to the new status toward which the native Church and the native Christian in Asia are on the way.

The general trend of the thought of the conference this year was a repetition, an emphasizing and an enlargement of its thought last year. The special subject for discussion was: "From the viewpoint of the recent conferences in India, China and Japan, should the home churches now modify any elements in their thinking and missionary activity in order to help the Church in those lands to express more naturally and freely their Christian experience?"

EDITORIAL

"I. Do our churches at the home base carry points of view which tend to limit the usefulness of their missionaries as they seek to help the churches on the field? e. g.

"1. A sense of superiority due to our wealth and prestige.

"2. A pride of race due to the present position of the white peoples.

"3. Our Western interpretation of the teaching of Jesus and His Apostles growing out of centuries of Christian history and study.

"4. An assertive quality naturally found in the propagandist.

"5. Training in the administration of our institutions which gives special skill in leadership in these forms of service.

"II. How may these limitations be overcome where they exist? e. g.

"1. By changes of emphasis in the choice of candidates.

"2. By modification of the training of missionaries at home and on the field.

"3. By including as a part of our theological training a study of the religious history, life and thought of Oriental peoples, including any contributions which they have made to the interpretation of Christianity.

"4. By portraying with deeper sympathy the life of mission lands.

"5. By more frequent interpretations of the point of view of the field of its own leaders.

"6. By a greater candidness in presenting to the home churches all the facts about conditions in mission areas."

Dr. C. Y. Cheng of China, who presided over the great Chinese Christian National Conference at Shanghai last May, put very frankly the desire of the Chinese to make their church a really Chinese church, at the same time that they desire most earnestly the continuing and increasing help of the missionaries from the West. We print Dr. Cheng's article on another page of this issue.

Dr. Arthur D. Berry, associate principal of the Soyama Gakuin at Tokyo, presented somewhat the same view from the Occidental's standpoint. The time for free discussion was most profitable. Bishop McConnell, brave man that he is, said something about missionaries that are usually only mentioned in private—that a missionary bishop ought to get back to America occasionally in order that he may run into some one who will talk back to him, that even a missionary needs a little of such discipline. Two Methodists confessed that their church had been too eager to make Methodists instead of being concerned first of all to make Christians. The Conference instructed the Committee of Reference and Council, through which it acts during the year, to seek the constant stimulus and advice of the peoples among whom the missions work. The Conference likewise expressed its appreciation of the work of the colleges and universities in establishing courses in internationalism and race psychology, and urged that colleges without such courses institute them.

The last session of the Conference was devoted to the Near East and the Moslem problem. Robert Speer sketched the situation in Syria, Palestine, Mesopotamia and Persia. In Persia Mohammedans are becoming Christians. And all Persia is eager for American help, in the financial administration of the Government, in business, in education and even in religion. Ernest Riggs, one of the secretaries of the American Board, told of the dreadful destruction of the American Christian work in Turkey, with every mission college closed, with no single village school in operation where the Angora Government controls, with $2,380,000 worth of mission property lost, two-thirds of the nation's leaders dead and ninety-five per cent of the mission's former constituency dead or in exile. "We must," said Mr. Riggs in effect, "follow up our Christians, and we must begin to train for work in behalf of the Moslems." Dr. Turner frankly pictured the almost infinitesimal results of missions to Islam, not that we might give up the work in discouragement, but that we might turn to it with yet more determination.

The account of the Conference, partial at best, would be absolutely incomplete without mention of James M. Speer's discussion of foreign missions as seen by a layman, an address which the Conference enthusiastically ordered printed, and John R. Mott's address on the need of finding and training up a new force of missionary leaders at the home base to replace the men who cannot long continue their heavy labors and to supply men for the increasing number of places of importance that must be filled by men and women of consecration, of vision and of executive ability if the foreign missionary task is to meet the developing opportunities.

The Conference determined to undertake one service which should help to unite the churches of America and Germany. It urged all the missionary boards to make appropriations to help out the German mission boards which are now unable to send out a single missionary on account of the decline of the value of the mark.

One more word, a tribute to the delightful and somewhat Scotch humor of the genial presiding officer, Dr. James Endicott, of the Canadian Methodist Board, a Christian and a gentleman. We wish his successor, Dr. Allen R. Bartholomew, Secretary of the Board of Missions of the Reformed Church in the United States, as happy a period with the gavel.

HENRY S. HUNTINGTON.

THE OBSERVER

Extemporaneous Preaching

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

LAST week I referred to the impression that Dean Brown's recent Lyman Beecher Lectures on "The Art of Preaching" had made upon me, and how interested I was to find that he was saying about expository preaching the things I had been saying to young men for years. When I turned to the lecture where he deals with the delivery of the sermon again I was greatly gratified to find him urging the extemporaneous delivery of the sermon as far more effective and natural than the reading from manuscript. Here again he supports his contention by the same observations and arguments I have used again in THE CHRISTIAN WORK. Preaching is being very much discussed at just this time and is considerable fire even by the preachers themselves. As was remarked last week Dr. Francis E. Clarke raises the question in a recent issue of the Yale Review as to whether it is not driving people from the Church. (It raises the question of what the Protestant Church has got to offer the people if the pulpit be taken out or preaching even minimized.) Anyhow, whatever one may say to this, the fact remains that people are reading widely, are hearing many lectures and addresses, are becoming accustomed to the free discussions of forums, so that the preacher is being put to a test our fathers in the pulpit never knew. Personally, from a very wide experience, I believe they are meeting this test. Indeed I am inclined to think that the general average of preaching is higher than it ever was. But I believe very strongly that the more the preaching ideal is kept before the pulpit rather than what one might call the sermon ideal, the better our preaching will be and the more acceptable and effective. The sermon ideal rather naturally lends itself to reading—for discussion is generally its fundamental motive; the preaching ideal lends itself more naturally to free delivery because the proclamation of a gospel and persuasion are its chief aims.

The points of advantage I have urged in preaching without manuscript are these: it gives authority to the preacher; it lends itself to intimacy or nearness, a great gain in preaching; it is more direct, for it is a man talking directly to men; if preaching is the conveying of truth through personality, more of the personality of the preacher is felt if there is no barrier of paper; through the eye the message goes as well as through the voice; if the preacher has the germ of eloquence and passion in him the extemporaneous delivery will bring it into being and into play sooner than reading ever can. Now I would not urge this so strongly did I not believe that with a few exceptions, any preacher if he has proper training in the Divinity School, and begins at once with the free delivery of the sermon, can as easily master the method of free delivery as the lawyer or politician masters it, and can generally with a little patience and constant practice soon feel as much at home in a paper-less pulpit so to speak as in one where what he has to say lies fully written out before him.

I found Dr. Brown emphasizing these same facts. "You can learn, if you will," he says, "to preach without manuscript. It is far and away the happiest and the most effective method of preaching. It is the man and not the manuscript which makes the spiritual impression. * * * * In my judgment it is the ideal way to preach and every young man may well strive with all his might to achieve success in it. No man should be willing to give it up and fall back upon the contents of a fully written manuscript which has to be read leaf by leaf until he has fought a good fight to attain to the other method and has been driven back by the sense of his own failure to the very last ditch."

Dean Brown recognizes, as we all must, that the written sermon has certain advantages, 1. It is the easier way to preach; 2. Less material is required; 3. The written sermon takes much less vitality in delivery, the manuscript reader being freed from all anxiety; 4. The written sermon will of course exhibit a more finished literary style; 5. The man who reads his sermons can easily preserve them and use them anywhere; 6. He will be more accurate in his statements and not run off into exaggeration and vagaries as one may in the glow of oratory. But in spite of all these advantages Dean Brown thinks the free delivery best. There are he thinks at least four very big objections to reading the sermon. They are, in substance, these: 1. Nine people out of ten are strongly prejudiced against the written sermon; 2. There is no other calling where a man in making a popular appeal, or undertaking to do what the preacher is supposed to do, convince men of great truths, would trust his results to a carefully read paper; 3. The use of a manuscript develops a bad style of elocution. By the very act of reading the head is often held in an unnatural position. The natural speaking voice is changed and becomes artificial; 4. The use of the manuscript permits and even encourages ornate and somewhat remote style—a style which has not the directness nor forcibleness of what one would use were he looking straight into the eyes of his people.

Dean Brown claims to speak from experience. He began by reading his sermons. Finally he came to the conclusion that he was not preaching—was simply reading sermons and made up his mind to break loose from the paper. He did so—now nothing could persuade him to give up his new found joy in preaching and the freedom he has gained. It seems to him, too, that his preaching, by its note of directness, nearness, and intimacy, became infinitely more effective. "The man who preaches without manuscript," he says, "reaches levels of joy in his preaching which I am sure the preacher from manuscript knows not of. He has more of the sense of high privilege; he gains a larger measure of that sense of response from the eyes and the minds and the hearts of the people whom he is steadily watching; he has more even of the sense of openness to God because of his more daring reliance upon the aid of the Spirit who works within us to will and to perform his good pleasure in those moments when we are working out our own salvation as efficient preachers of his Gospel. One gets a reaction from an audience when talking directly to them that he can never get while reading. Preacher and congregation become en rapport. You can also add to your own stock of deep feeling by feeling what they feel as it comes back to you."

Dr. Brown closes his lecture with a most emphatic warning to the effect that he who will preach effectively in this free method must put more study and careful preparation upon his sermon than he who reads. He must be thoroughly soaked in his subject, filled with his thought. My own advice to all young preachers is—Dean Brown does not go into this—to write one sermon a week for several years. When once it is written thought, I put it away, and make no effort to remember when in the pulpit. The value of the writing is that it insures the careful thinking through of the subject and continuous writing helps form a concise and purer style.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Way to a New World

By Rev. Sidney M. Berry, Birmingham, England

[This sermon is taken from Mr. Berry's recent volume, "Revealing Light," which is reviewed in this issue.—Editor.]

"That ye may be the children of your Father, which is in heaven."—MATT. 5:45.

I HAVE deliberately cut off and separated one clause of a sentence from the teaching of Jesus as the subject round which our thoughts shall gather. If it seems an arbitrary thing to do, a kind of literary vandalism, I can only plead that the clause might as fitly conclude other sentences from the Sermon on the Mount as the one which is before us.

The truth it contains expresses the inner motive and spirit of the Christian life and can by no means be bound down to any particular injunction or command. It gives us a glimpse of the end in view in this high business of attempting to govern life by the laws of Christ; it, therefore, reveals the motive and driving power which lies behind every venture of Christian faith and service. This is the secret passion round which all the romance of Christian history is written, the heartfelt desire that, come what may in life, the spirit of man may bear the marks of kinship with his Creator and Redeemer.

The Sermon on the Mount has been called the law-book of Christ, and in a slightly different vein it has been regarded as a vivid picture of the kingdom of God as that kingdom is mirrored in the portrait of a citizen. We see here the divine society as society is seen in terms of personal living and its spirit. Christ's way of showing us the kingdom is, after all, the only way by which to estimate any society justly. You cannot reckon the stage that society has attained by passing in review its outward organization and wealth; society must be judged by the kind of man it produces and upon whom it rests. One of the shortest, as it is certainly one of the most satisfying pictures, of the new world which we are still talking about, was that given by the prophet Isaiah centuries ago. "A king shall reign in righteousness and princes shall rule in judgment, and a man shall be as an hiding place from the wind and covert from the tempest, as rivers of water in a dry place, and as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." It is man and not a type of government, which fills the old picture, and I can realize that society better than many which have been described to me through the complex details of new social machinery.

Now the Sermon on the Mount is Christ's picture of what a man shall be in the new kingdom. Through it all He is saying to us, a man shall be this, and this, and this, and as He builds up the picture of the man, the vision of the kingdom grows before our eyes. My text forms part of that picture, and just as man is the heart of the kingdom so the text takes us to the heart of the man. He lives with this supreme passion ruling his heart that he may be a child of his Father who is in heaven.

I do not believe that you can see this man of the kingdom at all except through that dominant motive. Take the motive away and this spirit of forgiveness and forbearance and generosity, carried to limits that the world would reckon insane, becomes as unbelievable as the world holds it impracticable. Try for a moment to realize the man who is pictured in this sermon of the Master's. See him moving about the world of to-day, and without the passion and motive of my text, he is utterly unreal. That measures the gulf between any secular Utopia you can name and Our Lord's vision of the kingdom of God. Without the spiritual passion of likeness to the Father the whole dream of the kingdom vanishes into thin air. Indeed, it is impossible to understand or appreciate Christ's ethical teaching as a whole apart from this underlying motive. There are many critics who have examined and analyzed the Sermon on the Mount and some of them have passed a verdict that it is hopelessly impracticable as a way of life to-day. Some of the sanest of men have reluctantly reached the conclusion that it may be a picture of the citizen of God's kingdom, but that it could not be carried out here and now without the gravest risks both for the individual and society.

How would it be possible to live without judging others? How could a man expect to live in the spirit of reckless generosity suggested in Our Lord's words, even though you do not interpret those words literally? What would become of the social and industrial order if men loved and forgave as they are bidden to do by Christ? The whole of the teaching here has a touch of extravagance in it. It is far enough removed from the reserves and qualifications and cautions of ordinary life. Perhaps it is for some such reasons that there is no real attempt to guide life by the principles of the Mount, and even Christian people themselves are apt to regard one of their fellows as a crank who makes a resolute attempt to carry those principles further than the conventional interpretation.

Now while we are immersed in thoughts of that kind, while, in short, we are looking at the world and asking what is practically possible and trying to adjust our ideals to that standard, we are in no mind and mood to lay hold of the spirit of the Christian life. Was any moral and spiritual enthusiasm ever born by looking at the world and asking what it would allow? There has been a touch of the extravagant and even of the impossible about all the greatest movements of the human spirit.

If you look at all deeply into such idealism as the Sermon on the Mount you will not be long in doubt as to where that element of extravagance comes from. It is born of the vision of God in the soul of man. There is really nothing more extravagant in this world than the Christian conception of God. A God who makes His sun shine on the just and the unjust equally, who never adjusts His gifts to men's thankfulness for them, is not one whom you can fit into the narrow limits of any practical scheme. What has the ordinary man of the world to say about such a tremendous truth as that of forgiveness? Would he think it wise to meet men who had disobeyed his orders and outraged his laws with the spirit of mercy, and a willingness to receive them back into the old relationship? The world has come to take these things for granted after the fashion of Heine's famous comment—"Of course God will forgive, it's His business to."

The truth is that the ordinary average man accepts the extravagance of the divine love and mercy, but when he comes to deal with his fellows he guides his conduct by all the reserves and qualifications of shrewdness and caution. We have not thought our religion far enough into life while we allow that gulf to remain as wide as it is.

If there be any truth which Our Lord taught with the whole emphasis of His mind and spirit, it is that there is a fine balance between God's relationship to man and man's relationship to his fellow. In parable and simile and incisive saying He told men that their spiritual receipts would be adjusted to their spiritual expenditure, and that the measure of human giving must set the measure in which God would bestow. Men sometimes forget that there is a divine practicality as well as a human one, and we are forgiven so that we may forgive, blessed so that we may bless. Man's sonship to God is an empty and vain title, a worthless name of honour, unless the vision of God penetrates through the whole of life in that fashion.

That is the spirit of all Christ's teaching, and it cannot be understood without that key to it. How often have we stood before these great principles of living almost paralyzed by their difficulty. "How can we love our enemies?" we have asked. "How can we give and forgive amid such ingratitude and wrong?" The words which tell us to do so have seemed remote and cold, shining above the snow-line of the spiritual heights. Again and again we have confessed our inability to attain to anything like this spirit, we have resigned the task as hopeless and gone back to the average life of resentments and grudges.

Thinking in that way we have missed the secret of Christ. The heart of man is like metal in this respect, that it must be melted before it can be shaped, and the teaching of Christ is not cold and remote, but heated to the pitch of passion. There is a gospel behind every principle in the Sermon on the Mount. It is because God forgives us that we are asked to forgive; because God loves His enemies that we are told to love ours; because God gives to the unthankful as well as to the grateful that we are bidden to give without reckoning the return. In a word, before Christ asks us to do the impossible He asks us to open our hearts to receive the impossible. While we are wondering whether we can

(Continued on page 82.)

Bolsheviki Warring on Religion

Patriarch and Metropolitan of Petrograd Held as Traitors — Archbishop of Moscow and Other Anti-Soviet Prelates Seized — Priests and Laymen Executed for Opposing the Pillage of Churches by Red Soldiers

By Courtesy of the "New York Herald"

Moscow, Nov. 1.

ONE year ago Prof. Peter Struve, writing in a Russian newspaper published in Paris, said: "Alone the church remains, untouched by Bolshevism and contemptuous of Bolshevism, which cannot injure it."

But since then the church, with 90,000,000 members scattered over one-sixth of the land surface of the globe, has felt the mailed fist of Bolshevism in such a manner that today there is only the skeleton left, and the skeleton is but a puppet that dances when the Soviet Government pulls the strings.

For five years the Bolsheviks had been biding the time to strike at the only great organization left in Russia that stood out against communism and atheism. The opportunity came last January, when under pretense of famine relief they dealt the blow which, to an impartial observer, appears to be a fatal one for religion in Russia.

The conflict began when the Government asked Patriarch Tikhon what the church was prepared to give for the famine relief. The Patriarch at once directed the clergy to hand over all material of value which had not been consecrated. This contribution seemed to appease the milder elements in the Government, but the dominating group of anti-clericals insisted that all objects, consecrated as well as unconsecrated, be given up. These extremists had their way, and on February 23 the president of the All-Russian Central Committee decreed that within a month all objects of gold, silver and precious stones must be removed.

The carrying out of these decrees would have involved sacrilege, since by the law of the church consecrated objects cannot be touched by laymen. So the Patriarch reminded the clergy that they would be liable to excommunication if they took part in yielding the consecrated property. The Soviet authorities immediately enforced their decree and applied it to all creeds. There was such resistance by the people in some provinces, especially at Shouya, near Vladimir, that the troops were called out and blood was spilled on both sides. But the Government used the iron hand. Two priests were condemned at Shouya and the public was cowed. Moreover opposition to the seizures was greatly weakened by the violent but skillful press campaign in which the hierarchy was accused of counter revolutionary tendencies and treachery toward the starving of the Volga, and secondly, by the defection of some of the Orthodox clergy, notably Bishop Antonine of Moscow.

Thus the Government was able not only to confiscate the church property, but also to use, with great advantage to itself, the false position in which it placed the church. Priests and laymen who opposed the spoliation of church property were arrested. Some were tried and condemned. Numerous arrests and a few death sentences were reported from the provinces and some of the best-known ecclesiastics of Moscow still are in prison. The most sensational trial was that which ended in the sentencing to death of eight priests and three civilians, one of whom was the daughter-in-law of Gen. Brusilov. This severity so alarmed the Soviet Government that in the popular newspapers the death sentence was omitted and an impression conveyed that the accused got only one year's imprisonment. But the Pravda and the Izvestia, which circulate among the official and educated classes, gave the sentence in full.

Nothing in the published evidence supported the Soviet Government's charge that the opposition to confiscation was a counter revolutionary plot. Indeed, the church has laid itself open to the charge of excessive docility and supineness rather than to the charge of rebellion.

The Bolsheviks, emboldened by their successes, declared that they would place the Patriarch on trial for anti-Soviet conspiracy, and Tikhon is now a prisoner. Meanwhile they profited by the discords which had arisen in the church and they created within it a party subservient to their purpose. Antonine of Moscow, already mentioned, is their tool; he is an ecclesiastic of heterodox views and little standing.

Referring to the Bolshevik statement that "there has been no attack upon the church" a high and impartial authority writes to me:

"This statement is not in accordance with fact. The Soviet Government has from the outset pursued a definitely anti-clerical policy and has never lost an opportunity to hold religion up to ridicule. The latest legislation on the subject of religion is particularly illuminating as showing its attitude in this connection. Clause 121 of the New Criminal Code runs as follows: 'The teaching of religious beliefs in State or private educational establishments and schools to children of tender age and to minors is punishable by forced labor for a period not exceeding one year.'"

According to the same authority the pillaging of the church was quite unnecessary, for if the Soviet Government wanted jewelry to sell it could sell the jewels in the Kremlin. These they exhibited to former Gov. Goodrich of Indiana, when he was here, and he agreed with the Bolsheviks that the total value of these crown jewels does not fall short of one million of gold rubles.

The Central Famine Committee, which had called on Tikhon for a contribution to the fund, was satisfied with the offering of unconsecrated objects. But anti-clericals, such as Galkin (Gerov) scoffed at the smallness of it. An article appeared in the Pravda over Gorev's signature, entitled "The Mountain Brings Forth a Mouse" and this was followed by bitter attacks on the Patriarch in the Government newspapers and on placards pasted on the walls. The Bolshevik leaders decided that the church valuables should be contributed not by the church but by the State.

The press attacks on the Patriarch became so strong that on February 26 Tikhon wrote to Kalinin, the President of the All-Russian Executive Committee, asking that they be stopped. Tikhon also stated that the Central Famine Committee should abide his original offer, whereby church valuables were to be offered, not forcibly confiscated, checked and then handed over to the famine committee with the consent of the faithful. Finally, Tikhon warned Kalinin that in the event of his request being refused he would inform the faithful that he had been misled by the famine committee and even by written documents which he had received from it.

The Patriarch received no reply, and on March 22 he issued a second edict explaining his position and the church's view of the confiscation of consecrated objects. In this edict, as in his first, the Patriarch encouraged the faithful to offer church objects which were not used for divine service, and only protested against the confiscation of vessels, etc., which were so used.

Gold vessels are rare in the Russian churches. Chalices are usually of silver gilt and represent a very insignificant proportion of the total amount of silver in the churches. The famine fund would have lost very little if in its confiscation of ecclesiastical ornaments it had excepted eucharistic vessels.

A high ecclesiastic who stood at Tikhon's side throughout all this troubled period informed the New York Herald correspondent that the Patriarch had no intention of inciting the faithful to use physical force. On the contrary, the Patriarch always had condemned bloodshed and civil war, and on April 11 in a circular letter to the bishops he condemned active opposition to the Government such as had taken place at Shouya, Smolensk, Rostov-on-Don and at Doeogomilov in Moscow, and he enjoined the bishops to dissuade the faithful from the use of violence.

The theologians searched ecclesiastical history for a precedent to the Patriarch's criticism of the civil power, and they found plenty. St. Ambrose of Milan, recognized by the Latin and the Greek churches, refused to obey the order of Valentine II. to hand over the Slavonic Basilica, to the Arians, and the Metropolitan Philip publicly denounced John the Terrible for his savage execution of his son.

The Soviet press grew more violent over the second edict. Tikhon and the priests were accused of greed and avarice, though church valuables had never been used to satisfy the material needs of the clergy. Tikhon was told that he had forgotten the laws of Christ and that he placed gold before human life. Any one who knows how able and insidious Bolshevik propaganda can be will understand how these attacks damaged the prestige of the church. And as there is no press in Russia except the official press, there was no possibility of refuting these calumnies.

In the meantime the Government was dealing sternly with the clergy opposing confiscation. The chief priest of the Moscow diocese, the Metropolitan Krutitsky-Evseyev, died early in February and the Patriarch appointed Archbishop Nikander as his successor. The Orthodox church in Russia is ruled by bishops through senior priests, who are called "heads of dioceses." A diocese is composed of about twenty parishes. Archbishop Nikander, wishing to acquaint himself with the condition of religious life in Moscow and to meet his clergy, summoned a conference of the heads of dioceses for February 27. It was after this conference broke up that the confiscation decree of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee was published; and to consider it Nikander called a conference. It was decided not to resist the Government by force or encourage the people to do so, but to point out to the faithful the legal way of defending the sacred vessels and to petition the Government to exclude these or to agree to an exchange for unconsecrated objects of equal value and of the same metal.

The Government paid no attention to this offer, but on the other hand made wholesale arrests of the Moscow priests. Among those still in prison are Archbishops Nikander and Seraphim, Bishop Ilarion, almost all the members of the Supreme Church Administration and the Moscow Eparchial Council, as well as many distinguished priests. The general explanation of the sudden arrests was that, being determined to confiscate the sacred vessels and fearing opposition from the faithful, the Government decided to remove beforehand those ecclesiastics who might have headed such opposition.

Then the confiscation began. First the church was surrounded by cavalry and infantry. Nobody was allowed in to save the priests and the representatives of the people. At some distance from the churches crowds would collect; and to judge from the cries, they were always hostile to the Government representatives, whom they called atheists, plunderers and oppressors. In some places boys threw sticks and stones at the Red soldiers and then ran away. Spies mixed with the people, noted down those who were most outspoken in their criticism and then denounced them to the police, or sometimes provoked men to criticise and then had them arrested.

Such scenes took place all over Russia, and it seemed as if a new terror was to be loosed. Most of the priests sided with the Patriarch, but a few opposed him and even denounced him in the press. Among these were Antonine, who had been living in retirement in Moscow; Bishop Evdoky of Nizhninovgorod, a group of Petrograd priests led by Father Vedensky and two Moscow priests, Kalinovsky and Borisov.

It must be remembered that the Soviet Government has a fanatical hatred of religion and is very suspicious of the Christian priesthood. According to the Government, all the trouble was caused by the Patriarch and an influential though numerically insignificant group of bishops. These, the Bolsheviks contended, forced the lower clergy to inflame the masses.

Representing as it does a party which was a very small minority, and feeling acutely that the great mass of the people regard it with deep distrust, the Soviet power is always haunted by fear of conspiracy and always hunting for counter-revolutionary plots. Through its G. P. U. it lashes out blindly, killing right and left, just as Abdul Hamid lashed out more than once through his Kurds at the unfortunate Armenians.

In the eyes of such a Government the church's opposition became a widely spread political plot to overthrow the Government. It must be admitted that the action of the Russian emigrants abroad supplies ample food for these suspicions.

The actions and speeches of those bishops and priests who were favorable to the Government in its confiscation policy inspired the Soviet with the hope that internal dissensions would bring down the whole church, and the official press loudly rejoiced at the schism. Meanwhile the Government determined to terrorize the church leaders and to break up the whole ecclesiastical organization.

In the prosecutions for the disturbances over the confiscations persons of secondary importance were tried first, next those regarded as ringleaders and then fifty-four persons, including seven archdeacons and several priests and deacons. Next came the trial of Bishops Nikander and Ilarion and the most eminent representatives of the Moscow priesthood. Last of all came the trial of the Patriarch.

The trial of the fifty-four began on April 26 and finished on May 6. The accused were divided into several groups, the first composed of deacons charged with having taken part in popular tumults. They were liberated on the ground that they had acted under the orders of the priests. The priests, who composed the second group, were charged with having called upon the faithful to resist the authority of the Government.

A quotation from the Act of Accusation may not be out of place here, as it shows the mentality of the accusers:

"The decrees of the Central executive Committee regarding confiscation of church treasures brought forth a violent protest from that part of the priesthood which, having been deprived during the preceding four years of its previous greatness, had already entered several times into strife with Soviet Russia, and had aided the regiments of landowners and capitalists in their struggle with the workmen and peasants of the Red army. . . . Taking advantage of the famine on the Volga and relying on old people, fanatics, weak-minded persons and hooligans and concealing their selfish objects under the flag of religion, they are again trying to enter into conflict with Soviet Russia. By proclaiming the church valuables inviolable despite the categorical decision of the Soviet power to take these valuables for the purpose of buying bread with them for the hungry, they thereby incited the masses of the people to engage in civil war. The accused could not be ignorant of the fact that the appeal of Tikhon, who openly summoned the people to oppose the civil power, is undoubtedly a counter-revolutionary act, for which reason the accusation against them cannot be regarded as merely opposition. By refusing assistance to the starving, Tikhon is guilty of another counter-revolutionary act against the power of the workmen and peasants and favoring the return of Russia to its former state in order that he may maintain his own former rights and privileges as well as the abundant wealth which the Soviet power is at present giving to the starving with the object of saving their lives."

The weakness of this charge is evident, and the prosecution could not find a single fact to support it.

possibly do what He asks He assures us of receiving at the hands of God the very thing we are hesitating about giving. It seems to me that the very soul of the Christian life lies in that blended receiving and giving. We are constrained to live so that we may be the children of our Father who is in heaven.

So the teaching of Christ about life must of necessity seem incomprehensible and unreal to anyone who leaves out of account His revelation of God. The one depends upon the other at every turn. Christian morality apart from Christian religion is a system without a source. Furthermore, you cannot revive the one except through the other. Men will not, suddenly, and at their own insight, begin to be merciful and generous and forgiving. The only thing which will lift men out of their moral impotence is the passion for God, the desire to be His children with His likeness imprinted upon them.

I have led your minds to this point because it seems to me to mark the stage at which the world has arrived in these strange times of ours. On the one hand religion has come to such a pass in our day that for vast numbers of men, perhaps for the majority of men, the Christian language about God wakens no deep response in their heart. They do not deny its truth, many of them are not concerned enough with the subject even to deny it; they simply let it pass them by. It is not that the life of our time is specially corrupted; men hold generally to an ideal of decency and fair play, and these qualities are by no means to be despised, but about the deep things of life their hearts are listless and unmoved. They live without any kind of worship and for great numbers of them the golf links or any kind of ordinary pleasure is a greater attraction. The problem is not so much that men neglect the duty of worship as that they feel no need of it. You can excuse the habit as you like, but it means that the Christian thought about God simply does not count for them. It is not in condemnation that I speak, for the Church has a part of the responsibility to bear because of her deadness, but there the fact is. Not only in our own land but in every country great masses of the people make no sort of outward response to the religion of Christ. They do not live as though the God and Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ reigned above us all. Faith in that living sense is dormant. It is not dead. It will wake to life again some day, but for the present it sleeps and other matters dominate the thoughts of men.

That is one fact of the present situation. The other is that everywhere in the world of to-day the crux of things turns on the issue whether men are prepared courageously to follow the light of Christ's teaching about life. What is the need of the world to-day? To get men to take a sane and responsible share in the duties of life, to think through things, to work hard, to realize that everything, in the last resort, must be interpreted in the light of individual responsibility. That is the first thing, and Christ called it service, consecrating oneself, losing one's life. Then beyond that on every horizon of the world there are the numberless questions that gather about class and nation. How are the classes to work together? How are the nations to forget old animosities and put on one side old and stubborn hatred? The world looks at these problems and tries by every shift and compromise to get around them, but at the next moment back they come in some new form. So stubborn the problem is that statesmen begin to talk in strange ways about the need of the Christian spirit being at the basis of everything, but they rarely talk like that until they reach the end of other expedencies. I recall the words of a recent writer who said, "You cannot make a permanent society by tying a bundle of selfish folk together with some rotten string of class or self-interest." Include nation as well as class in that saying and you have a picture of the impotence of to-day. The old principles will simply not carry us any further.

We may sympathise with those who have bitterness to feed upon as they summon old memories to the mind, and for the man who belongs to a class that has been wronged, and to a nation unjustly treated our hearts must go out in sympathy. It may be if we had their memories to feed upon we should be talking in their accent. Religion must not speak with superior cant. But not for a moment must sympathy with an old wrong lead to agreement with the bitterness and hatred which so often springs from it. Hatred is a hardy annual in the garden of life, and bears its fatal blooms with unfailing regularity. Wrong goes to produce wrong, until the sickening tale breaks out into devastating strife. You must break that disastrous circle if the world is to be saved; and saved it can be but only by one thing—the way and spirit of Christ.

There will be a cross in it, of course, the seeming weakness, the shame, the contempt, but it is the only way nevertheless, and the world is beginning to realize it however far men are from setting out on the path. Do you not feel, looking deeply into the events of the moment, that the greatest need of all is some force which can set the Christian spirit in motion, a transforming power which can turn a vague sense of disquiet and dissatisfaction into a firm resolve and conviction?

What can do that? You cannot begin to practice the Christian ethic on that wide scale as though you could take an old and neglected recipe out of a drawer when everything else had been tried and had failed. The thing on which men are driven back as a last resort is never a thing they practice wisely. They turn to it as though it were magic, and there is no swiftly working magic in this world of ours. The only way to recover the Christian ethic is through the Christian religion, that widely neglected thing.

There is no extravagance without passion, and it is the kindling touch of God we need to move us to that extravagance of mercy and forgiveness and service that the world needs with so deep a hunger of spirit. And it is our task in the Church to lead the way. That is our high calling, our heart-searching business, our privilege and travail, to understand our gospel better, to preach it with new passion and conviction, to live it out with new courage and adventure until the fire spreads and the World has free course again. To preach God as He is in Christ is the greatest business in the world, the business that goes right down to the roots of all the needs of the world. It is only the extravagance of God's grace and the adventures of faith and service inspired by it which can ever save mankind. The world of to-day is beginning to see what harvest it needs; it is our high task first to understand ourselves, and then show to others the only ground from which that harvest can spring.

The National Church of Bulgaria

By Pastor D. N. Furnajeff

Minister of the Evangelical Church, Sofia, Bulgaria

MOST countries in Europe have National or State churches. So does Bulgaria. The Eastern or Orthodox (also called the Greek Catholic Church, of which the Bulgarian National Church forms a branch, is the church in Russia, Roumania, Serbia, Bulgaria, Greece, et cetera. A vital difference between the Roman Catholic and the Orthodox church is their attitude towards the Pope. The Orthodox Church not only pays no allegiance, nor recognizes his authority and infallibility, but considers him a usurper of authority. They also have dogmatic differences, but the Eastern Church is behind the times both in expression and interpretation of its theology to-day.

The Orthodox Church prides itself on its past; its renowned Fathers, its great preachers, and its power to preserve the nationality and faith of its people while under non-Christian rule, as in the case of the Bulgarians, Serbs, and Greeks during centuries of Turkish rule.

The Orthodox Church is actually oriental, and has remained intact in spite of the influence of modernism. Its ritual, liturgy, forms and ceremonies remain the same as when formulated centuries ago; it still uses one or another ancient and unintelligible language. In Russia, it is the old Slavic, as in Bulgaria and Serbia, while in Greece it is the ancient Greek. To a practical and intelligent man of to-day this lacks reason and justification, but in those countries you will find even intelligent individuals who claim this to be a divine order.

The Eastern Church is pre-eminently mystical in contrast to the rational tendency of to-day. Here the argument is divided between that great church and the Protestant position. Conservatism, both theological and ecclesiastical, is very strong in the Orthodox Church. For the present, changes, reforms, or reconstructions of momentous import are not possible. Under the present hierarchic system of government, with the veto power vested in strongly conservative bishops, progress is very difficult. "Reconstruction of Religion" is an unwelcome suggestion to them. Hope, therefore, lies with the future more progressive leaders.

The regular parish priests marry once, but only once.

However, the Orthodox Church offers its highest offices, as position of bishops, to celibate clergymen. This of course is in spite of the teachings of the Apostle Paul.

As to the National Church of Bulgaria, the writer of these lines can say something of an encouraging and hopeful character. For five hundred years the Bulgarian Church has been in conflict with Mohammedanism during the Turkish rule in the Balkans, and has held faithful and strong to the end, with the exception of the Pornaks, who, under tremendous Mohammedan pressure from the Turks, finally surrendered themselves to become Mohammedans, although to this day they speak in Thrace and elsewhere only the Bulgarian language. The Bulgarian Church has been in conflict with its former ecclesiastical head, the Patriarch of Constantinople, who, under the garb of church authority, was extending Hellenic nationality. Historically, the Bulgarian Church has been in conflicts to preserve the national identity of the race, its national consciousness and its national rights. And in these it has achieved notable success.

The National Church of Bulgaria held a General Council a year ago and some forward steps were taken. It was an assembly of two hundred and fifty delegates, clerical and laymen, some extremely conservative and others extremely radical; some artful statesmen and lawyers, and others humble and devout peasants; some impulsive and quick-witted; and others phlegmatic and slow-witted. In its vast majority, the assembly was conservative, but still it passed some fine rules and measures. The practice of some priests in dedicating newly opened saloons was discountenanced, and the Council declared itself for national temperance. Provision was made for furthering the mental and moral development of the priests, for organizing Sunday Schools, for grouping the members of each parish for organized mutual self-help, and so on.

The conservatism of the church does not permit great strides ahead and radical changes on a big scale, but the constituency of the Council pressed hard for reforms and the rigidly conservative hierarchy had to yield on several points.

The Bulgarian Church is making progress on the question of the Scriptures in the vernacular of the people. In this respect there is a decided difference between the Orthodox Church in Greece and the Orthodox Church in Bulgaria. According to the British and Foreign Bible Society, about twenty years have now come and gone since the New Testament in modern Greek was declared a forbidden book throughout the Hellenic kingdom. In no other civilized country is the Word of God in the language of the people prohibited by law. (Report of the British and Foreign Bible Society, 1906-1907). In Bulgaria, the case stands quite differently. The Bulgarian Bible, translated by the British and Foreign Bible Society, is freely sold, distributed and used by both clergy and laity. The Synod of the Bulgarian Church has recently issued a second edition of the Four Gospels, the translation of which was made by native scholars of the church, and a third edition will soon be necessary. The liturgic books have been published in the vernacular of the people and sometimes are used in the church services, instead of the old Slavic. Sunday sermons on the Gospel are frequently delivered. The choir singing is a specialty of late. All of these things are making the service of the city churches both popular and helpful.

Bulgaria is open to mission work, preaching, schools and propaganda, while in Greece, Serbia and Roumania these things are forbidden. For that the Bulgarian Church deserves praise.

There are members of the higher and lower clergy in the Bulgarian Church who deserve all the respect and devotion they receive, because of their spiritual and ecclesiastical efficiency and zeal. Particularly deserving of such respect is the new Bishop Stefan, Metropolitan of Sofia, who is a wide-awake, highly educated, energetic and influential leader of the church. He is the president of the Bulgarian Council of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches, and his leadership will surely further the desired peace in the Balkans.

Misconceptions About Force and War

By Mrs. Lucia Ames Mead

IN an article entitled, "War, Force and Police," three Atlanta clergymen present an earnest and courteous protest to the appeal of Dr. Jowett for a conference of the Christian Church to take steps to end all war hereafter. These clergymen claim that to condemn war without any qualification would be a fundamental mistake and would "mean the condemnation of the use of all organized force. . . . A sweeping condemnation of war as a sin, makes no provision for the police protection of society."

Have not these good men failed to see the fundamental distinction between the police type of force and that employed by armies and navies? Police are primarily engaged in kindly protective work, guarding the traffic, looking after people in time of fire, etc. When a crime seems to have been committed, they are allowed to use only the minimum of force necessary to get on the handcuffs and to get their prisoner before a judge and jury. They give their testimony and return to their beat while conviction and punishment are meted out by the Court. The business of the police is to take to Court, never to punish. They may, of course, defend themselves as may any other citizen if they are attacked, and they may shoot a fleeing criminal, but that is not properly speaking punishment.

Neither city police nor militia nor constabulary are rival bodies. The militia of one State is not preparing to defend itself against the militia of another State, nor the police of one city to defend itself against the police of another city. Police stand for maintenance of law and order, through judicial procedure, their function is vastly more to be respected than that of the soldier. Armies and navies are but the instruments of nations prepared for international duelling. Armies and navies are rival bodies. Armies and navies never take anyone to Court. They try to settle questions of honor, of boundaries, of money obligations of race prejudice and ancient feuds by means of explosives. There is no normal, rational relation between the end to be attained and the means used. It is a question of settlement by might, not right.

The protestors would doubtless say that explosives also may be used to destroy oppressors who are abusing the weak. They justify war some times and then camouflage it by calling it "policing." Like all decent people, they do not want to let "orphanages and schools be looted and destroyed." They do not see how we can condemn war and enter the League of Nations, because it may be called upon "to use force for the protection of the safety of the 'little ones' of the world."

There seems to be here another misapprehension. A League of Nations is not complete until it includes all nations. When it includes all, rival armies and navies will be abolished. The League might then employ a small sea and land force. But this could work only under collective control, as the police work simply to compel nations to take their case to court. Any force that it used against a recalcitrant nation could not be called war in the proper sense. The sheriff may properly fire on a lynching mob that wants to break down a jail. He does this only after reading the riot act and giving opportunity for the madmen to disperse. He does not fire as an individual, but as the agent delegated by the community. In all probability no international police would ever shed blood, if the boycott of all nations had been first threatened and then applied to an obstinate aggressor. No nation could afford to be cut off from the rest of the world. "You will never need an army behind the Hague Court to enforce its decision," said former Justice Brewer. The Supreme Court of the United States has more than once found a State refusing to accept its decision, but it has never used force in all its 87 interstate decisions. In fact it had no force to use. Yet it has kept the peace around the border of each State and saved little wars and breaking our nation into fragments.

It is not necessary to condemn all use of force in order to condemn war as a legalized method of settling international disputes. It is not necessary to condemn all war in the past before the world became organic to condemn it now that the nations have become an organic whole. No one wants to blame the heroes of the Revolution or the Civil War. It must be remembered that long after war between nations is ended there will be the possibility of civil war and the certainty of murder and violence. These belong in other categories. We may look upon war in the past as we look upon polygamy and slavery, the sins of a period of undevelopment, infinitely more heinous now than they were once.

The Christian clergy who sign the protest referred to seem to feel that "condemnation of all war makes no provision for the police protection of society and fails to face the fact that there are pagan and anarchic forces in the world which are a constant menace to civilization." There are no pagan people in the world whom we need dread, except on the score of contagious disease and a drag on general progress, unless it be those to whom Christians have sold guns and taught to fight. The illiterate people of the world do not invent submarines and T. N. T. and other dangerous agents of destruction. It is only highly trained, Christian people whom we need dread. There is no nation of anarchists, i. e., of extreme individualists without law, unless it be nomads, like the Esquimaux. No army is needed to capture individuals who commit violence.

The difficulty with the three protestors seems to be a confusion of thought and lack of precise definition. They hold that Dr. Jowett's creed "abandons the right of self-protection." Ergo, we must let every man have a gun in his bureau drawer and every nation have an army? They hope to do away with "some of the wars of the world," but they fear that even this hope is endangered by going too far and condemning all war now and hereafter, whatever may be our theory of guilt for past war.

It is the duty of the State to protect its citizens. No nation "abandons the right of self-protection" when it pledges itself to refer every international dispute, not settled by diplomatic means, to one of the three arbiters provided by the covenant of the League of Nations. Our nation has provided very inadequately for the protection from death of its citizens. It has spent over three-quarters of all the Federal revenue in the course of its whole history for war or pensions or something connected with war. It has put a hundred-fold protection where it was least needed and neglected it where it was most needed. We have lost in battle in all our five foreign wars combined fewer than the 85,000 who perished by homicide in our country in the last ten years. We are losing 600,000 citizens annually from preventable accidents and preventable disease. The colossal sums which we have spent from fear of foreign guns, although no nation ever declared war against us, might have saved millions of our citizens who have perished at home through misapplication of Government revenues. If these facts were more generally known, we should not be so anxious about military protection.

What Professor Jowett and all of us must focus attention on is the complete suppression of the war system as a legal institution. As I have said, murders and civil war may long continue, though even these with Government control of weapons and the profit taken out of ammunition will very greatly diminish as soon as the Christian Church insists that war between nations must be abolished and made a crime.

It may be asked whether, until all nations are in the League of Nations and all have pledged themselves to send all disputes to the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague, can we let the Turks run riot and massacre and we cowardly retreat and do nothing to save the wretched refugees? Certainly not. There is something which would bring the Turks to terms. It is the strong cooperation of the United States in the person of official representatives on all conferences and league commissions, and the threat of universal boycott of aggressors. The Turks would have no power of evil if European Christian nations had not been using him as a pawn and a tool to carry out schemes of loot. It was Christian Greeks who in thirty minutes after landing in Smyrna massacred 820 civilian Turks and later, after the Greek armies were defeated and in flight, burned villages and destroyed in true Turkish fashion. What does war but endless war still breed? ,

Cannot the anxious protestors unite with Dr. Jowett and all Christians in saying: "In a world become organic, the war system between nations ought to be and can be completely abolished and only that force permitted which is non-rival and under collective control aims to maintain the peace and order of the world?"

Some Aspirations of the Chinese Church

By Rev. C. Y. Cheng, D. D.

[For nine years Dr. Cheng was joint secretary of the China Continuation Committee, in which all the Protestant Mission Boards working in China co-operated. He presided with very great ability at the great National Christian Conference at Shanghai last May. He studied in London and Scotland, as well as in his native land, and received the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity from Toronto University. He has resigned from his position in China to spend a year of study at Columbia University, New York. The following article is the major portion of an address given before the Foreign Missions Conference at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, this month.]

THE year 1922 finds China still suffering growing pains. Political chaos is not cleared away, and the militaristic spirit has not been subdued; her two gigantic enemies, ignorance and poverty, are still threatening the masses of the people; official corruption and social evils are to be found everywhere; open banditry and ill-disciplined soldiery are disturbing the peaceful people in several provinces; internal strife and external pressure still keep the nation in constant fear and distress. If we say China is still in darkness, it is darkness indeed.

With all these forces tending to pull China down, one wonders what is it that helps China to keep afloat? What constitutes the silver lining in such a stormy sky? Why are the people still optimistic and hopeful under such disheartening circumstances? If we were asked to name the one thing that is keeping China from destruction in the midst of such national distress, we should unhesitatingly say that it is the new branches shooting out from the old stem which is China's salvation. As long as that life continues and grows there is not only hope but a great future for her. The signs of that life are not difficult to observe. They are seen in the growth of public opinion, the development of education, the creation of industries, the extension of self-government, the growth of native leadership, and in the new intellectual awakening which we sometimes speak of as China's renaissance movement. These and many other developments are the unmistakable signs of a new life that is springing up with ever increasing vigor and vitality.

Take the last named, this intellectual awakening, as an example. With little organization and but very few spokesmen this movement has spread like wild fire all over the country in the short period of only one or two years. Its influence on the people can hardly be overestimated. A new desire for learning, a spirit of inquiry, leading to a fearless search for truth, and a firm determination to lead China in a truly democratic pathway, have entered the very being of the young and better educated classes in all parts of the country. This is to us nothing short of a modern miracle. Men are simply dazzled by the power and influence of this movement, which is gaining ground all the time in the hearts of men. The influence of the work of one American educator in China upon the educated young Chinese in one single year was remarkably widespread. The articles written by renaissance writers are moulding the thoughts of literally thousands of the young people of the present day. A band of students has actually rallied around itself the entire nation in an outburst of patriotic feeling. No matter where one goes such signs of life are to be observed and felt today.

We would not however misrepresent the case. The picture has also its less attractive side. Not all that is said and done in connection with the renaissance movement is beneficial. There are weak points, and there have been false moves. It has been well said that these are the marks of youth. They are inevitable in connection with such signs of life. The true observer of China's development will keep his eyes on the growth or otherwise of this new life rather than on the political happenings, which are so changeable, uncertain and bewildering, and which are, in our judgment, of comparatively minor significance.

It is in such a general environment that the Chinese Church finds itself in China at the present time. It will be readily recognized that these national and social movements have both a direct and an indirect bearing upon the life and work of the Christian Church. They affect the youthful Church, which is now beginning to realize its strength and place, in at least two important ways.

In the first place, the Church is forced to inquire more carefully into its teachings, traditions, customs, dogmas and creedal statements, because many men outside the Church, who used to think it beneath their dignity to look into the religion of Christ, are now making an honest effort to study it in order that they may either accept or attack it. We are well within the facts when we say that more has been written against the Christian religion in the past two or three years by educated non-Christian Chinese than in all the preceding years. In the year 1900 the persecution of the Christian was led by the ignorant mob who, without reasoning and discrimination, sought to kill all who believed in Christ, or who had some connection with the Church. Today the attack is on a much higher plane. It is of an intelligent and intellectual kind, and in not a few cases arises from an honest desire to find the truth. Under such circumstances the duty of the Church is clear. She must be prepared to face the issue, and face it squarely.

In the second place, the attitude of the better educated and younger members of the Church toward the traditional Christian faith is increasingly critical. Speaking generally the Christians have in the past been brought up as children in a "do-not-ask-question" fashion, and this has greatly impaired their faculty of thinking for themselves in regard to the teachings and practices of the Christian faith. The missionary has been the giver, and the Chinese Christian the receiver, of good gifts and that is about all. Chinese Christians have taken too many things for granted, and have bodily swallowed the religious food without proper mastication, much as was the case in the old fashioned Chinese school, where children are taught to memorize and recite the Four Books and the Five Classics without in the least understanding them. Such a state of things does not satisfy the young people of today. They want to ask questions, and are beginning to assert themselves.

This leads us to consider what are the aspirations of the Chinese Christians at the present time. The National Christian Conference, held in May of last year, in the Town Hall of Shanghai, may serve as a demarcation between the old order and the new, and as the formal entrance by the Church on a new stage of development. None who were present at this representative gathering, or who have read accounts of it, can fail to see the difference between this conference and those which preceded it. It was the first of its kind in China. True to the signs of the time the general theme chosen for the Conference was "The Chinese Church." It thus came about that for the first time in the history of the Christian movement in China, the Church, and not the mission, occupied the central position around which all discussions gathered. It was further noteworthy that more than half of the delegates were Chinese, the officially elected representatives of the churches in almost all parts of the country. The Conference gave expression to the aspirations of the thinking Chinese Christians who are longing and working for the day of larger self-expression and self-determination. The Conference also did much, we believe, to help the missionary body see more clearly the signs of the times, and to show them the urgency of such adaptation of their mission policies and methods of work as will make possible the speedy fulfilment of these aspirations, aspirations with which, we believe, the missionary body is fully in sympathy because of their frequent use of the words of John the Baptist, "He must increase and I must decrease," in referring to their relations to the Chinese Christians.

It would be presumptuous on our part to say that we have a solution to offer to the problems that are facing the Church in China today. We do wish, however, to point out that the time has come for a thorough-going reconsideration of the whole situation, and for readjustments that will enable the Church to move forward along constructive lines. Failure to make these adjustments will mean disaster to both the Church and the mission. It is both impossible and undesirable to expect the Church to remain in a passive attitude, and we fully recognize that you do not wish her to do so. These signs of new life need to be nurtured and cultivated. The Churches need to be encouraged to move forward to such experiments as they may think best to make, and should not be hindered, hampered or checked even though their work be marked by frequent shortcomings and mistakes. It would seem that the solution to the problem lies in the willingness and readiness of the missions on the field, and of the mission boards at home, to enter heartily into this new stage of development, and to stretch forth their strong arms to help the young Church by its support and advice to move forward to ever greater and larger usefulness in the divine task that has been entrusted to her by Almighty God.

I. The Church is seeking for a larger degree of self-determination. Owing to a variety of circumstances the Chinese Church has fallen into the bad habit of dependence upon the mission for support in various ways. Most of the church buildings, school houses, hospitals and other institutions are the property of the missions. The Chinese Christians enjoy the free use of them all. Certainly there is reason to be thankful for such generous permission. When a church has no pastor, the missionary acts as its pastor. When a church has a pastor but is unable to support him, the mission bears, in part or in whole, the financial responsibility. This is by no means the extent of the Church's dependence. To far too great an extent the Church is still dependent upon the mission for its ideas, the form of its institutions and its methods of work. While the contributions of the Church are increasing year by year it is unfortunately a fact that a very large proportion of the total expenditure of the Christian movement in China to-day still comes from Europe and America. The habitual dependence upon others for help is certainly not ideal for a healthy and robust life of the Church, and the sooner a change is brought about the better. So today in support, in government and in propagation, the Church wants to be self-reliant. These desires, if achieved in a right way, will indeed make progress along a right path. The achievement of self-determination raises many questions of devolution, of transferring control from the mission to the Church. There are many problems involved in such a process of devolution the solution of which cannot be readily given, and many difficulties not easily overcome. But as a matter of principle such a movement is to be encouraged, even though mistakes may be made or failures result in the process. We beg to be pardoned when we say, with all kindness, that the missions have been altogether too fearful of surrendering their control. We say this fully conscious of the steps already taken to organize the Chinese churches as autonomous bodies, and of the degree of freedom that has been theirs. For this we are indeed deeply grateful. But more remains to be done, and the doing of it will require some heroic sacrifice on the part of many missions, and will call for unshaken faith in God as Chinese Christians undertake to formulate for themselves what Christ means to them, and determine the forms of their Christian institutions.

II. The Church is seeking for what for want of a better word we shall venture to call "Chinification." One of the most serious obstacles to the rapid spread of Christianity in China is undoubtedly the stigma that rests upon the Church of being a foreign religion. In introducing Christianity to the people of China, the missionaries have brought with them many of the traditions, customs, institutions and modes of thought of the West, and in many instances they have ignored those of China itself. This has tended to make the Church appear an entirely foreign institution. For many years the common designation of one who becomes a Christian has been "one who eats foreign religion," or "one who follows the foreigners ways." The reason for this state of things is apparent. The foreign missionary knew no other methods of doing Church work than those used in the country from which he came, and the Chinese Christian was either too timid to offer any suggestions, or not in a position to do so. It thus came about that the decisive voice was not Chinese but foreign. It is needless to say that we do not consider things foreign necessarily bad, nor things Chinese always good. There is much we can learn from each other. China did not possess railroads nor use electric lights in the days gone by, but she is making good use of both of them, and she has not thereby denationalized herself. At the same time it is not advisable to lead the people to such a degree that they become denationalized. Non-Christians have felt this to be the case in regard to Christians. It is not strange then that the foreign character of the Church has been the cause of much misunderstanding and prejudice regarding the true meaning of Christianity. There is no royal road to a true and real indigenous Christianity in China. It can be achieved only as the people of the land take up their full share in the support, maintenance, management and control of Christian work. Then, and only then, will the Church become truly indigenous in form, nature, and temperament. Then, and only then, will it be able to express itself in ways that are suited to the needs and aspirations of the people of the land.

III. The Church is seeking for concentration of work. The recent survey undertaken by the China Continuation Committee gives us some idea of the extensiveness of the Christian enterprise in China. It shows that with the exception of 106, all of the 1704 counties in China are "claimed" by some mission or Church as a "sphere of influence" in a religious sense of the phrase. The Protestant missions have definitely accepted responsibility for the evangelization of seventy-four per cent of the total territory in China at the present time. The survey also furnishes us with such statistics as follows: There are today in China approximately three hundred seventy-five thousand communicant members of the Protestant Churches, twenty-five hundred salaried mission and Church workers, eleven hundred ordained Chinese ministers, seven hundred schools and colleges with two hundred thousand students, and so on. We have certainly reason to be thankful for what has already been done, though it does not mean that China is fully evangelized and that there is no more land to be possessed. But let us not rest too satisfied with what has already been done, but rather ask ourselves the question: "Has it been done well?" For it is quality rather than quantity that really counts. It has often been argued that the evangelization of China is primarily the task of the Chinese Christians. With this assertion we readily agree. Does this not mean then that the supreme duty of the mission is to concentrate its energy and effort in building up as strong a body of men and women as possible who shall, in time, undertake the great and glorious task of the evangelization of the whole country? Nothing could be further from our intention than to cast a shadow upon the extensive work of the mission. We wish however to voice our clear conviction that the most important work of the missions is to develop and strengthen the work in regions already reached rather than to extend into new fields.

IV. The Church is seeking for a more adequate literature. The two great channels through which the Christian message finds its way to the hearts of the people of China are the spoken and the written word. It is remarkable that in a country like China, where literature occupies so very large a place in its civilization, Christian literature should have gained, as yet, but a very insignificant place on the program of the missionary societies. A glance at the annual budgets of the foreign missions will show how small a proportion of the funds contributed for Christian work is used for this most effective means of promoting Christianity. The fact is all the more surprising when one considers the vast quantity of books, magazines, tracts and pamphlets on Christianity in general, and no missions in particular, that are available in a country like America. There was a short period during which Christian literature did exert a widespread influence in China. The publications issued by the Christian Literature Society, notably the "International Review," were highly regarded and widely read by the better educated classes throughout China during the period of the short-lived reform under the Kuang hsu regime prior to the reactionary movement of the Boxer outbreak in the year 1900. Men like Drs. Young J. Allen and Timothy Richards were looked upon as literary giants of the time. But since the inrushing of western learning, Christian literature has no longer been able to hold its position of leadership, and at the present time it has practically no place at all as a living force in the nation, though a certain amount of good work has always been done from year to year by the existing agencies. But apart from the Bible Societies, the missionary agencies seem to have regarded literature as more or less of a side issue, and have never given it the place in their work which it deserves. We hope to be pardoned when we make bold to say that as a point of strategy the missions have sadly failed here. The influence of the renaissance movement, to which reference has already been made, is due almost entirely to the use it has made of the printed page. The adoption within the past few years of the use of the spoken language as the vehicle of present-day literature, in place of the difficult classical style, is making it possible to impart knowledge to literally millions of our people who were formerly inaccessible. The possibilities which this change in practice have brought stagger one's imagination. It will certainly pay you to look seriously into this matter. Satisfactory Christian literature cannot be secured merely by setting aside for the purpose funds remaining over after other needs have been met, nor by allocating to the work missionaries or Chinese who do not possess the requisite qualifications. Unless you are prepared to lose one of the greatest opportunities of service that will ever be yours as missionary organizations, prompt and energetic measures are imperative. It is important that steps be taken now to give to Chinese of promise a training that will fit them for work in this important field; and that when trained, they be given adequate support to do effective work. This will involve in not a few cases an opportunity to study in this country or Europe. A limited number of missionaries are also needed for this work; but they should be men and women of special training and gifts for work of this kind as they will not themselves do the actual work of writing, it is not necessary that they should have been long resident in China. Their best contributions will be in making available for these Chinese colleagues the best thought of the West. Some years of successful work in literary or promotional work in this land will, at this juncture, be a matter preparation for the type of work they can most usefully do than years of missionary work in China. We urge you to take prompt steps to enter this neglected field of Christian service, in order that by means of the written word, the Living Word may find His way to all the four corners of the land where the human voice cannot be heard, and where the silent messenger alone can penetrate and conquer.

V. The Church is seeking for the co-operation of the mission. While the Chinese Church is working for self-determination, her ideal is not so much independence as the attainment of a true co-operation, a co-operation that will, we hope, not be confined to a few decades merely, but will continue always. We realize full well that in the present stage of the Church's development, the co-operation of the mission is indispensable. Humanly speaking the missionary is the founder of the Chinese Church, but he has to subject himself to it, just as the law-maker has to be governed by the law of his own making. It is sometimes hard for the missionary, but it must be so. When Church and mission have perfectly understood each other's position there will be no reason for taking any other attitude than that of the closest friendship and partnership in the common task of establishing the Christian Church in China.

VI. The Church is seeking for unity among the various church bodies. The introduction of denominationalism of the West into China has not met with a warm reception. To lay stress on such differences and to perpetuate such divisions in China is not only working against the highest hopes and desires of the Chinese, but is putting upon the shoulders of the "weak brethren in Christ" a yoke that is uncalled for, unnecessary and undesirable. We would not for a moment speak slightly about such differences in the Churches of the West.

They have no doubt in times past been of real value, though may it not be that even at the best they have served their day? But the Chinese Christians do not welcome such denominationalism because it belongs to somebody else and not to them. David's victory over the giant enemy was not achieved by wearing the armour of Saul. There is no reason why in accepting Christianity Chinese Christians should accept also the many diverse institutions and traditions of the West with the shaping of which they have nothing to do and in which they are not interested. To urge them to adopt such sectarianism is indeed belittling the lofty ideals of Christ. Happily some missions in China do appreciate this point of view of the Chinese Church, and are working for greater and more effective unity. When the Churches in Canton desired to come together to form a united body, the union was formed naturally and easily. Seven denominational bodies united under the name of the Chinese Christian Church of Canton. Similarly in the Amoy district the Presbyterian and the Congregational Churches have joined hands and became one ecclesiastical family. And there is prospect of the union at no distant date of all the Presbyterian and Congregational Churches in China. But it is not practicable for all the Churches so to unite at the present time. Other measures have been taken whereby missions and churches may confer and work together in matters of a common interest, leaving the denominational integrity undisturbed. In higher educational work, in city-wide evangelistic activity, in Christian literature, and in many other directions, united efforts have yielded much fruitful result. As an outcome of the recent National Christian Conference in Shanghai, a National Christian Council has been formed, which will carry on the work begun by the China Continuation Committee and will greatly strengthen the tie of Christian unity and oneness. The Council is composed of one hundred men and women officially representing the missions and churches. They are united in a common task in which all are interested and which is of vital concern to them all. The organization of the Council has the hearty support of the Chinese delegates to the National Conference last May, and they look to it as one of the important means of helping them understand better what ideals they should strive to attain, and of creating the atmosphere in which the attainment of these ideals will be possible. They are confident that the Council will lead the Churches to a better understanding, bring about more Christian brotherliness, and increase the efficiency of their united endeavors. These movements need your whole-hearted support if they are to make their full contribution. Who knows but what these small beginnings of to-day may not lead to larger and greater unity in the whole of Christendom, and thus usher in a new day for the influence of the Christian Church in the world.

VII. The Church is seeking for the development of native talent. If there is one thing that the Church needs more than another at the present time, it is the securing and training of Chinese for positions of leadership. That the supreme need of the Chinese Church is a need of men is a fact all must recognize. The Chinese are eager to learn, and are seeking the best possible training. Whenever good education is offered in a Christian institution, there is no difficulty in getting students. By means of private support, the aid of the Chinese Government, and the substantial assistance of America, more than two thousand Chinese students have come over to this country for further study. Even a Chinese tobacco firm sees fit to support, in America alone, some forty Chinese students, that they may have the opportunity of Western training. It is among her young sons and daughters that China looks for future leadership in steering her national affairs and in bringing about social betterment. With a few notable exceptions, the missions, so far, have done little along these lines for the development of future leadership. We should venture to call your attention to experiments being made by the Methodist, the Northern Baptist and the Protestant Episcopal Missions. If all the missions would undertake to pick out men and women who have had college training in China, some experience in practical work, and have proved themselves trustworthy and dependable, and then bring them to America or Europe for a time for advanced studies, it would benefit the future Chinese Church in no small degree. Without such a well trained leadership, it is not only vain, but actually dangerous, to talk about self-determination and independence when, in the eagerness for devolution, responsibilities would have to be turned over to men of inadequate vision, training and capacity for leadership. If the talk of devolution really means business, then the best possible training of the native leadership of the Church is of fundamental importance.

VIII. The Church is seeking for more missionaries. It is far from our purpose to give the impression that the coming forward of Chinese means that the missionaries are to retire from the scene, and that more of them are not needed. That is far from being the case. There is a real need of, and room for, more new missionaries in China. In a sense they are more needed to-day than ever before. But a word is necessary regarding the missionaries who are needed in China under the new conditions that have arisen. In addition to possessing spiritual and intellectual qualifications the missionary of to-day needs to thoroughly understand that his task is to assist the Chinese Church, and to be willing to help, not to boss, his Chinese fellow workers. We need, therefore, those who possess a broad and sympathetic heart and are able to form real friendship with the Chinese. We need those who can see and appreciate all that is good and beautiful and true, wherever it is found. We need those who are willing to learn as well as to teach, and who are prepared to work with the Chinese or even under them. We need those who have a real understanding of, and desire for, international brotherhood, and the spirit of tolerance with those who differ from them. We want friends; we desire partners and comrades; we seek for co-operation and sympathy. The Christian Church in China is meeting a situation that is without parallel in the whole history of the Christian movement in that land. The non-Christian people were never so ready to study the words and deeds of Jesus Christ. Christianity was never before so carefully examined and scrutinized. Within Christian circles also a like awakening of interest prevails. Never before were Chinese Christians so ready to work for the divine cause; never before so eager to understand the meaning and the significance of the religion of Christ; never so keen to watch the lives of the Church leaders, and to notice the defects of this spiritual yet human institution, in a word, never before were so closely identified to, and allied with, the life of the Christian Church, and so deeply interested in its welfare. Under such an unusual condition what if we fail to capitalize to the fullest extent the opportunity before us, and vitalize our existing forces? Think of the possibility of success and consequence of failure!

Race Prejudice at Harvard

Harvard University obliges all its academic Freshmen to live in the Freshman dormitories. In the class entering last fall was a negro, Roscoe Conkling Bruce, Jr. President Lowell recently wrote the young man's father that, on account of his race, young Bruce cannot room in the Freshman dormitory. Happily, the ruling had led to the very widest public discussion. President Emeritus Eliot has put himself on record very worthily in regard to it. "I am opposed," he wired in answer to the New York "World's" inquiry, "to every form of racial discrimination in the universities of our heterogeneous democracy. And such discrimination would violate very precious Harvard traditions." Harvard has stood pre-eminently for the rights of all men, especially of the negro. She cannot afford to begin to yield now to the spirit which, at its worst, appears in the Ku Klux Klan.

Russian Personalities and American Food Parcels

By Rev. John Sheridan Zelig, D. D.

[Mr. Zelig was the representative of the Federal Council with the American Relief Administration in Russia, where he spent some months last year supplying help to Russian priests and church dignitaries. With the parcels of food which he distributed, he distributed much cheer also. He has been a true ambassador of international and intercommunal good will.]

WHEN Phillips Brooks was asked whether the long rows of candidates for confirmation did not become very monotonous, he replied that they might if he did not stop to think how much of an event it was in each separate life. It would become the same situation in relief work and the most merciful work in the world might become the most monotonous and the relief worker a hack, if he had no imagination with which to throw a setting around the individual cases. So I like to see those Russians through the eyes of the Russian deacon whose house had been burnt out and who was, with his aged wife, looking forward to nothing, when there descended upon him two whole American food parcels. The poor man went around telling how he and his wife "had been walking on air ever since." What most of us want, after all, is now and then something to make us feel as if we were walking on air.

Nothing in the world could be more colorless than this standard American food parcel with its fifty pounds of flour and twenty-five pounds of rice, its ten of lard or fats, fifteen of sugar and twenty cans of milk. To be sure its three pounds of tea relieved the whiteness of it all a bit, but on the whole there was never anything less dramatic looking and yet with more power to make romantic situations than that same food parcel. Its colorlessness broke into prismatic glory for the widow of the priest who had been murdered by bandits, leaving her to take care of four children recovering from typhus. The other widow of the same neighborhood suffering from cancer and tuberculosis was of course a self-certifying case. The daughter of a priest, the father and mother both dead after severe and prolonged illness, the theological professor now working as a day laborer to support four children and a sister, saw their way at last through a couple of months which must have otherwise been precarious. The village priests are terribly destitute, and I found one maintaining a family of fourteen. A Russian woman who was indefatigable in helping me to find them out said she thought she had known pretty well what the needs were until she began to pry deeper into their plight and was astonished at their silent miseries. I often wished someone had been at hand to tell me to a nicety just how to apportion the relief, but when it came to a family of fourteen almost anybody would know what to do. And, happily, I went to Russia with the fewest possible instructions. Never was a man given more latitude than the Federal Council gave me.

The school teachers were a never-ending line. Over and over the record reads the same: "A school teacher, out of work, no means," or "Work very hard to get, very poor health," or "Old person, formerly school teacher, very poor," or "village school teacher, no wages for months, no work to be found." "Miss ———, is over sixty and has worked for the blind, starting schools and printing for them, another is eighty years old and is starving." But long as the list is it is a list of those who have been relieved. If such was the condition a few months ago, I cannot help thinking how much worse it is now when the educational authorities are told that they must work on an even smaller budget this year. As I read over these records and think of an American woman teacher who can never be done with extolling, quite openly, the excellencies of the situation in Russia, and berating, quite secretly to be sure, the tyrannies and grinding oppressions of life in the United States, I am inclined to give up psychology as a bad job and the most inexact of the sciences.

To-day comes a modest inquiry from the North to know if anything can possibly be left to send for a second time a Federal Council parcel to the literary man who has made a name for himself in his circle, whose invalid child of eight has lost the use of his limbs and can neither hear nor speak. Happily there are some parcels left.

People do seem to need and crave concrete and definite miseries in order to be assured of the worth of their gifts. They may find them when their parcel goes to the half-ruined Ukrainian cottage where lies hopelessly in bed with tuberculosis the widow whose husband in a fit of insanity burnt all their belongings, ran away and was frozen to death. The former teacher from Siberia, Psalm-Reader at the Jordan Church, living in a dugout with wife and five children, finds life going a little better with food enough for two months, and the sound of that lard sizzling at last will not make his Psalms sound less cheerful when he takes them up once more at Jordan Church.

And just to think that with a stroke of the pen, thanks to the A. R. A. (American Relief Administration) and its wonderful system, I could speed a few parcels to the elders of Nijny-Novgorod, just where they are most needed and when they are most wanted. Had anybody told me in my geography days that I should ever have anything to do with Nijny-Novgorod, the school room would not have held me for the inflatedness I should have felt.

Anybody who has had anything to do with Tolstoy or his memory invites help on sight, if it is desired. Interestingly enough both the old regime and the new seem to have let that family alone. You never cease craving to know what Tolstoy would think of the situation to-day. And since the keeper of the Tolstoy Museums has three elder sisters, all invalids, to support on his pittance, it is a foregone conclusion that America will help. The Museums and Collections for the most part stand intact.

One of the worst tragedies of Russia is the effort to improvise education after throwing away nearly all, and that all too little, which the past had made ready. This improvising of everything is blithe enough business for a month or two while there is still much left over from other years, but the strain begins to tell, and since scholars are about the last thing on earth to do anything impromptu, the American Relief and the Y. M. C. A. and the Federal Council and all the rest feel sure they are putting in a good stroke for the future of Russia, whenever they save a scholar. The mental destitution of Russia, the years without any new books written at home and the embargo on books from abroad, make a veritable tragedy. There seems to be no use for the scholar now. But anything may happen, and so the Russian specialist in church history, the distinguished Arctic scholar, the authority on Russian literature, the composer and the painter, the young editorial writer, the professor of the philosophy of law and the student writing a thesis for his degree, we consider almost as American gifts to Russia if we help them alive. When one of the world's greatest Sanscrit scholars, asking nothing for himself, sends a sparing list of other scholars,—with beautiful regard for the younger ones, of course his request settles it. Helping historians would have seemed about the last activity necessary, yet here is one hopelessly crippled by the loss of both legs. Sometimes the food parcel is pay for service rendered and it is interesting to be giving it to a young man who has translated William Blake and Coleridge and Kipling into Russian so that they sound exactly like the originals.

While here and there someone would overdo the tendency to look out for his own immediate circle, for the most part people were scrupulous. To-day comes a letter from one of my most faithful helpers, asking no more of me, supposing it to be all over now, and proposing a request to another agency. But it is not necessary, I can do it still. A well-known professor of a distinguished faculty had died of starvation and now the same fate threatens the whole family, but the threat will not materialize.

The institutions of Russia have been sorely smitten. The great convent of ——— looks so very romantic as you see it in pictures, glorified with gorgeous exterior paintings, in the midst of its estates, now reduced from fifteen hundred to twenty, that it was hard to believe that the whole place, so long a centre of merciful works to a whole countryside, could be thrown into joyful commotion by the arrival of a few of these pale parcels. But so it was. The aged Abbess of eighty-four, whose mother had founded the place to receive for years past all kind of afflicted people, together with the sisters who labored in the diminished fields, supplied all the color that was needful for these pale-looking parcels.

The monastic institutions yielded their full quota of needs, but they had long since ceased to expect that anybody would ever inquire into them. Some of their inmates were paralyzed, some were consumptive, or recovering from typhus, or laid low with rheumatism. One of the monks was recovering from an operation, another had cancer. Those gorgeous domes and belfries and steeples rose above much misery, those incredibly rich outdoor paintings enclosed the bleakest want.

I was not sent to discuss the monastic idea, to endorse it, or examine it or discuss it or even make inquiries about it. If one had been literally minded or denominationally minded, he could have raised ten thousand questions. But somehow I never felt like doing it, they all seemed so much like other people and I felt so much at home with them. We never remotely discussed politics, there were no diatribes against the government and if one looked for the Russians to tell their miseries in a dramatic way he was quite sure to be disappointed.

It seemed almost incredible that the hermit still existed; but he did, and of course was heir to the doom pronounced by Ecclesiastes, "Woe to him that is alone when he falleth." But still almost any one can be lightened a little. Who of us does not have a little of the hermit in him to make him wish ten times a week that he could practice the silences? If you ask why they do not go to work, I would say that most of them do, if any work is to be found anywhere. Out of a forgotten country monastery, quite left out, comes one of the innumerable quaint messages of thanks, put into the best English available thereabouts: "I wish to express you my most deep thanks for your special attention for such pitiful, needy laborers of ——— to whom you have sent the parcels. It is difficult to describe their joy. They have received yesterday your generous gift and send you their thankfulness. I am sorry you do not see their happy faces, blessing you for all your kindness. I transmitted your warm-hearted words, which brought so much light in their tortured souls."

"That group of women," said one of our imperturbable American boys who happened to be in charge just there, "is more like the average group of women in one of our guilds or women's societies at home than anything you will find. They will appreciate it if you go in to speak to them." It was the group which months before had so appealed to Mrs. Egan that she cabled home to a "magnate" to do something for them, which he did. Being a temporary millionaire myself I announced to them that I would do a little more, and I shall never forget the buzz and stir and simmering and tears which set that good company seething and later brought to me through the Supervisor the message: "Will you please tell him that in the hearts of all Russian women, now just turned into working machines, warm, human feelings still exist? Will you kindly let him know that mothers telling their children and grandchildren of their trials and hardships in the awful period outlived by poor Russia, will with much love and gratitude remember the Americans and will teach them also to love and esteem the citizens of the great free country."

"You cannot think what humiliation we feel to think we Russians are having to ask the outside world for daily bread," said a cultivated woman, who, herself in destitution, had made cases of greater destitution her profession ever since the trouble befell. She was a specialist in the miseries of tenements and alleys. I do not think, however, that in her case it was "sorrow's crown of sorrows to have remembered happier days," for her eyes twinkled as she told me how once at dusk she had stolen back to the manor house which had been her home and in the dusk had broken a lock and gotten in just long enough to creep into the library and "steal" one book out of a valued set of her own. The rest of the set, by a well-known social worker in America, she begged I would try to get and send, to help her out in dealing with the hygiene of children.

The situation was, of course, not unrelieved by humor, as in the case of the archaeologist who "ran on" at such length and with such volubility that the interpreters had to do their work in relays in order to catch up with him. Each in turn was tired out at last or retreated, convulsed with laughter at my helplessness before this cheerful human Niagara. His reappearance at the door was a signal for scampering or less for terrific absorption in one's work at the moment. He was like Coleridge, of whom Carlyle said that he liked a good listener, but, failing that, he was content with a patient one. But I believe this good brother would go one better and continue cheerfully if he had none at all. I am sure that the explorations of this archaeologist never dug up anything more amazing than himself.

But all the time that I was dealing with these individuals it was pleasant to know that I was killing two birds with one stone, or saving two lives at one stroke, for though we paid ten dollars for the food package a quarter of the ten dollars was automatically conveyed over to apply to child feeding. So while no beneficiary was complaining of the size of his parcel, you knew that it meant also the giving of I have no idea how many full meals to some Russian child. They were a blithe company who sat at long tables all over Russia getting enough in their one daily meal to put them upon their feet and even make them look rosy and cheerful. Sometimes one of them would be put forward to make a brief and blushing but very sincere speech to the visiting Americans. And one of them who was daily fed in the former Czar's kitchens at Tsarkoe-Selo expressed his eleven-year-old exuberance in a set of seven very remarkable water-color paintings which portrayed with amazing skill and beauty what the Americans were doing. I expressed a desire that the young artist would paint me a duplicate set and was told that I might have the originals right then, and he could do another set any time for the A. R. A., to whom he had given them. When I asked the price I was told that two million rubles would be quite enough and would make him very happy. So the exchange was made. Two million rubles are normally about one million dollars, but rubles are slightly depressed at present. It has not been altogether easy after dealing for months in millions to come back to this gingerly reckoning in dimes, quarters and dollars, as we have to do in our poor neighborhoods at home.

All the time nobody ever breathed quite freely. There was always a vague and subtle discomfort in the atmosphere, which was not at all relieved by having your superior tell you "not to trust anybody." My secretary kept me on the anxious seat for a fortnight, I was so sure she was a spy. And then all Russians have a way of looking at you which makes you wonder what is impending. If there were no mystery within a mile they would go to work to create some. As it turned out she was no spy at all, but I think they all like to act as if they were. On his return Dr. John Haynes Holmes spoke of the sense of freedom which he experienced in the very atmosphere of Moscow as compared with any of the cities of Central Europe. All I can say about that can best be said in the words of Mr. Dooley: "Him and me would get on fine together if you could only keep us apart."

I shall never forget that endless line of persons to whom these American parcels got me an introduction, and as I look back on them I chiefly feel how much like other people they all were. I felt more at home with them than with any other foreigners I ever met, though I am bound to say that every year of my life I like foreigners better and better.

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

Four British Preachers*

COULD one ask for a more representative example of Free Church preaching in Great Britain than one finds in these three volumes of sermons which have just been republished in this country. (See note below.) Dr. Hutton, the scholar, the successor of John Hunter and Jonathan Brierley in the British apostolate; Dr. Orchard, the most popular preacher in London, mystic and leader of the movement toward a new Catholicism, and Dr. Berry, successor of such men as John Clifford and Sylvester Horne, virile and beloved leaders of men.

Dr. Hutton is not unknown in America. He has preached often at Northfield and at the Fifth Avenue Church, New York. Several of his books have been published in this country. "The Persistent Word of God" we are always recommending to our readers as about the best example of expository preaching at its best that we know. His lecture on preaching: "That the Ministry be not Blamed" is original and suggestive, positively refreshing after the many rather commonplace lectures on preaching frequently published. Dr. Hutton has also taken, in a way, the place of Jonathan Brierley on THE CHRISTIAN WORLD of London. Indeed several of these sermons have previously appeared in that paper. The twenty-seven sermons in this volume "Victory over Victory" deal primarily with the personal religious life—the soul's contact with God, the eternal life in the midst of time. Dr. Hutton is a great reader of souls and hence his power. Here too are answered many perplexing problems of the inquiring soul. They possess, as do all of Dr. Hutton's utterances, the coloring of his own very deep and rich religious experience.

When we turn to Dr. Orchard's volume we are in another sphere. "The Finality of Christ" deals with the big social, economic, religious, international problems of the day, as well as with those of the personal religious life. Christ is final for all our systems as well as for all our souls. To quote Dr. Hutton of whom we have just been writing, Dr. Orchard might have taken a famous utterance of his for his motto: "Christ or chaos." Dr. Orchard tells us very plainly in these sermons that either Christianity covers all of life or it will not long cover any of it, that it is final or it is not anything. Under such topics as, "The Economics of the Incarnation," "The Discovery of God in Thought," "Evolution and The Fall," "The Inconstancy of Human Goodness," and "The Finality of Christ"—to quote only a few—Dr. Orchard with penetrating insight and a spiritual fervor that breaks forth from the printed page, insists that we must get back to Christ in personal life, in the markets, in the nation. There is also interesting discussion in two of the sermons on the revival of Catholicism (not Roman) in the Protestant Church which is very interesting. The point Dr. Orchard makes here, as elsewhere when discussing this subject, is that the corporate idea of Catholicism is displacing the extreme individualistic emphasis of Protestantism.

The Revell Company deserves our thanks for giving Americans an opportunity to read the sermons of one who is recognized as one of the outstanding preachers in the British Church. People have long ceased to speak of Mr. Berry as the successor of Jowett and Dale. He has made his own place in Birmingham as did these men. And his fame has passed to the ends of the country. When Dr. Jowett resigned the pulpit of Westminster Chapel, London, it was Dr. Berry to whom they turned. He is in great demand as speaker on public occasions. He has recently joined the staff of THE CHRISTIAN WORK and is thus also in touch with America. This volume of sermons, "Revealing Light," is the proclamation of "Light" as the outstanding quality of the Gospel. Jesus Christ has thrown light upon all our problems, both personal and social. He has thrown light upon our relationship to God and to our fellow-men. We get this light from Christ not only in His teachings, but in His life, His character, His example. Light comes to us also through our own religious experience when we live in Christ's light. Revelation is a fundamental fact of experience, because of the very nature of God. A fatherly God is a revealing God. These twenty sermons are a valuable addition to our homiletic literature. We are printing one of them in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN WORK.

Dr. J. D. Jones has been for many years a conspicuous figure in the British pulpit. He is pastor of the large Congregational church at Bournemouth, but has held so many conspicuous offices in the Free Church Councils and the Congregational Union that he is sort of an untitled Bishop of the Free Churches, at least of Congregationalism. At present he is giving his time to touring England in behalf of the big fund the Congregational churches are raising. This volume is very representative of his preaching, containing as it does many pastoral sermons as well as sermons delivered on special occa-

*Victory over Victory, by John A. Hutton, D. D. The George H. Doran Co., New York. Price $1.75.

The Finality of Christ, by the Rev. W. E. Orchard, D. D. The George H. Doran Co., New York. Price $1.35.

Revealing Light, by the Rev. Sidney M. Berry, D. D. The Fleming H. Revell Co., New York. Price $1.50.

The Gospel of Sovereignty and Other Sermons, by Rev. J. D. Jones, D. D. The George H. Doran Co., New York. Price $1.75.

Oracles of God: Studies in the Minor Prophets, by the Rev. W. E. Orchard, D. D. The Pilgrim Press, Boston.

sions. One does not wonder why the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York was so anxious to get him after one has read these sermons. They are full of sympathy and tenderness—words of counsel of one who is very sure of God and His goodness.

We close this article on the five British preachers with a notice of another volume of Dr. Orchard's which has just come from the Pilgrim Press. It is a series of six studies in the Union Prophets which are excellent examples of real expository preaching. They deal first of all with the message of these prophets for their own time, but are concerned chiefly with showing what their message is for our time. He shows how living and applicable their word is for us today, especially in the application of religion to the social problem.

FOR THE LENTEN SEASON

Devotional Literature for Spiritual Nurture

For All the People:

"The Fellowship of Prayer for 1923." 3c. each; $2.00 per 100 postpaid. Selected Bible Readings, Meditation and Prayer for each day of the Lenten Season.

For Pastors Only:

"Suggestions for Lenten Sermons." By Pres. Ozora S. Davis, D. D. (Free on Request.)

The Commission on Evangelism and Devotional Life
Room 518, 287 Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y.

TREMENDOUS VALUE FOR 15c

The Pathfinder, Leading Weekly Magazine of Nation's Capital, Makes Remarkably Attractive Offer.

Washington, D. C., Jan. (Specials)—People everywhere are hurrying to take advantage of the Pathfinder's wonderful offer to send that splendid illustrated review of the whole world thirteen weeks for 15 cents. It costs the editor a lot of money to do this, but he says it pays to invest in new friends, and in spite of the high cost of his enlarged and greatly improved paper he makes this rare offer to bring his circulation up to 600,000 a week. You will like this paper; it is 30 years old and now better than ever; splendid stories and rare miscellany. Question Box answers all your questions. Only 15 cents in stamps or coin mailed at once to Pathfinder, 49 Langdon Sta., Washington, D. C., will keep your whole family informed, entertained, helped and inspired.

If you don't say, "I saw your advertisement in the CHRISTIAN WORK," how will our advertisers know that their advertisement is bringing returns? You want credit for everything you do. So do we. Make it a habit to say, "I saw your ad. in the CHRISTIAN WORK."

Annual Meeting of the World Alliance

One of the outstanding religious events of the year will be the annual meeting of the American Branch of the World Alliance in Philadelphia, November 13-15, 1923. Among the speakers from abroad who have provisionally accepted are Sir George Adam Smith, Rev. Thomas Nightingale, Dr. J. H. Jowett, Prof. Dr. Yanitch, the Bishop of St. Albans, Rev. J. Brierly Kay and the Archbishop of Uppsala.

THE AMERICAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY

76 Wall Street, New York
(Incorporated April, 1833)

The only American undenominational, international and national Society aiding seamen. Maintains a Sailors' Home and Institute at 507 West Street, New York City. Places loan libraries ($25) on vessels sailing from New York. Publishes the Sailors' Magazine, $1.00. Supported by contributions and legacies. JOHN B. CALVERT, D.D., President. GEORGE SIDNEY WEBSTER, D.D., Sec'y. Send contributions to CLARENCE C. PINNEO, Treasurer, 76 Wall Street, New York.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY

Its work is interdenominational evangelical and international in scope and is commended by all the churches. It has published the Gospel message in 178 languages dialects and characters. Its colporters meet the immigrants with Christian literature in many languages, and also visit the spiritually destitute. In the Spanish and Portuguese languages, chiefly for Latin America, there have been issued 16,012,088 copies of volumes, tracts and periodicals. Its literature in the native dialects has been the strong right arm of foreign missions. Its benevolent work is dependent upon donations and legacies.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS HALL, President.
REV. EDWIN NOAH HARDY, Ph.D., Gen. Sec.

Donations may be sent direct to American Tract Society, 101 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Individual Cups

Every church should use. Clean and sanitary. Trial free. Thomas Communion Service Co. Box 432 Lima, Ohio

ROCHE'S HERBAL EMBROCATION FOR CROUP OR WHOOING COUGH

Relieves promptly and safely the Terror and Distress of these dreaded afflictions of Childhood.

120 years of successful use Applied externally only. Wonderfully effective in Bronchitis, Lung-bag and Rheumatism. All druggists or

W. EDWARDS & SON E. FOUGERA & CO.
London, England 90-92 Beekman St. N. Y.

Start an Adult Bible Class with SELL'S Bible Study Text-Books

A QUARTER OF A MILLION SOLD!

Just Out! No. 10-Bible Studies in the Four Gospels
No. 9-Bible Studies in Vital Questions
1. Supplementary Bible Studies 5.B.S. in Life of Christ
2. Bible Studies by Books 6.B.S. in Life of St. Paul
3.B.S. by Periods 7.B.S. in Christian Life
4.B.S. by Doctrines 8.B.S. in Early Life
Send for circular showing how to use them.
Each, cloth, 75c.; paper, 50c.
F. H. REVELL CO., 158 5th Ave., N.Y.;
17 N. Wabash Ave., Chicago

VICTOR Portable STEREOPTICON

THE PERFECT LANTERN SLIDE PROJECTOR

SHIPPED ON APPROVAL
THOUSANDS OF SLIDES FOR RENT OR FOR SALE

VICTOR ANIMATOGRAPH COINC ASK FOR CATALOGUE AND TERMS

276 VICTOR BLDG. DAVENPORT IA.

MENEELY BELL CO.

TROY, N.Y. AND
220 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY

BELLS

McSHANE BELL FOUNDRY CO. BALTIMORE MARYLAND

Church, Chime and Peal BELLS
Memorials a Specialty.

The Woodlawn Cemetery

Is readily accessible by Harlem trains from Grand Central Station and by subway. Small lots at reasonable prices. Write or telephone (4855 Gramercy Park) for Book of Views or representative. Office 20 E. 23d St., New York City.

Says Bishop

Francis J. McConnell

of the Methodist Church

"I regard The Christian Century as the greatest journalistic force working for social and international righteousness coming from any press of the Christian Church."

EDITORIAL STAFF

Charles Clayton Morrison
Herbert L. Willett Orvis F. Jordan
Joseph Fort Newton John R. Ewers
Lynn Harold Hough Edward Shillito
Alva W. Taylor Thomas C. Clark

The Christian Century is distinguished by its candid discussion of living issues in the light of the mind of Christ

Mail Coupon to-day. Foreign postage extra

CHRISTIAN CENTURY

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Dear Sirs: Please enter my name (a new subscriber) for a year's subscription to The Christian Century at your regular rate of $4.00 (ministers $3.00). I will remit upon receipt of bill and you will please send me without extra charge a copy of ☐ "The Reconstruction of Religion," by Ellwood, or ☐ "The Crisis of the Churches," by Leighton Parks, or ☐ "The Mind in the Making," by Robinson, or ☐ "What Christianity Means to Me," by Lyman Abbott.

Name .....

Address .....

C. W.

IRRESISTIBLE

JOIN OUR DELIGHTFUL "CHRISTIAN WORK" PARTY

On the Great White Star Line "S. S. Baltic" Summer Cruise to the Holy Land, Egypt, Turkey, Greece, Spain, Italy, Etc.

61 Days      $600 and Up

Starting June 27, 1923

A Surpassing Summer Vacation Opportunity

For Ministers, College Professors, Teachers and Business Men

IDEAL SUMMER WEATHER ON SHIP BOARD

With the Average Temperature on Shore lower than Boston, New York or St. Louis, Nights Cool. Practically no Humidity

Clark's 20th Cruise
to the Orient

STOP-OVERS IN EUROPE

Return tickets first class
good on Adriatic, Baltic,
Cedric, Celtic, etc.

Until
January 1, 1924

S. S. BALTIC

Luxurious White Star
Transatlantic Liner

S. S. BALTIC

23,876 tons register.
Three great promenade
decks — Sumptuous
Public Rooms, 24 Suites
with Private Bath.

The Climax of Luxurious
Travel

A FASCINATING ITINERARY

Madeira, Cadiz, Seville (Cordova, Granada and the Alhambra), Gibraltar, Algiers, Athens (Corinth, Eleusis), Haifa, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Bethany (Nazareth, Sea of Galilee, Samaria, etc.), Alexandria, Cairo, Naples, Pompeii, Aome (Capri, Sorrento, Amalfi), Monte Carlo, Cherbourg (Paris and the Battlefields, London, etc.), Liverpool to New York.

D. E. LORENZ, Ph.D., Author of "The Mediterranean Traveler" and Managing Director of Clark's Orient Cruise of 1922, and "Round the World" Cruise of 1923, is organizing a party of CHRISTIAN WORK readers. Why not take advantage of this remarkable opportunity and spend your vacation months visiting the most fascinating countries in the world? No travel worries—just rest and enjoyment. Rates include regular shore trips, landings, drives, guides, hotels, railroads, fees, etc.—everything first class.

We Invite Our Readers to Join Our Party

ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET (70 pages) AND SHIP DIAGRAM SENT FREE POSTPAID.

NOTE.—A few vacant rooms are available on our Mediterranean Cruise, Feb. 3, 1923, and on our Round the World Cruise, Jan. 22, 1923.

Address: Cruise Department, CHRISTIAN WORK

70 Fifth Ave., New York City

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

A Religious Weekly Review

JANUARY 27, 1923

---

Big Thoughts Make Big Men

Frederick Lynch, D. D.

Protestantism and the World's Necessities

S. Parkes Cadman, D. D.

The Neglect of the Bible

The British Weekly

The League of Nations

Justice John H. Clarke

"Ours an Enterprise of Hope"

Robert E. Speer, D. D.

A More Unified Approach to Christian Education

Robert L. Kelly, D. D.

---

Three Dollars a Year

Ten Cents a Copy

The Churches and the Arbuckle Case

A Statement from the Federal Council of Churches

There has been so much concern in the Churches throughout the country over the probability of the return of Roscoe Arbuckle to the motion picture screen, as the result of the announcement made by Mr. Will Hays just before Christmas, that the meeting of Mr. Hay's so-called "Committee of Public Relations" held on the afternoon of January 4th is of wide-spread interest. The Churches especially will be gratified to know that this Committee, with almost complete unanimity, recommended to Mr. Hays that he advise the motion picture producers neither to release the ban on the Arbuckle films nor to present Mr. Arbuckle to the public in future films.

The Committee on Public Relations includes representatives of the Federal Council of the Churches, the National Board of the Y. W. C. A., the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A., the National Catholic Welfare Council, and many educational, social and philanthropic organizations. They are members of Mr. Hay's committee not as official spokesmen for their organizations but simply as personal advisers to Mr. Hays, with a view to interpreting to him what they believe

(Continued on page 126)

ADVERTISING must pay the advertiser or else he cannot pay for space. Many readers of The Christian Work now answer advertisements seen in our paper and do not mention that fact. As a loyal subscriber to The Christian Work we are counting on you to help us by saying, "I saw your advertisement in The Christian Work," every time you answer one of our advertisements.

THE AMERICAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY

76 Wall Street, New York
(Incorporated April, 1833)

The only American undenominational, international and national Society aiding seamen. Maintains a Sailors' Home and Institute at 507 West Street, New York City. Places loan libraries ($25) on vessels sailing from New York. Publishes the Sailors' Magazine, $1.00. Supported by contributions and legacies.
JOHN B. CALVERT, D.D., President.
GEORGE SIDNEY WEBSTER, D.D., Sec'y.
Send contributions to CLARENCE C. PINNEO, Treasurer, 76 Wall Street, New York.

Do You Believe in The Christian Work?

In what it is trying to accomplish?
If you do then you will want to help.
One good way is to patronize our advertisers, and always say, "I saw your advertisement in The Christian Work."

MANY USES FOR CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING

1. To locate some old book you would like to get.
2. To secure employment in church work or with a Christian concern.
3. To advertise your services as a sexton.

Classified Ads Cost but 3c a Word—
Minimum Order $1.00

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY

Its work is interdenominational evangelical and international in scope and is commended by all the churches. It has published the Gospel message in 178 languages dialects and characters. Its colporters meet the immigrants with Christian literature in many languages, and also visit the spiritually destitute. In the Spanish and Portuguese languages, chiefly for Latin America, there have been issued 16,012,088 copies of volumes, tracts and periodicals. Its literature in the native dialects has been the strong right arm of foreign missions. Its benevolent work is dependent upon donations and legacies.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS HALL, President.
REV. EDWIN NOAH HARDY, Ph.D., Gen. Sec.
Donations may be sent direct to American Tract Society, 101 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

CHALFONTE-HADDON HALL ATLANTIC CITY

Combined in Ownership and Management

The beautiful new Boardwalk Wing of Haddon Hall is now open. It connects the original Haddon Hall with the artistic pavilions, restful ocean decks, court garden and sea rooms of the 1920 addition.

On the Beach and the Boardwalk

American Plan. At your service every day of the year.

Attractive Souvenir Folder on Request

On many occasions in the past Chalfonte-Haddon Hall was unable to accommodate all of its many friends

- The new Boardwalk Wing now makes possible the hospitable welcome of more than 1200 guests. While "old-fashioned" in its personal attention and service, Chalfonte-Haddon Hall has for more than fifty years kept abreast of the times in its modern facilities for pleasure, comfort and rest.

LEEDS and LIPPINCOTT
COMPANY

When answering advertisements please mention the Christian Work

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

CONTINUING

THE EVANGELIST AND NEW YORK OBSERVER

Vol. 114.—No. 4

January 27, 1923

Whole No. 3007

CONTENTS

WORLD OF TODAY.....	99
EDITORIALS:
Big Thoughts Make Big Men: Rev. Frederick Lynch, D.D. ....	103
Protestantism and the World's Necessities: Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D.D. ....	104
The Neglect of the Bible: The British Weekly.....	106
OBSERVER'S LETTER:
What Does It Mean?.....	107
THE WEEKLY SERMON:
Gustavus Adolphus: J. D. Prince, Ph.D.....	110
GENERAL:
The League of Nations: Justice John H. Clarke.....	111
"Ours an Enterprise of Hope": Rev. Robert E. Speer, D. D. ....	116
A More Unified Approach to Christian Education: Rev. Robert L. Kelly, D.D. ....	119
An Open Letter from the Hartford Council of Churches .....	122
ONE BOOK A WEEK.
Week Day Religious Education.....	123
INTERNATIONAL LESSON:
The Rich Man and Lazarus: Rev. Stephen A. Norton..	124

THE CHRISTIAN WORK; Published weekly; 10 cents a copy, $3.00 a year in the United States, $3.52 in Canada, and $4.04 in all other countries (postage included.)

Publication and circulation office, 75 Baker Street, Providence, R. I. Editorial and advertising office, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Subscriptions may be forwarded to either of the above offices.

Entered as second class matter November 18, 1922, at the U. S. post-office, Providence, R. I. under the act of March 3, 1879.

Printed in U. S. A.—Published by The Christian World, Inc., Frederick Lynch, President; Henry Strong Huntington, Vice-President; Benson Y. Landis, Secretary-Treasurer.

Printed by Norman C. Lynch Co., Incorporated, 75 Baker Street, Providence, R. I.; 70 Fifth Ave., New York.

The World of To-day

THE UNITED STATES AND THE RUHR

According to Pierrepont B. Noyes, President of the Oneida Company and for a while American Commissioner to the Rhineland, ever since the Armistice France has intended to enter the Rhineland and the Ruhr. He believes that the French still cherish the project which some of them tried to nurse three or four years ago for a separate Rhineland Republic, a buffer state between Germany and France. France after the armistice, as he sees it, was fifty per cent fear and fifty per cent ambition. Now, he says, she is one hundred per cent ambition. Whether Mr. Noyes is fair to France or not, certainly most of the best informed business opinion in Great Britain and America is that France is unwise in her action if she is looking for reparations. The great American bankers, Paul Warburg and Otto Kahn, expressed themselves to that effect at the Foreign Policies Association luncheon the other day in New York. At almost the same time, Sir Robert Horne, Chancellor of the Exchequer under Lloyd George, remarked to another group in the same hotel, "If you take a $200 watch and smash it and then try to sell the pieces you may get a dollar for them. You won't find yourself able to get any $200." It is estimated that a billion dollars worth of capital has left Germany since the armistice. As to the possibility of getting this back into that country, Sir Robert shrewdly remarked, "The only way to get capital back into Germany is to make capitalists believe Germany is a country fit for capital." So long as international trade is allowed, there is no way of helping German capital at home. To return to Mr. Noyes, the former Rhineland Commissioner proposes that our government appoint a committee of our ablest men to confer with a similar British committee as to possible joint action in the present emergency. The mere appointment of such a committee, as Mr. Noyes sees it, would be notice that the United States had temporarily abandoned its isolation; it would warn France to go no farther until the two countries had a chance to make new proposals; and it would give pause to French statesmen at the prospect of an entente between the English-speaking nations—an entente which some Frenchmen dread. While we talk, however, the outcome of the Ruhr adventure grows more and more problematical.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

INDUSTRIAL CONDITIONS IN CHINA

One of the foremost authorities on missionary work in the Orient and a careful observer writes the following from Chefoo, China. "In Chefoo, as in other cities of China, we found a serious industrial problem. In the hair net factories seventeen thousand women and a thousand men are daily working ten hours for six cents a day. Twenty-six thousand boys and young men are here employed in forty factories making pongee silk. They work thirteen hours a day and receive an average daily wage of six cents. Skilled artisans are paid from twenty to thirty cents, but in many factories the average wage for common labor is only five cents a day. Despite these facts I found industrial conditions better in Chefoo than in any city I have yet visited in China. Owing to the early missionary work there are a number of Christian employers in Chefoo, who close their factories on Sunday, though most of the other industries are running seven days a week. There is a great deal of unrest and dissatisfaction amongst the workers but to date there has been no systematic attempt to organize. There have been three recent attempts to raise wages by strikes, but these were severely crushed by the police and a number of the leaders were imprisoned." In Tientsin he found fifteen thousand boys in the weaving factories working eighteen hours a day from 5 a. m. to 11 p. m., the majority receiving no pay whatever, but only their food. In the rug factories the boys work sixteen hours a day from 5:30 a. m. to 10 p. m., seven days a week. During the three years of apprenticeship they receive only their food and lodging. Many skilled workers are paid only four dollars a month. A large number of the boys are suffering from eye trouble and other diseases due to their working conditions and utter lack of care. In the best match factory are boys from nine to twelve working fifteen hours a day seven days a week. Their pay runs from six to ten cents a day. Eighty of these little workers must go to the hospital each day to be treated. The fumes from the cheap phosphorus and sulphur often affect their eyes and their lungs. Much of this could be avoided by using better chemicals, but the profits of the owners would not be so large. Not hundreds, but thousands of children, down to the age of eight or nine years, are employed in the fifty cotton mills around Shanghai. A recent report states that small boys ten, eleven and twelve years of age, were working stripped to the waist. Little girls, even smaller than the boys, eight or nine or ten perhaps, stand between double rows of whizzing, unguarded machinery, steadily but wearily feeding the machines. In one small hospital there were one day this winter three children under ten years old. The arm of one had been caught in an unfenced machine and was all but torn off. The leg of another was mashed from hip to ankle by the teeth of a machine. The third, a little girl, had been caught by the hair in her machine and her scalp torn off. Not one of these accidents would have happened had the machines been fitted with safety devices. The Chinese Chamber of Commerce, however, recently passed the following resolutions: "With a view to the promotion of higher standards in industry and the welfare of the laborers, our Chamber of Commerce proposes the following three regulations: No employment of children under twelve full years of age; one day's rest in seven; the safeguarding of the health of workers, e. g., limiting working hours, improvement of sanitary conditions, installation of safety devices for machinery. Now that these resolutions are passed, all firms and factories should do their utmost to carry them out as soon as possible."

RACE RELATIONS SUNDAY

The Commission on the Church and Race Relations of the Federal Council of Church has issued a call to churches and other religious organizations throughout the nation to observe February 11, 1923 as Race Relations Sunday. This is the day preceding the birthdays of Abraham Lincoln and Frederick Douglass. A score of the leaders of the different church denominations, women's organizations, Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. have endorsed the idea and promised official co-operation. Three lines of observation of the day are suggested: an exchange of visitors between churches of the two races; special exercises by the Sunday Schools, young people's societies, and other auxiliaries; special meetings, sermons and addresses.

KENTUCKY INTERRACIAL CONFERENCE

The recent Third Annual Conference of the State Interracial Commission of Kentucky adopted the following "findings." "That courses of study of racial problems should not only be introduced in colleges, but extended to include courses on Race Relations in high and normal schools as well; * * * that the press be urged to exercise care to publish impartially violations of law on the part of either race, and also that it set before the public an impartial account of the meritorious achievements of both races; * * * that the committee is in thorough accord with the view that goodwill, founded upon intellectual, moral and spiritual knowledge, will produce a compelling power which, linked with the proper commanding physical forces, will combat the destructive work of prejudice and build constructive and well founded community life." This is good.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

A CRITICISM OF THE INTERCHURCH STEEL STRIKE REPORT

Marshall Olds, a publicity and advertising agent for corporations, has just brought out a four hundred and seventy-five page attack on the fundamental reliability of the Interchurch Steel Strike report. His criticism is, in effect, that the investigators who gathered most of the material for the report and the men who put it into shape were "radicals" of Bolshevik leanings. In order to make the report a subtle means for the spreading of this propaganda, they misrepresented such matters as statistics of wages and hours of work, used many statements collected by James R. Maurer, President of the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor, which were gathered for purposes of "radical" propaganda and which, at least in some cases, were decidedly modified by cross-examination. Mr. Olds' attitude toward economic conditions is not one calculated to appeal to the average modern Christian. He argues at length in behalf of long hours, on the ground that only by accepting them can the newer immigrant get ahead economically. He quite ignores the fact that the immigrants who have got ahead by choosing to work long hours have been almost always working independently. But however much one may disagree with Mr. Olds' social and economic points of view or be vexed by his repitiousness or be amused by his "evidence" to prove men dangerous "radicals," he may care to examine Mr. Olds' charges that the Interchurch Steel Strike report misrepresents the facts and is based on affidavits and statements which did not stand up under investigation. The Interchurch Report states, "The charges brought against the state constabulary, deputy sheriffs and company police deal with the murder of men and women—one as he was in his own yard—and the wounding of hundreds of others; the clubbing of hundreds," etc. As part of the support of this statement the Interchurch Report cited the evidence given by Father Kazinci to the effect that the constabulary clubbed the crowd in front of his church and rode down children. Mr. Olds, quoting from Father Kazinci's examination before the Senate Committee shows that Kazinci did not himself see any constabulary ride down any children nor club any person. The evidence adduced only showed that one woman was knocked out, and she by a horse, not by a trooper. Huber Blakenhorn, who wrote the report, as secretary of the commission, explains that Father Kazinci and the labor interests had direct witnesses of the affair, but the Senate stopped the hearings before there was an opportunity to call such witnesses. Altogether while Mr. Olds' book does suggest the value of honest consideration of the sources of information of the Interchurch Report, it does not shake its large conclusions. The condemnation of the twelve hour day remains just as forcible; so does its condemnation of the "under-cover" men employed by the detective agencies, so does its condemnation of the denial of free speech and free assemblage in the steel districts. As for Mr. Olds' implication that the members of the Interchurch Commission investigating the strike did not participate in the investigation and in the writing of the report, Bishop McConnell, chairman of the Commission, bluntly says, "This is not true * * * * Every member of the active Commission contributed to the evidence in the report as each member spent more or less time in the steel towns actively prosecuting the investigation mainly through hearings and partly through interviews with strikers and steel company officials." Bishop McConnell well concludes, "The twelve-hour day is still the rule of the continuous production departments of the steel industry and undemocratic and un-American conditions of control still characterize many of the largest steel plants. These conditions cannot be remedied by belated attempts to discredit those who made public such conditions, and urged on the churches and on the general public their obvious duty when faced with the truth of such defects in our American life." On the whole, Mr. Olds' attack should only help to call attention once more to the need of making conditions in the steel industry conform more completely to the best industrial ideals of today.

FOLLOWING UP THE IMMIGRANT

Most Americans would say, as a matter of course, that immigration was adding to the Roman Catholic population of this country far faster than to the Protestant. But the new immigration law is producing a very different result. According to Raymond E. Cole, one of the religious workers in behalf of arriving immigrants, an analysis of European immigration to the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, shows:

	Immigration	Emigration	Population	Gain or loss
				U. S.
(a) From dominant Protestant countries .....	106,000	27,200	78,800	+
(b) From dominant Roman Catholic countries .....	90,000	114,200	24,888	—
(c) Hebrews .....	53,000	830	52,170	+

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

That is to say, people from the Protestant countries of Europe are staying here; people from the Roman Catholic countries last year, at least, were going back home. But, basing our statements on Mr. Cole's report, Protestant immigrants have been practically neglected when it comes to following them up and relating them to the Protestant agencies of their community. The Protestant Episcopal Church, to be sure, has followed up Anglican immigrants for several years and the Young Women's Christian Association has a system of visitation for unmarried immigrant girls through its International Institutes, which is having good results. But it would be expensive, cause a great deal of duplication and lead to many misunderstandings, if each Protestant denomination tried to have a follow-up system of its own. Obviously we need a national clearing house of reference for all Protestant immigrants,—better still a clearing house for immigrants of all religious complexions. The Jewish and Roman Catholic Societies have already developed efficient follow-up systems. The National Catholic Welfare Council a year ago last October reported, "The Council through its Bureau of Immigration has inaugurated a program of Immigrant Aid that includes care under Catholic auspices for immigrants of the Catholic faith from the time they leave their home in foreign countries until they reach their destination in America." The Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society records the names and addresses of all arriving Jewish immigrants, and the Council of Jewish Women has organized over two hundred communities with a local council for follow-up work with both paid and volunteer visitors. Last September, under the leadership of the Episcopalians, a general system for the follow-up of Protestant immigrants began at Ellis Island. In fifteen American cities the names of coming immigrants go to the local church federation. Already the new system has begun to bear fruit. The leaders in the work plan to relate the follow-up work in America with Protestant churches in Europe. The subject will come up at the next Convention of the "World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship Through the Churches," which has councils in twenty-five countries. No doubt the time is coming when the names of Protestant immigrants will be sent to America in advance, with denominational affiliation. Thus the new arrivals can be better served at the ports of entry and can be referred immediately to the proper churches for visitation. The system should help very greatly in bridging the religious gulf between the old home and the new.

THE BULGARIAN CHURCH AND THE Y. M. C. A.

At the last observation of the Week of Prayer for Students, Metropolitan Stephan, head of the Bulgarian National Church, addressed a body of students, assembled in the Cathedral of St. Nedelia, to the following effect:

In all the countries of Europe, and everywhere in the world, there is a crisis in material and spiritual affairs, and this is most acute in Bulgaria, where there has been a marked and rapid decline in morality. Lack of faith and subsequent demoralization are corroding the social organism and threatening its ruin.

But, thanks be to God, new stars are on our horizon, and their first rays are reaching us. These rays are you who regularly attend church; they are those sons of Bulgaria, members of our families and students of our universities who, not satisfied with earthly knowledge, seek the way leading to God, the way of spiritual achievement, the way of Jesus Christ; these rays are the members of the Young Men's Christian Association, who this year have begun to develop their activities in this country, and who for the past week, in common with millions of comrades and young men the world over, are uniting in their prayers to God, in thanks for His mercies in the past, and in asking for His help in the future.

These Associations are powerful and numerous in Protestant and Catholic countries, and now we proclaim to Thee, O God, they are beginning to be established in countries of Orthodox Churches. Through these Associations, youth are educated in moral and spiritual truth. This evangelistic movement is a leaven even in the far regions of Asia.

When I was in Copenhagen, I saw nowhere misery, nowhere gloom. Denmark is only one half the size of our country, but it is much more prosperous. The building of the Young Men's Christian Association in Copenhagen is one of the most beautiful in Europe, and is second to none in the world, except perhaps to those in America. This building is a source of spiritual culture. There is nothing like that in our country. In Geneva, a city smaller than Sofia, besides the churches there are from ten to fifteen halls for spiritual meetings. There is nothing like that in Sofia. Our young men and boys are not seen in our churches. I entreat you, parents, to bring youth to these Associations, where they will learn to lead holy and righteous lives, and be led to become true sons of our National Church. Let the country be alive with spiritual action! Let there be in our capital, halls where the holy word of God shall be preached, as well as in our churches!

The Metropolitan closed with the following prayer: "My God, we humbly confess before Thee our needs, and we pray Thee to look upon our people. Bless these young men, who kneel before Thee, and who ask for Thy support! Grant that in our country there may be more such young men! Grant that their souls may be devoted to Thee! May they be numbered by thousands and tens of thousands for the good of our people and for the strength of Thy Church." Truly the Greek Orthodox Churches are going through a genuine revolution.

EDITORIAL

EDITORIAL STAFF

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

Frederick Lynch

ASSOCIATE EDITOR

Henry Strong Huntington

MANAGING EDITOR

Benson Y. Landis

LITERARY EDITOR

Tertius Van Dyke

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Edmund de Schweinitz Brunner

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT

Violette Reynolds

CONTRIBUTING STAFF

Henry A. Atkinson
Peter Ainslie
Hugh Black
S. Parkes Cadman

Sidney L. Gulick
Rufus M. Jones
E. Guy Talbott
T. Rhondda Williams

EDITORIAL COUNCIL

Nehemiah Boynton
Williams Adams Brown
Howard Duffield
Sherwood Eddy
Irving Fisher
J. W. Johnson

George Foster Peabody
George A. Plimpton
Howard C. Robbins
Fred B. Smith
Cornelius Woelfkin
Shailer Mathews

Charles S. Macfarland

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS

Austria: Professor Carl Beth
Canada: Dr. J. Lovell Murray
Czechoslovakia: Professor Francis Zilka
France: Rev. Professor Wilfred Monod
Germany: Direktor A. Hinderer
Great Britain: Rev. Sidney M. Berry
Hungary: Dr. S. Szabo
Switzerland: Pastor Adolf Keller

its pastor out into the great spaces of the Kingdom or whether it has heard simply what might be called a parochial interpretation of the gospel. He can almost tell at a glance by the character of the people before him whether they have had a world vision of the gospel held up before them or simply an application of it to their own personal needs.

Let us be more specific. The people who have had constantly kept before them the wonderful work the Church has been doing in its foreign missionary activities, how it has been revolutionizing the whole thought and ideals of China, India and Japan, are invariably a higher, broader type of people than those found in a church whose vision never gets beyond its own walls or its own town at the utmost. The writer can tell them almost at a glance. They are bigger men—bigger intellectually, culturally and spiritually. Big thoughts make big men. Broad vision makes broad-minded men. Knowledge makes powerful characters. We are so sure of what we are saying here that we dare to presume to advise all pastors reading these words to bring before their people at least once a month the wonderful things the Church is doing in its foreign and home missionary work. We do not mean that one should advertise that a missionary sermon would be preached, but we mean that the way to broaden your people, strengthen their character, make them big, strong men is to keep continually before them the big things the gospel is doing, is to keep them interested in its world-wide sweep.

Again, one can almost tell at a glance whether the people before him have had the application of the gospel to the great social, international, universal problems of the time put before them, or whether they have heard only its application to their own personal, individual needs. There is a difference almost immediately perceptible in the two congregations, in the bigness of the people. It is the difference between the parochial, provincial mind and the cosmopolitan, inclusive mind. We have had pastors complain to us that they did not enjoy preaching to their particular congregation because it was so cosmopolitan and provincial. Well, is not a congregation largely what the preacher makes it? You cannot have big men in your congregation if in your sermons you lead them only in narrow, high-walled ways. Try taking them out into the broad places of the gospel. Show them what the gospel is doing in the solving of the great social and industrial problems. Get them interested in the Christian aspect of internationalism; show them that only as the nations practice the teachings of Jesus in their ideals and relationships is there any hope of brotherhood or peace. Remind your people continually that Christianity means that the kingdoms of this world are to become the kingdoms of Our Lord and of

Big Thoughts Make Big Men

THE writer of this editorial has had the rare opportunity of preaching almost every Sunday during the last ten years in the churches of every Protestant denomination in the United States and England. Every Sunday has found him in a different church before a different congregation in a different part of the country. Generally these churches have been the largest with the largest congregations. Naturally he has formed a habit of "sizing up" both minister and congregation as he has worshipped with them for an hour and preached to them. He has come to several conclusions, all of which he thinks would be interesting to his readers and which he may share with them at some early date, but one conclusion has been driven home upon him with irresistible force, namely, that "Big thoughts, big interests, make big people." There is all the difference in the world between the congregations which he addressed, and he has become so sensitive to congregations that he can tell almost at a glance, at least after ten minutes of preaching, whether the congregation has been led by

EDITORIAL

His church. Thus you will soon transform your congregation, raise up big men.

It is equally true with thoughts as well as interests. The minister who from week to week deals with trivial sermon topics will always have a trivial congregation. Small, narrow thoughts make small, narrow men. When we read some of the sermon topics advertised in the Saturday evening papers we do not wonder at the character of some of the congregations. We have met them. We knew without being told by papers or by voice the kind of sermons they were hearing from week to week. We really believe that the great difference we see in congregations is not due to education, cultural advantages, social standing, outstanding business position or the lack of these, so much as to the type of preaching the average congregation is hearing from week to week. We have just been reading Dean Brown's Yale Lectures on Preaching. In the course of the lectures, where he is talking about expository preaching, he incidentally tells the courses of sermons through which he carried his big congregation at Oakland, California. He says: "In the last church I served, the First Congregational Church of Oakland, California, where I was pastor for nearly fifteen years, I find from examination of my record book that during those years, I preached courses of expository sermons to that one congregation as follows: From the Old Testament, six months on Genesis, three months on Exodus, three months on Joshua, three months on Judges, two months on the life of Elijah, as recorded in Kings, two months on Job, six months on Isaiah, two months on the minor prophets. . . . In the New Testament, I preached for six months on Mathew, six months on Mark, twelve months on Luke, . . . six months on John, six months on Acts, two months on Romans, three months on first and second Corinthians, and two months on the Book of Revelation." We preached before this fine Oakland congregation once, but had we never heard of it, we would have known its character at sight—better still we would have known its character before seeing it had we heard this bit of information from Dean Brown's diary. For fifteen years Dr. Brown had been preaching on the immensities of the faith. He had carried his men week by week up to high mountain tops. Every Sunday found him and his people considering deep, broad, universal thoughts—for there are no other in the Bible. Compare the congregation thus living for three years with Dean Brown with one living for fifteen years on the themes advertised in the average Saturday night paper. Big thoughts make big men.

In conclusion might we say a few words about preachers. We meet them every week—often in their homes—and what a fine set of men they are. But we can tell almost with the first word whether they are living with big thoughts or whether they are allowing themselves to dwell simply in the little world of parochial tastes. We are glad to find so many who are reading the big books and who are coming out of big worlds to minister to their people. (So many ministers come out of the same small world of daily tastes and occupations in which the congregations live.) The Church needs as never before prophetic men in the pulpit. The faith is being assailed on every side—not as in the days when Ingersoll and Blatchford denied God—but the Christian conception of man and life is what is everywhere being assailed. It is in every play, every novel, many a book and essay. It is denied in the talk of the various clubs and societies which meet week by week. It is being assailed by the lives of reckless pleasure so many are living. The presentation of the great, fundamental Christian ideals of life is needed as never before, and it cannot be done by little men. We wonder if our clerical readers have happened to note that such men as Mr. Wells, Mr. Shaw and Mr. Bennett, to mention only a few who have the ear of the people, seem to have read every book that was ever written and are perfectly at home in all the great literatures of the world? The defenders of the faith, the men who are meeting their attacks upon the Christian ideal are equally at home with the great thoughts of the world. We would urge upon every young minister "who reads these words that he shut himself up in his study at least five mornings of the week—uninterrupted mornings—not necessarily in the direct preparation of his sermon, but in real study of the Bible, the great philosophers and poets, and in the reading of the really big books that are occasionally being published. (And as to these latter, stick to the big books. Six months put on Josiah Royce's "Problem of Christianity," on Dr. Headlam's "The Doctrine of the Church and Reunion," is worth a hundred commonplace, easy books.) Our whole point is that the constant associations with big thoughts makes big preachers just as the living in large interests makes big laymen.

F. L.

Protestantism and the World's Necessities

[We are printing beginning with to-day a series of five editorials by the Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D. D., of the Editorial Staff of The Christian Work, on "Protestantism and the World Necessities." This article appears also in The North American Review. It is worth the very careful attention of all who are interested in the duty of the Church in meeting the great problems now facing the world.—The Editors.]

PROTESTANTISM is a living branch of the Christian Ecclesia, bearing fruit after its kind, but capable of far more fruitfulness. As a world movement at the front of history for the last four centuries, it is not without the taint of reproach incidental to human admixture. Some of its developments, past and present, have shown that, as a rule, men are farther advanced in political than religious ideas. Fed by the faults as well as the virtues of its progenitors, it boasts no unblemished record, nor asserts for itself a fictitious infallibility. It must be received for its intrinsic values to society, which have been realized in every realm of life, and are not liable to extinction by ecclesiastical fiat. Constructed at infinite sacrifice, cemented with honest blood, productive of eminent spirits and manifold services, and resting upon principles which exercise a legitimate and wide dominion, Protestantism now confronts the world situation which tests the fitness of historic institutions and systems to survive. Shall it perish, or prove itself the master of a grave and well-nigh universal emergency? This is the core of the issue discussed here, and also an indication of the indefeasible obligation, not only of Protestantism but of the Church Catholic, and not only of the Church Catholic but of all civilized and humane persons and States.

EDITORIAL

At the moment the outlook is not particularly cheerful. Professor E. A. Wodehouse, a considerate and keen observer, states that the churches at large, and specifically the Protestant churches, have lost touch with the thought movements of the age and no longer mould public opinion. In a period when every department of life and action vibrates with immense possibilities for good or evil, their voice is practically dumb. He further says it is a matter of general comment that while complicated and perplexing problems accumulate on every side, the churches offer no solutions. Moreover, in the vile genesis of war's intentioned outbreak, some churches played the harlot with the State, and supported its betrayal of Christendom. What counsel or direction can such pseudo-guardians give to our insurgent age? Without authority, remote from reality, unreal in attitude, bemused by things that are no more, they move in their diminishing spheres of retrospect and quotation, having no elucidation and little comfort for the ardent souls who fight the hard battles of outer life. The indictment reveals the academic in his less trustworthy and partial views. If the optimist believes too much because he sees too little, the pessimist complements him by seeing so much that he believes too little. One does not have wholly to acquiesce with Professor Wodehouse's severe arraignment in admitting that although the churches have shared in the general progress of the time, they have also paltered with some beggarly elements of reaction, cant, bigotry, and spurious liberalism. In the sequence they are heavily assessed: but they have means of payment and also of recovery.

Comparisons with the mediaevalism which Protestantism shattered are often unfavorable to the latter system. The pre-Reformation period was certainly solidified by a common religion which incorporated its faith and politics in the Papacy and the Empire. Yet the supremacy of the spiritual power did not represent the undivided result of mediaeval thinking on the subject, though we find much in contemporary writings which suggests that conclusion. The real task of the statesmen of the Middle Ages was to devise an efficient machinery for individual safety and social protection. This task was ever before them and conditioned their intellectual habits. It should be noted that they had a more distinct apprehension of the supreme obstacle to all betterment than have men of our day—viz., the depravity of human nature, and the resultant strength of disorder, truculence, and treachery. To some who are impatient of the present and careless of the past, those people who carry little baggage with them, the laborious studies, beliefs and aspirations of long vanished priests and publicists will appear as nothing more than the annals of incoherent error. But those who closely scrutinize the outstanding figures of mediaeval life will not treat lightly or ignorantly religious leaders who established a world-society which bowed to spiritual as well as to temporal rule. This achievement marks the standing difference between the mediaeval and the modern âges, and not a few enlightened souls devoutly wish it could be repeated in the twentieth century. Its forces are but dimly realized in a materialized and secular period. Nevertheless they once enshrined themselves in cathedrals and universities, in abbeys and schools, as the monuments of that "golden age of faith." They were expressed in the royalty of St. Louis, the unrivaled intellect of St. Thomas, the beatific sanctity of St. Francis, the scholarly devotion of Roger Bacon, the epic of Dante, the eloquence of St. Bernard, and the statesmanship of Hildebrand. To unfriendly critics who look upon the centuries between the Apostolic age and that of Luther as a night of unclean things, it is apposite to say, Go and do likewise: tame the savage instincts of militarism and nationalism as those former Churchmen tamed turbulent aristocracies and rude peasantries; regenerate and confirm afresh, as they did, the unalterable belief in a Divine Order to be realized here and now. Their treasures were contained in frail and earthen vessels, but they mediated between their coarse surroundings and the ethereal ideals and emotions which seemed so distant from the grosser iniquities and grotesque customs of the time. Their strength came, as all strength comes, from an exuberant vitality; an original passion which regarded every evil vulnerable, and every pursuit of holiness feasible.

Had that strength been exhausted, the saving succession of lawgivers and magistrates running through the center of Western life and morals would have been broken. Because it remained steadfast, Protestantism is here, as its joint heir with Catholicism; and it should pause to recall that its mighty ancestor, mediaevalism, collapsed. The pressure of nominally Christian States was too heavy for the federalism of Church and Empire. They could beget but they could not govern them. While northern nations broadened in their ethical susceptibilities and political claims, the Papacy yielded to the fascinations of the Italian Renaissance. Its international sympathies narrowed, its traits and tendencies were provincialized. The glamor of rank and ritual, the remonstrance of a venerable hierarchy, the stilted formulas of Aristotelian theology, alike disappeared in countries beyond the Alps. A resistless tide of combined popular sentiment and intellectual rebellion submerged Catholicity, but at the same time it irrigated a germinal freedom the full fruition of which has still to be seen. The memories of that momentous rupture, charged as it was with good and evil, should sober every lover of religion as the keystone of social architecture.

EDITORIAL

I hold no brief for the traditional churches, yet what follows may perhaps be set down with propriety. The Eastern Church is at present torn asunder by wars and sorely afflicted by ruthless persecution. The Roman Catholic Church appears serene upon the surface, and wears the mantle of a comforting tranquility. Yet its Bishops are conscious that no ecclesiastical organization is proof against the demands of democracy that it shall have limitless sway. They no longer negotiate with princes and premiers, but with the peoples, to whom the Popes address their appeals for social justice and international concord. Should the Holy See bring about a reconciliation with the Eastern Church, and the Eastern Church, purged by her martyrdom, transform her ministry to the Slavonic and Greek races, then the Reformed Churches must meet a counter stroke far more formidable than that dealt by Ignatius Loyola. Nor do I question the motives behind this sagacious policy. It is inclusive, consolidating and preservative of things that should not be permitted to die. For there is no essential divinity in majority votes, and even democracy is liable to nod. Who, then, shall shepherd the shepherds themselves, even though they be the redoubtable champions of popular sovereignty? And where shall such a sovereignty obtain higher sanctions than numbers can confer?

S. P. C.

The Neglect of the Bible

HERE are few more familiar pages in John Richard Greene's famous "Short History of the English People" than that in which he tells of the change which passed over England during the years between the middle of the reign of Elizabeth and the meeting of the Long Parliament. "England," he says "became the people of a book, and that book was the Bible. It was yet the one English book which was familiar to every Englishman; it was read at churches and at home and everywhere its words, as they fell on ears which custom had not deadened, kindled a startling enthusiasm. When Bishop Bonner set up the first six Bibles in St. Paul's 'many well-disposed people used much to resort to the hearing thereof, especially when they could get any that had an audible voice to read to them.' . . . 'One John Porter used sometimes to be occupied in that goodly exercise, to the edifying of himself as well as others. This Porter was a fresh young man and of a big stature; and great multitudes would resort thither to hear him, because he could read well and had an audible voice.'"

And now besides this let us set some sentences from the recently issued report of the committee appointed by the Board of Education on the Teaching of English in England. They have been quoted already in these columns, but they are of such grave significance for all who are concerned for the future of religion in this country that no apology is necessary for quoting them again. In the section of the report dealing with the reading of the Bible the committee says: "We have three plain facts before us: First, the Authorized Version, though a translation from an Eastern original, is a true part of English literature—has indeed been fitly described as 'the most majestic thing in our literature and the most spiritually living thing we inherit.' Second, it is historically true that for five centuries and more no other English book has been so widely read in this island or so closely connected with our national life, or has left so strong a mark upon the mass of our literature. Third, at the present time the Bible is probably less widely read and less directly influential in our life and literature than it has been at any time since the Reformation." . . . "Reading is no doubt more common; but we are continually less and less familiar with the one great piece of literature which for centuries gave something of a common form, a common dignity, to the thought and speech of the people." This is not, let it be understood, the judgment of a committee of "clerics." Indeed, not a single "Rev." had a place upon it. It was made up wholly of men and women whose knowledge both of English literature and of the educational world of England entitled them to speak with authority. Sir Henry Newbolt was the chairman of the committee; Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, Professor C. H. Firth, Mr. John Bailey, Mr. George Sampson and Mr. F. S. Boas were among its members; and it is the deliberate and considered judgment of men like these which is recorded in the words which have just been quoted. They are speaking, of course, from the point of view of the teaching of English, which was the only subject committed to them; and from that point of view the facts are serious enough; but to those who have any responsibility for the teaching of religion they are disquieting in the extreme. We do not want to exaggerate. We do not forget that English Christianity was a thousand years old before we had an English Bible. But those who realize how intimate, at least since the Reformation, the tie between the Bible and religion has been cannot read the judgment of this committee without alarm. Now that the facts of which we must all have been more or less vaguely conscious are clearly and authoritatively set forth before our eyes, what are we going to do to meet them? By way of a beginning we venture to set down three simple suggestions.

Can anything be done to give us the Bible in more attractive and readable form? One is sometimes tempted to think that there is no stronger proof of its divinity than that it has somehow survived the mishandling of its editors. Look at the average copy of the Scriptures as it is put into the young reader's hands today. In most cases it is the Authorized Version, printed on thin paper in small type, in double narrow columns, with the narrative chopped into chapters and minced into verses—is it necessary to say that these sometimes very misleading divisions have no place in the original Scriptures?—and with no attempt to distinguish between its poetry and its prose. Fancy having to read Shakespeare under similar conditions!

Is it necessary or wise to go on insisting, as we usually have done, on the whole Bible? The serious student will of course omit nothing; he knows that every part of Holy Scriptures has its place in the structure of progressive revelation. But the Bible of most Christian men and women is really only a small portion of the whole. Some parts of the Old Testament—for example Leviticus, Ezekiel, Zechariah, Ecclesiastes—might almost never have been translated out of the original Hebrew for all the use that they make of them. Might it not be better, then, if in seeking to introduce the Bible to young readers we were content, at the outset, to set before them in modern and attractive form those sections of it which Christian experience has shown to be of supreme spiritual value? As an illustration of what is meant we may call attention to the admirable little "Bible Anthology" which has just been included in that delightful series of books published by Mr. J. M. Dent, "The King's Treasuries."

But what is needed above everything else to rescue the Bible from the neglect into which it has fallen is more intelligent methods of teaching and reading it. Readers of John Ruskin's "Praeterita" will remember his account of the way in which his mother read the Bible with him—how they began with Genesis and worked their way steadily forward, hard names and all, omitting nothing, until they reached the last page of Revelation, when they turned back to go through it all once again. Well, any method is better than none, and, as Ruskin's own case proves, even bad methods will sometimes yield good results. But that is not how to read the Bible. To name but two examples, the Hebrew Prophets and the Pauline Epistles, if they are to be intelligible, must be read, not in the order in which they stand in our Bible, but as they were written, and in their proper historical setting. Of course this means time and trouble; but until Christian people realize that they must give to God the service of their minds as well as of their hearts, and that a book like the Bible demands trouble-taking readers, they will never make their own the treasures which lie there and which only he who seeks finds.

The British Weekly.

THE OBSERVER

What Does It Mean?

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

WHAT does it mean," was the question on everybody's lips or at least in their minds when seven hundred and fifty people sat down together at dinner in the Hotel Biltmore, New York, last week. It certainly means something. Some months ago the American Association for International Co-operation was formed under the leadership of former Attorney General Wickersham. There was already in existence the League of Nations Non-Partisan Committee. This latter organization was working openly and directly for the participation of the United States in the present League. The Wickersham organization was created to interest those who have not been sure that the time had come to urge our government to enter the League, but who believed that the time had come for the United States to co-operate actively with the other nations in restoring the harassed world to some semblance of normality. The group was made up largely of Republicans, very prominent ones, and many of them belonging to the "thirty-one" which issued the call for all believers in the league to vote for Mr. Harding as he would be able to get us in where Mr. Wilson had failed.

But the most amazing thing is that at the last three or four meetings of the Association for International Co-operation everybody, including the most eminent Republicans, began to say they were tired of beating about the bush; the present Administration had absolutely failed to keep its promises about getting the United States into some Association of Nations; that there was no slightest sign that it had any desire or purpose to take its place in any real way in the family of nations, therefore the time had come to put it up directly to the United States whether they wanted to follow the Administration's course of isolation or have the United States join the present League. It was useless to expect or to seek any middle course. This feeling became so strong at the various meetings that at last the question arose as to whether they should not join forces with the League of Nations Non-Partisan Committee since they were of the same mind.

The combination of the two groups into one was immediately consummated under the name: "The League of Nations Non-Partisan Association." The Biltmore dinner was given to celebrate the union and Supreme Court Justice John H. Clarke, who had been elected the President of the new union, was present as the chief speaker. His great address was printed in full in the New York papers and has gone about the world. I will come back to it in a moment. The interesting thing was that the moment the dinner was announced requests for seats began to come in far beyond the capacity of the hotel, and when the evening came there were seven hundred and fifty people, nearly everyone of whom was more or less outstanding in public life, and fully half of them Republicans. Hon. Oscar S. Straus, formerly of Mr. Roosevelt's Cabinet and Minister to Turkey, welcomed the guests with a short address which elicited great applause. (It will appear in next week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN WORK.) He then introduced Mr. Wickersham as Chairman. The new Association adopted the following statement of principles and purposes. I hope my readers will read this statement very carefully for it certainly is rather significant that eight hundred men, most of whom are perhaps Republicans and many of whom are leaders in the educational, religious, political, and business world, should unanimously adopt this creed. Is it not indicative of a change going on all over the nation?

"We, Members of this Association, Believe:

"That in view of the advance in the means of destruction of life and property in war, the preservation of liberty and civilization requires that corresponding advance be made in governmental co-operation designed to make an end of war;

"That some league, or union, or association of nations is the only form of international organization yet proposed that is adequate to accomplish this end;

"And that three years of experience with the existing League, with its membership of more than fifty civilized nations, proves it to be such an efficient and promising agency for the substitution of conference and justice and law for force in international affairs, that the adherence to it by the United States would render it the greatest moral and political agency hitherto devised for securing the peace of the world.

"We cordially approve the recent approach by our government to participation in League of Nations activities, and especially the promised membership in the Permanent Court of International Justice, but we believe:

"That, in the province of God our nation has been placed in a position of great moral influence and power in the world;

"That it is unworthy and unwise for our great nation to "unofficially observe" and timidly participate in the conferences of the League without sharing in responsibility for its decisions;

"That permanent international peace and domestic prosperity can be secured only by dignified and responsible participation of our government as a member of the League;

"And that the other nations would welcome the United States into membership on any reasonable terms.

"We, therefore, putting aside all party or other differences, unite and invite other persons, and organizations, to unite with us, for the purpose of an independent, non-partisan cultivation of such a public opinion as will induce the present Administration, or if not this, the next one, to enter the League of Nations on such terms as to such Administration may seem wise, provided only that they be consistent with our constitution and consonant with the dignity and honor, the moral responsibility and power of our Republic.

"January 10, 1923."

Justice Clarke's great address appears in full in the New York Times of January 11th, occupying the whole of the seventh page. Long extracts from it were printed all over the land. Nearly the whole of it was cabled to London. It is to be widely distributed in pamphlet form, I hear. It must have been read with much interest at Washington for it went there as the voice of eight hundred very prominent people who applauded it to the echo again and again as it was being delivered. The first part of the address appears on page 111 of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN WORK.

The fundamental note of Justice Clarke's address was that the choice was between the League or more war. The United States really had once choice left, either to enter the League or enter more wars. He wondered if the chaotic condition of the world was not largely due to our failure to use the moral leadership and military prestige which we gained in the great war. He finds everywhere in our country a growing dissatisfaction with our policy of isolation. Our conscience is beginning to trouble us. Note how Justice Clarke marshalls the evidence to support his contention that only one of two courses is open to the nation, the League or militarism. He quotes Pershing, Denby, Weeks, and the President himself, showing how the thought is continually finding expression in their words that we must be "prepared for a universal call to armed defense." He does not believe the thought of the people is running that way, even if the mind of the Government is. Justice Clarke thinks all this talk from Washington about arms is a clear sign that there is no thought of the nation's ever entering into any cooperative relationship with the other nations of the world: "The definite warnings to us to prepare for the next war which we are thus receiving from the highest officials of our Government are obviously based on the conclusion that our country is to remain permanently outside the League of Nations, and on this assumption the official warning is wise and the thinking on which it proceeds is sound, for unless international relations shall be placed under some other and better control than they have been in the past, clearly another World War is inevitable."

Justice Clark describes what this next war will be—a thing fearful to contemplate—but it is a choice between the world organized on a community basis—or wars. All the world except the United States has gladly accepted this community basis. Germany accepts and only waits to be allowed to enter. Turkey and Russia and Mexico take our point of view and prefer to remain outside, but these nations have been in chaotic state and as they recover stability are seeking admission. Soon we shall be the only nation in the world that insists on denying "the community of nations." To quote again: "I wonder how fully the American people realize that this refusal of ours to enter the League is notice, definite notice, to fifty-two other civilized nations that as a nation we prefer to settle differences with them in the old, savage way of war rather than by resort to this new agency of peace, and that they, many of them our late allies and friends, must all look upon us as a potential enemy against whom they must combine and arm themselves on land and sea and in the air, in preparation for another world war." And our authorities at Washington, seeing the reverse side of this are urging us to arm against them.

Justice Clarke put in a most lucid way the four obligations our nation must assume if it enters the League.

(1) That we would never go to war with any nation without first submitting the quarrel to the League to see if some peaceful and just solution cannot be found.

(2) To consider the simultaneous determination of armaments. (3) To join the other nations in imposing a world-wide economic and social boycott against any nation in the League breaking the covenant. (4) To join the other nations of the world in defending liberty and independence from the assault of some predatory power—a very remote possibility, for what nation would go out against all the world? These points are developed in Justice Clarke's address on page 111 and I need not say more about them here; but one cannot help asking whether if a nation has to choose between these four obligations—and one might add a fifth, participation in the World Court,—and 1914 over again, which is the wisest choice, which will be best for America, and, as at least a few people in this nation will ask, which will be best for humanity as a whole?

The remainder of Justice Clarke's great speech was devoted to a survey of what the League has accomplished in its three years of existence, and showing how much more it might have accomplished had we been present in its counsels. He then analyzes the world situation—Russia's chaos, Central Europe's bankruptcy, the Near East's anarchy, the European muddle, Germany and Russia, and the agricultural prostration in America due to the fact that with an impoverished, bankrupt, chaotic Europe there is no foreign market for our products. He is saddened to the depths of his being to see America becoming a "safety first" people: "We are a moral and religious people. . . . Our whole history cries out against accepting the sordid, selfish motto, 'Safety first,' in international affairs." He shows how from colonial times we have been sending missionaries to the ends of the earth. We have made many converts in the Near East and no greater obligation ever rested upon a nation than to protect these converts. He says that it is common belief of those who know that "had America been standing with Britain in the League of Nations and at the Dardanelles, the Turk would never have raised his murderous hand again, that millions of Christian lives would have been saved, and that their future would have been secure." Justice Clarke closes with an appeal to the churches since the question of our entering the League is a moral and not a political issue. It is the attempt to apply the Christian principles to international relationships.

The gathering passed the following resolution which was cabled to the Secretary General of the League of Nations in Geneva, in honor of the third anniversary of the founding of the League:

"Seven hundred and fifty American citizens gathered in the city of New York at a dinner to inaugurate the League of Nations' Non-Partisan Association extend to the League of Nations our hearty greetings. We rejoice that no discouragements have dimmed the high resolution of the representatives of the League to achieve ends set forth in the covenant. We deplore America's absence from the counsels of the League of Nations at this time when her moral force and co-operation should be freely given for the re-establishment of the orderly processes of civilization. As patriotic Americans we have pledged our best endeavors to an independent civilization of such public opinion as will insure the entrance of the United States at the earliest possible moment into the League of Nations, on terms consonant with the dignity and honor, the moral responsibility and power of our republic.

"League of Nations' Non-Partisan Organization

"GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM, President of Council,

"JOHN H. CLARKE, President.

Again one asks: Does all this mean that a change of heart is coming over the nation?

FREDERICK LYNCH

British Labor and Religion

Religion, it would seem, is a stronger influence in the new British Parliament than it was in the last. Out of seventy-three Free Churchmen in the present House of Commons thirty-two belong to the Labor Party, forty-two to the Independent (Asquith) Liberals, and eighteen to the National (Lloyd George) Liberals. The four most eminent leaders of the Labor Party—Ramsay MacDonald, J. R. Clymes, Philip Snowden, and Arthur Henderson, (who is temporarily out of Parliament—are all men of religious spirit, as are many of the rank and file of the party. Immediately after the election the twenty Scottish Labor members took part in a dedication service in the St. Andrew's and City Halls, Glasgow, attended by eight thousand people. They solemnly committed themselves to the reconciliation and unity of the nations of the world and the development of the happiness of the people of Great Britain and Ireland. "Abjuring vanity and self-aggrandizement," an Englishman writes, "and regarding themselves as the honored servants of the people, their mission being to promote the welfare of their fellow citizens and the well-being of mankind, they sent to all peoples a message of goodwill, reconciliation, and friendship." The service was a truly religious one. The only Labor daily newspaper in Britain, "The Herald," said in the course of a recent editorial, "If every one of our legislators keeps steadily before his eyes the figure of the Man of Sorrows, then Almighty God will bless their deliberations." The recent Unemployment March through London was led by a young clergyman, Rev. T. E. Pickering, who had a curacy in Sheffield and is now the head of a Christian Brotherhood, which includes men of all denominations. When released after his arrest for obstructing the police, he was carried shoulder high by the unemployed marchers. Religion in many ways seems a greater power in England than in America.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Gustavus Adolphus

By J. D. Prince, United States Minister to Denmark

Preached in Upsala Cathedral, Sweden, in the Swedish Language, on Gustavus Adolphus Day, November 6, 1922

I HAVE no right to stand here and preach, nor do I wish to do so. I intend merely to say a few words from the point of view of the ordinary layman regarding the golden opportunity which now presents itself to all Christendom to combine against the power of evil, and to receive as a united whole that light of Christ which is ever shining for the whole world, if the world is only willing to seek and find it. In this connection, I recently read, with a new interest, the powerful words of the Revelation of St. John 3, 20:

"Behold, I stand at the door, and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him and he with me."

These words reminded me of one day long ago when in my youth I visited in Constantinople the mosque of St. Sophia, which formerly was one of the most important Christian Cathedrals of the mediaeval and ancient world, but which was captured by the Mohammedans in the year 1543 and altered into a temple of Islam. As I stood at the door, I saw the gigantic space of the enormous Cathedral lying before me, covered with yellow mats, laid askew, in order to indicate the direction of Mecca, and corresponding with the position of a small booth which stands in the old choir to the right of where the high altar formerly was. In the great Cathedral upon the crooked mats sat thousands of Mohammedans intoning the Koran. As I stood and listened to their voices resounding from every side, it chanced that I looked up toward the choir, and suddenly I saw there a huge image of Our Lord shining through the yellow wash with which the Mohammedans had covered the vaulted ceiling, in order to eliminate all Christian pictures of a former time. Up there the picture of Christ shone forth, with the right hand raised in benediction. In order to see it better, I moved a little, first to the right and then to the left, but only from one place was the picture visible, i. e., from the position where I had accidentally stood at first.

Often as the years have rolled by have I thought of that moment when, for the first time, I realized the meaning of this all too brief revelation. In order to see Our Lord's light, in order even imperfectly to understand the blessed reality of his love, we ourselves must seek him. His light is shining, but not for those who will not seek. It does not look for us, but we must place ourselves where we can see it.

"Behold! he stands at the door and knocks," but it is we who must rise up and open the door before he can enter to us. If the necessity of union in Christ appeals to us as individuals, how much more must it appeal to all Christian churches? To-day, when every kind of danger hovers over Christendom, perhaps the greatest of all the dangers which threaten us is that of disunion, which appears, most unfortunately, chiefly among the Protestant communions. In almost every English and American village, one sees three or four, or even more, Protestant churches belonging to different denominations, nearly every one of which serves a congregation which is too poor to support the church and its minister. And this unhappy phenomenon is due only to sectarian traditions, which are, for the most part, not fundamental, but really superficial. In spite of all this, I am proud of the fact that we in America have now begun to recognize this danger, and just as your great Archbishop here has done; we are taking steps to reach a common unity of action, even though a common religious organization is for the present impossible. I shall mention here only one epoch-making proof. The Episcopal Bishop of New York, who represents our greatest diocese, Dr. Manning, not long ago was able to arrange a hitherto unthinkable connection and co-operation between the influential Episcopal church and ministers of other Protestant denominations—a great step toward Christian unity. Also in England the same significant tendency has been manifested. Many of the bishops of the official church have now an excellent understanding with ministers of sects which do not belong to the dominant religion;—here again we have a new and most important advance. The American Baptists, a hitherto very strict sect, have in many churches freed themselves from former prejudices, and now permit members of other denominations to receive the communion in Baptist churches,—a liberal point of view, which was almost unknown fifty years ago. Furthermore, a recent occurrence of great moment has given us a most overwhelming proof of how God's seed has fallen on fruitful soil, viz.; the fact that in the month of August, 1922, we had in Copenhagen a Conference of Churches, consisting of representatives of nearly all Christian bodies, to which also your Archbishop gave his powerful support. Here again a step was taken, perhaps the first cogent step toward the realization of a common church ideal.

To-day we celebrate the memory of Sweden's greatest religious champion; a day when we should remember the Majesty of God's church. "God's church"; what mighty words! For us they must have not only a national, but an international—nay, rather a supernatural inter-christian meaning, connoting that Christian unity which must be the highest possession of all Christian States, and which all peoples and churches are called upon to realize. We need now a new corpus evangelicorum, in a spiritual sense, which shall go forth from victory to victory until Our Lord shall bless the world, not as through a glass, darkly, as I saw his image in St. Sophia's Mosque, but face to face. This is not a vain dream, for we should all feel in our hearts that Christendom some day, and that soon, must listen to Him when He stands at the door and knocks, and joyfully open that door, so that He may come in and sup with us and that we may be with Him.

The League of Nations

By Justice John H. Clarke

[This article is part of an address delivered before the League of Nations' Non-Partisan Association, New York, Jan. 10, 1923. It will be remembered that Justice Clarke resigned recently from the Supreme Court in order to give himself to the task of helping to bring America into the League. The Observer this week, on page —, describes the great dinner at which the address was delivered.]

OUR recent congressional elections are interpreted by men of all parties as showing an unrest—a deep and widespread political, moral, social and economic discontent—such as has seldom been seen in our favored country.

The question is being asked with increasing frequency: to what purpose did the free nations of the world fight and win the great war?

There are those among us who think that these unfortunate conditions, domestic and foreign, are the result of a failure to make a wise use of the moral leadership and military prestige which were so clearly ours when the war ended; but there are others who profess to find satisfaction in the fact that taking the part of the Priest and Levite, our Government has passed, and is still passing by on the other side while Europe is slowly sinking into political and business chaos.

It is well for us to remember that political chaos has very little regard for international boundaries—and that the last three years have proved that business chaos has no respect for such boundaries at all, even though they be continents or seas.

There is one thing, however, upon which we all agree. That is that after two years of isolation, of holding aloof while our former allies and friends have been sinking deeper and deeper into poverty and despair, America is profoundly dissatisfied. No taunt wounds us so deeply as the suggestion that in pride of wealth and material power our country is losing, if indeed it has not lost, its own soul. The conscience of the United States is troubled within us.

Ladies and gentlemen, with your indulgence I shall discuss very briefly two propositions.

First, that the welfare of our country and of mankind imperatively requires that our Government shall promptly enter into some form of league or union or association of nations to promote and render secure the peace of the world.

And, second, that experience for three years with the existing League of Nations proves that it is the duty of our Government to join that League upon such conditions of with such reservations as may seem wise provided only that they be consonant with the character and dignity, the honor and power, of our great nation.

Consider with me now, if you please, the first of these.

General Pershing, who speaks for us the authoritative word on the subject, in addressing great meetings throughout the country is urging our people to prepare for the next war.

Secretary of the Navy Denby declares that we must have a navy second to none in the world—in preparation for the next war.

Secretary of War Weeks advises Congress that our army has been reduced below the safety limit already and that our national safety requires that it shall be increased—in preparation for the next war.

The President of the United States in his message on December 8 commends to Congress a proposed "survey of a plan to draft all the resources of the republic, human and material, for national defence" so that we shall be "prepared for a universal call to armed defence"—in the next war.

I am sure the question is starting in the mind of every one of you if this is the desperate prospect before us when outside the league—why not join the league? If we remain out of it, the next war will come as the last one did, without our having any opportunity to prevent it and with only the privilege of fighting our way out of it.

I have it on the authority of one of the most talented of the younger Generals in our army, the commander of a division through the bloody campaign of the Argonne,

(Continued on page 114)

Bolsheviki Warring on Religion

Patriarch and Metropolitan of Petrograd Held as Traitors—Archbishop of Moscow and Other Anti-Soviet Prelates Seized—Priests and Laymen Executed for Opposing the Pillage of Churches by Red Soldiers

By Courtesy of the "New York Herald"

ON May 4 a sensation was caused by the appearance of the Patriarch and Archbishop Nikander as witnesses. They had been summoned by the prosecution, and the examination of the Patriarch lasted for hours. When he entered the overcrowded hall every one present stood up, and when in the middle of the examination, a rude fellow who had brow-beaten the accused all the way through, turned to him with an insulting question there arose such loud protests in the body of the court that the trial had to be interrupted and some of the public turned away.

The Patriarch said that he found himself compelled, in accordance with the church's law, to condemn the confiscation; that in the event of conflict between the civil law and the canon law he considered it his duty to obey the canon law, and that he took on himself full responsibility for the drawing up, publication and distribution of his message.

Then the court, on the demand of the prosecution, at once ordered the Patriarch to be tried as the principal culprit. It also ordered the trial of Nikander and the arrest of those Moscow archdeacons who had attended the meeting of March 7 and who, so far, had not been taken.

The result of the trial was that eight priests and three deacons were condemned to death. On learning this the Patriarch at once wrote from his prison three letters—one to the Council of People's Commissars, one to Kalinine and one to Koursky, Commissar for Justice. He protested that the punishment did not correspond with the charge; pointed out the injustice of condemning subordinates, who were obliged to obey without question the orders of their ecclesiastical superiors; and, taking all responsibility on himself, asked that he be executed instead.

Eleven capital sentences were passed upon laymen, some of whom had done nothing more than sign a petition for the exclusion of the sacred vessels. At Sudinsk four more laymen were sentenced to death, and at Rostov Bishop Arsenius received a death sentence, which later was commuted to ten years in prison.

An appalling impression was made in ecclesiastical and Orthodox circles. Nevertheless not one Russian Christian dared to come forward to ask a pardon. The only ones to beg for a remission were some followers of Tolstoi, several schismatics and a few Jews. Orthodox congregations were the only ones to keep silent. They feared a petition by them would do more harm than good. Persons in close touch with the Government whispered to the faithful that the more they pressed for a pardon the more their insistence would testify to the influence of the condemned men over the masses. As the Government has an intense fear for any adverse influence over the people it is pitiless toward those who wield such influence.

An appeal in Cassation having been refused, the All-Russian Central Committee commuted six of the death sentences. The priests, Zaozerski, Sokolov, Nadejdin and Telegem and the deacon, Tichimorov, were executed.

Death sentences were only pronounced at Shouyem Novgorod and Novocheerkask. In other places the bishops and priests were thrown into prison to await trial.

The object of the Government was attained. The priesthood was terrorized. The average "church member" remained silent, paralyzed with fear. Some bishops and priests even came forward to bless a cynical and godless Government and to start "reforming" and "revivifying" the church.

The Bolsheviks certainly have been victorious in the first serious encounter with what was the greatest other organized force in Russia. They have failed in many things, even in the main task of establishing Communism. But they have succeeded marvelously well in creating an anti-religious atmosphere in this country, which, five years ago, was intensely religious, not to say superstitious.

Russian orthodox soldiers have plundered churches at the bidding of a Government consisting wholly of atheists and anti-clericals. They have thrown into sacks the chalices to which ten years ago they attributed supernatural powers. They have tied up priests whom they looked upon, ten years ago, as wonder workers, able to blast them with a curse. They have shot down fellow Christians for attempting to defend the churches; and lastly they have executed priests.

Let us consider the religious conduct of the people. Despite the many statements that have been made in America about a religious revival in Russia one will find no trace of any such revival, but, very clear proofs that Christianity is fast losing ground. People hardly ever cross themselves in the street; and those that knew pre-war Russia will realize what a tremendous change this is. Moreover, few of the male sex go to church, in the towns at least; and the obligation to confess and receive the sacrament once a year is no longer, of course, enforced by the State, as it once was, in the case of students, officers, soldiers and Government servants. A Government servant who exhibits devotion to religion is unlikely to get on.

The Bolshevik Government for the last five years has carried on an anti-Christian propaganda by word of mouth as well as by press. No religious books are printed. The White Russians are as flabby on the subject of their religion as they are on every other subject save drinking, dancing and playacting. They would perhaps accept Slavonic Bibles presented to them by pious Americans, but they would never read them. Hence the assertion that Slavonic Christianity is losing ground very fast in Russia. As the teaching of religion is prohibited in all public and private schools, and a sentence of one year at hard labor is imposed for each breach of this regulation, the new generation probably will grow up without any religion. In forty years Russia will thus have gone much further in the direction of agnosticism than western Europe has gone in four hundred years.

The orthodox in Moscow were formerly free from any feeling of self-consciousness or human respect in the public exercise of their religion. In that they were like Mohammedans, who, in their countries, pray as openly as if there were nobody in the world save Allah and themselves. Certainly there was nothing like that complete unconsciousness of onlookers—some of them possibly enemies, others armed with cameras—in any other Christian country.

This is nearly all gone. When a tram passes the Iversky gate, you can only see a couple of old women crossing themselves furtively in a corner.

I am told, however, that there is a great revival of devotion among the young ladies and gentlemen of the "intellectual" classes who formerly looked on their national church with something like contempt, and who were, in fact, "parlor Bolsheviks" at a time when the Imperial Government protected them against the real or slaughter house Bolsheviks. These "bourgeois" classes are now the mainstay of the clergy or else (which is even better) have had their eyes opened to the shortcomings of their own variety of Christianity and are earnestly studying other varieties.

* * *

As a matter of fact, the retention of the multitudinous crosses of the Kremlin does more harm than good to Christianity, for it associates the religion of Christ with the blood-stained old Czarist system, which was about as far removed from Christianity as one can well imagine. But outside the Kremlin the Soviet Government is beginning to demolish no less than twenty-five street shrines, containing holy ikons, with lamps burning day and night before them. The largest of these was in Moses Square, near the end of Tverskaya street. A month ago it was surrounded with a wooden fence, as the Czar's house at Ekaterinburg was shrouded from the public gaze, and behind this fence the sledge hammers of Communist workmen smashed altar stones and ikons, crucifixes and carved texts of scripture. When I left Moscow a few days ago this beautiful shrine had completely disappeared. It was larger than the stone cross at Charing Cross station, London, and, being situated in the middle of a very wide and busy thoroughfare, infested by furious motor cars, it was a great help to foot passengers crossing the street, permitting them as it did to take breath for a moment in a place of safety before attempting the rest of their journey.

On the other hand, it did not interfere with the wheeled traffic.

The remaining twenty-four shrines will soon be pulled down. One of them, a huge church tower standing in Great Nikinskaya street, near the headquarters of the A. R. A., has already been surrounded with the fatal wooden fence behind which the work of demolition will rapidly be accomplished. It is surprising, indeed, how rapidly the Bolsheviks accomplish any work of desecration and destruction to which they put their hands and how slow they are at any work of reparation or reconstruction. They have been tinkering for months past at the former German Consulate and at a great number of other slightly damaged houses which an English or American building contractor could make habitable in a few weeks, but winter will probably catch them with this task uncompleted, so that they may have to begin it all over again next spring; but when it comes to battering down a beautiful religious shrine they can do it in a few days. In the same way it only took them a couple of years to shatter the whole economic structure of Russia, but at their present rate of progress it will take them a century to rebuild that structure.

Russia has no Rome to cut adrift from. The men who separated England from Rome were Englishmen and Christians, while the men who are pulling down the Christian Church in Russia are not themselves Christians and in some cases not themselves Russians. England continued the church by perpetuating bishops and priests, while the Soviet Government would sooner end the church than mend it. I will cite Trotzky on the State's position. One of the most important of his recent speeches was delivered on October 12 at the fifth All-Russian congress of the League of Communist Youth. In this very remarkable organization no member of it is more than eighteen. It contains both boys and girls, and is intensely serious, being extremely Communist and anti-Christian, but laying great stress on study, discipline, comradeship (within the Communist party), industry, austerity and frugality. Many of its young men of seventeen and eighteen are commissars, while others are employed on important political business which in other countries always is entrusted to mature men. But the Bolshevik leaders act on principle in thus making great use of mere lads, for they find that youth when maddened by enthusiasm, has fewer scruples, less fear and less sentiment. No one is harder, braver, more contemptuous of death and religion and pity than the young Bolshevik, male or female, who has been graduated in the R. K. S. M.

Trotzky for the last five years has paid the greatest attention to the R. K. S. M.—perhaps it was because that there alone he found complete frankness, enthusiasm and self-abnegation, with absolutely neither racial nor other prejudices—and he is profoundly convinced that if the members of that organization who are now seventeen reach the age of thirty under a Bolshevik Government, then Communism will have taken root in Russia as strongly and uneradically as Christianity had taken root in the Roman Empire in the time of Julian the Apostate. Even if a counter revolution and a monarchical restoration take place after that it will not matter; the Soviet Government will come again, the roots will remain hidden in the earth, though the leaves may be destroyed. For the next ten years, however, this delicate plant, the R. K. S. M., must be carefully watched, and, to do him justice, Trotzky is tending it with great care.

Trotzky began with a rather unhappy metaphor. "Religion," said he, "is a mustard plaster—it sucks." But, correcting himself immediately, he began again: "Religion is a poison, particularly in revolutionary times or in the times of exceptional difficulty which come after the conquest of power. Therefore we ought to deepen the revolutionary world knowledge of the youth and take into account even their religious superstitions. The more enlightened should approach the less enlightened with the very greatest pedagogical attention. We ought to carry on among them a propaganda of atheism, if only that propaganda defined man's place in the universe and outlined the circle of his activities here on earth."

In the first year of its existence the Communist Government of Russia looked on religion with contempt and underestimated its force. It thought that if it deprived the church of its material resources and carried on a few religious discussions in public the roots which Eastern Christianity had fixed in the soul of Russian people would quickly die. A great Russian ecclesiastic informed The New York Herald correspondent that "events have proved the Government to have been wrong in this estimate. Religion in Russia was cleansed and strengthened by persecution and repression. The Government suddenly became aware that the church was strong and well organized when it began to take away the church's possessions, so it decided either to destroy the church or to bring it into subjection.

During the trial of the fifty-four one frequently heard the president of the court and the accusers speaking of the ecclesiastical hierarchy's existence as "illegal." The official Isvestia read the same meaning into the decree separating church and state. "The very fact of the archdeacons having met together at Archbishop Nikander's," writes the Isvestia, "proves, when taken in connection with all the other evidence, the existence of a 'special hierarchy,' constituting something in the nature of an independent state. Yet, according to the decree separating church and state, the existence in this country of a 'church hierarchy' as such is impossible. The decree allows only the existence of separate religious communities, not joined together by any administrative power and freely electing their clergy, who most certainly must not be confirmed by 'Episcopal councils.'"

Somewhere or other in the secret recess of the Communist party there ripened a plan for gaining possession of the very mechanism of the church administration by abolishing the Patriarchate and reestablishing the synodal system, with a State apparatus of control in the form of an Ober-Prokuror. But it was somewhat awkward for Communists to start reforming the church administration when they had so often declared that the church was no concern of theirs and should be ignored, just as witchcraft, fortune telling, devil worship, Taoism and all other superstitious practices. Therefore men of straw were needed to "reform" the church administration in the name of the church, for the good of the church and for the good of Christianity in general. These men of straw were soon found floating about on the surface of the revolutionary stream. First, there was the so-called "initiative group" of priests.

The most notable figure among them is Bishop Antonine, a man of considerable theological erudition, but of unbalanced judgment and imperfect education. A doctor would say that there is some pathological fault in him, and he would say so with all the greater conviction if he discovered the fact that Antonine had twice undergone treatment in a home for mental cases. As an Archbishop he was a failure. He has been kept long as a curate. Then he was without employment. Then he had a small ecclesiastical appointment in Vladikavkas, but did not get on well there and eventually came on to Moscow, where he placed himself in retirement. Last year when the Soviet Government became enthusiastic about organizing public discussions directed against religion Bishop Antonine stood up successfully against Lunacharsky, and became popular with the faithful in Moscow.

At the trial of the fifty-four he came forward as a witness for the prosecution and testified as a specialist in canon law, that the Patriarch's message on the wrongfulness of confiscating the Eucharistic vessels had no religious character and was not justified either by ecclesiastical law or by the traditions of the church. From this it followed that the Patriarch's message was of a political and counter revolutionary character. Reference to this expert opinion occurs in the summing up which led to the death sentences pronounced on the priests.

At the trial of the fifty-four we find him among the experts for the prosecution, and side by side with Bishop Antonine. These two were joined by the two Petrograd priests, Vedensky and Krasnitsky, who for some unknown reason left their parishes and appeared in Moscow.

On May 6, two days after he had been made to appear in court, the Patriarch, who had for two years been under house arrest and had had reasonable liberty for communicating with his flock, was isolated. All the monks who said mass in the Patriarch's private chapel and lived under the same roof as the Patriarch, as well as all the servants, were sent to prison. Tikhon's rooms were occupied by a guard and by agents of the political detective service and an ambush was arranged in them. Everybody who appeared and who was ignorant of what had happened to the Patriarch was allowed to enter the reception room, but was then detained and searched. Those who had any documents on their person were sent to the prison of the Cheka.

The supreme ecclesiastical power and the Moscow Episcopal power ceased to exist. Bishop Antonine's group therefore decided, with the help of the civil power, to get control of the church administration; but as they were not armed with the necessary canonical powers they made a determined effort to obtain these powers.

that seventeen nations are even now engaged in diligently preparing for the next war and specifically that a large corps of the best trained, most intelligent and capable officers of our army is constantly so employed. And this is his vivid description of what this preparation by our army officers for the next war is: "The plans being perfected will determine how your boys shall be drafted, clothed, armed and subsisted, trained and transported to the field of operations, how they will be deployed, blooded by trial battle and finally plunged into the fury of conflict. It is being determined whether their dead bodies shall be buried or cremated, how the shell-shocked, gassed and wounded men may most quickly be rehabilitated and hurried back for further effort, and how more and more of your boys and others like them shall be gathered with least delay and pushed into the shambles to replace those who have been destroyed."

The definite warnings to us to prepare for the next war which we are thus receiving from the highest officials of our Government are obviously based on the conclusion that our country is to remain permanently outside the League of Nations, and on this assumption, the official warning is wise and the thinking on which it proceeds is sound, for unless international relations shall be placed under some other and better control than they have been in the past, clearly another World War is inevitable.

For centuries, international alliances, coalitions, ententes and Four-Power and other treaties have served to promote rather than to prevent war; arbitration and conciliation, effective in minor disputes, have proved futile in matters of great international concern; and a long train of conferences, congresses and concerts of nations paved the way to the late World War. There is no other alternative, if the League of Nations, the latest and supreme effort of our civilization to subdue international anarchy to the rule of reason and the reign of law, is to be rejected, there remains for us only to accept the counsel of our officials and of despair and to prepare to make the next war as destructive of life and property and happiness as all of our science and invention, our wealth and power can possibly render it.

But now consider with me what this next war must be. Military men all over the world are describing it, and in barest outline this is something of the picture which they draw.

Submarine boats have already become undersea men of war with vastly increased power, sailing radius and armament and destruction; tanks have become land battleships, to add new horrors to the struggle in the field; airplanes of constantly increasing speed and power will carry death and destruction not less to cities far in the interior than to soldiers on the battle front; bombs have been devised ten times more destructive than any used in the World War; and poison gases, compressed into small volume, have been discovered so deadly in character that released from shells fired by long-range guns or dropped from the air, spreading by their own expansive force, they will destroy whole armies and cities in a single night. This preparation for the next war extends even to meeting the prospect that some enemy in desperation or depravity may release disease germs on camps and cities, with possibilities, of effects on the human race from the thought of which we turn away in horror.

The inexorable march of events has thus brought our generation face to face with the fateful necessity of deciding whether the advance in science and learning, which we thought would make gods of men, shall prove the destruction of our social order with all its promise for the welfare of mankind, or whether with this advance we have also developed a wisdom and self-restraint and courage capable of achieving a corresponding advance in international government which will substitute justice and reason and co-operation for the brute force of war.

I wonder how fully the American people realize that this refusal of ours to join the League is notice, definite notice, to fifty-two other civilized nations that as a nation we prefer to settle differences with them in the old savage way of war rather than by resort to this new agency of peace, and that they, many of them our late allies and friends, must look upon us as a potential enemy against which they must combine and arm themselves on land and sea and in the air in preparation for another world war.

Surely, we have thus found sufficient reason for our joining some league or association of nations to avert the calamity of another world war.

But now since as an organization we propose to urge the entrance of our Government into the existing League of Nations on some terms, we care little what they may be, consider with me what this League is, first fundamentally and legally and then what it has proved to be in two years of practical experience.

The Covenant of the League, in my judgment—and I speak now as an experienced lawyer—requires each nation subscribing to it to assume just four obligations important enough for discussion here.

Eliminating optional arbitration and refusing to believe it possible that our Government can ever submit a case to the Council or Assembly so without merit that there could be a unanimous finding against us, the fundamental and most important obligation we would assume by joining the League would be in substance an agreement that we will not go to war against any other member nation until after we have submitted our differences to the Council or Assembly for decision and a published report, but with the right, abundantly reserved, to thereafter go to war—to appeal to the gun and torch—if we should wish to resort to it.

Fifty-two civilized nations in the most solemn manner possible have signified their belief that such a pledge as this would, in practice, make an end of war in the world, even though theoretically the right to resort to it would be reserved.

The time required for investigation of the facts of a dispute would give opportunity for war passions to cool, but, more important, it would give the people of the contending nations an opportunity to weigh the merit and significance of the quarrel against the uncertainty, the horrors and the cost of war, and, yet more important, the delay would result in the forming of a world public opinion which would be focused by the League as was never possible before, against which few nations would have the temerity to fling themselves to destruction.

It should not be difficult for our Government to assume this obligation, for it has to-day treaties with more than twenty nations each containing this provision for delay and investigation before either party shall make war on the other, every one of which has been duly entered into with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States. These have significantly come to be known throughout the world as "Treaties to Promote Peace."

Assuredly we are on solid ground in saying that there is no sound reason why this fundamental obligation of the Covenant of the League of Nations should not be accepted by our Government on its merits, and also because we are already subjected to it in treaties with all the important nations of the world save Russia, Germany and Turkey.

Fifty-two other nations, each as jealous of its liberty and independence as we of ours, have assumed this obligation. Why should America hesitate? Why be afraid?

Consider with me next the remaining, subsidiary obligations.

The first of these relates to the limitations of armaments, and very surely, if it can be given effect, there is no provision of the Covenant that will contribute more toward securing the permanent peace of the world, for all experience serves to show that rivalry in arming inevitably leads it to war.

The League is not given the power to limit the army or navy of any nation, but the Council is directed to formulate plans for the reduction of the armaments of all nations to the lowest point consistent with national and international safety and to submit such plans for the consideration of the various Governments.

Thus, the obligation we should here assume by joining the League would be only to consider the plans which may be proposed, with unrestricted right to accept or reject them, but to be bound by them for ten years if once accepted. Only distrust of ourselves, distrust in the capacity of our own Government to take care of our own interests in accepting such plans can make us hesitate to assume this obligation, and the enthusiasm with which the people and even the Senate of the United States accepted the treaties for naval limitation a year ago assures us that again we are on solid ground in urging the present Administration not to delay entry into the League on account of the responsibilities which this obligation involves.

Fifty-two other nations, great and small, each as jealous of its sovereignty as we of ours, have accepted this obligation—why should America be afraid?

The third obligation is under Article XVI and consists in an agreement to join the other nations in imposing a world-wide economic and social boycott upon any Covenant-breaking member of the League.

The present state of dependence of the nations each upon the other; some for food, some for raw materials of manufacture, and all for markets, renders this the new substitute of the modern world for the savagery of war. If Germany and Austria had known that if Belgium should be invaded, instantly every other country and market in the world would be closed to them for either purchase or sale of every character, they never would have entered upon their desperate enterprise. The statesmen of all nations, the men who speak the last word for or against war, are a unit in declaring confidence that this universal boycott will prove a powerful agency in preventing further wars. Again, fifty-two nations, great and small, have assumed this obligation—why should America hesitate—why be afraid?

But now I come to Article X, which has been so widely proclaimed as a promise of enduring peace and as a certain portent of many wars.

I think it very clear that this article, when read with Article XVI and XVII, renders it necessary for any Government entering the League to assume the possibility, remote though it be, of being at some time obliged to join the other free and honest nations of the world in defending liberty and independence from the assault of the predatory and the false—just as we were obliged to do in 1917 without the League.

But, even this remote possibility of war within the League can come to us under Article X only with the consent of our own representative on the Council, for such a decision under it must be a unanimous one, and with the consent also of our Congress, for it is too clear for discussion that the treaty-making power is subject to the constitutional limitation that only Congress can declare war, and this all the other nations know as well as we and they are dealing with us on this understanding. No reputable lawyer that I have ever heard of thinks to the contrary, outside, of course, of the United States Senate.

But, since there are timid souls who may differ with us, let me say that it is entirely clear that a single sentence stating that in joining the League we interpret Article X as being subject to our constitutional limitation that only Congress can declare war would certainly guard against either legal or moral obligation attaching to any refusal of ours to join in a war commenced within the scope of its terms. There's not a nation in the League nor a person in this country who would object to such a reservation.

But once again. Since this Article X must be discussed on the basis of America having suddenly turned timid, if not craven, even the demagogue shouting—"Send our sons to the shambles of Europe—never"—must be silenced by the vote of the Assembly of the League on Sept. 27, last, which, for the purpose of giving effect to the disarmament provisions of Article VIII directed the Council to prepare a form for "A Regional Treaty of Mutual Guarantee" to be submitted to all the members by the terms of which all obligation of any member to go to the assistance of another under that or any other provision of the Covenant will be limited to nations in the same part of the globe—meaning on the Continent in which the occasion for war shall arise.

When our obligation under this Article X, so luridly pictured as drafting and driving our boys into the shambles of Europe under orders from foreign powers, is thus limited by practical construction and by definite treaty to this side the Atlantic, as every candid critic of the League believed it must be, surely even the most timid of our Little Americans must cease from troubling in the happy release from imaginary fears which will thus be brought to them—for thereby this terrifying article becomes our old familiar friend, the Monroe Doctrine, wearing a not very new face.

And then, there is every prospect that Ireland and Germany will both be safely within the league before the end of another year—"a consummation devoutly to be wished"—among other reasons because it will restore many a statesman to "normalcy" of mind and many a voter to a sane American outlook.

When to all this we add that the first article of the covenant in express terms provides that any nation may withdraw from the league on two years' notice, it is difficult to regard seriously the vehement expressions two years ago of fear that entering the league by our country would involve such complete surrender of our liberty and independence and sovereignty that our lost freedom could be resumed only at the end of long and bloody wars with nations—every one of which would prefer our friendship to that of any other nation under the sun.

These, in my judgment, are the only obligations important enough for us to discuss in considering whether or not our Government should enter the League of Nations. The object of them all is to promote permanent peace; they represent the best thinking of the strongest men of many nations directed to that end; all the other free and honest nations have accepted them; and, therefore, because there is no danger but, on the contrary, much of hope and healing for us and for all the nations in every one of them, our Government should enter the existing league with such reservations as to it may seem wise.

If all this be true, why, you are asking, did the Senate of the United States find so much fault with this covenant of peace?

First of all, it is historically but most unfortunately true that whenever any treaty is sent to the Senate, even by a President of the same party as the majority that body instantly becomes critical, if not hostile. You all remember how the Senate so amended the peace treaties negotiated by Roosevelt and Hay as to destroy them, and how Hay, with characteristic felicity of expression, referred to the members when in action on that occasion as "The Gray Wolves of the Senate."

"'t is true, 't is pity;

And pity 't is, 't is true"

The real difficulty, however, in this case was that the Senators insisted upon reading into the Covenant things that were not there, but which were born of their fear that the treaty was a scheme of cunning European statesmen to manoeuvre our feeble country into a position in which they could make war upon us, which, of course, was the last thing in the world that any of them desired to do. The Senators seemed incapable of realizing that almost every one of the men who helped frame that Covenant had been standing for four years looking into the gulf of despair, each with his country on the brink of it, and most of them with one or more sons lost in it. They seemingly could not realize that these men in framing this League of peace were not pettifogging lawyers writing a petty contract, but that they were statesmen as honorable as themselves, consciously dealing with the greatest problems of all time and consciously writing their own place in history when thus striving to make an end of war—to render it impossible for such a catastrophe as that through which they had just passed to come again to desolate the earth. To them, as to the boys in the trenches, it was a "war to end war." "Never, never must it come again," and in the light of this high purpose the Covenant should be read.

The plain truth is that this League of peace became so promptly immersed in party politics and so shamefully misunderstood and misrepresented in the seething discontent incident to the aftermath of the war that it has never had a fair hearing either in the Senate or by our country, and it is, I repeat, the purpose above all others of this organization for which I am speaking tonight to do what we can to lift it out of party politics and to place it again before our country in a candid, nonpartisan way for reconsideration upon its merits.

"Ours an Enterprise of Hope"

By Robert E. Speer, D. D.

President of the Federal Council of Churches and Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions

[The following article is a portion of Dr. Speer's great address to the Foreign Missions Conference at Bethlehem, Pa., this month. It was delivered in the historic Moravian Church there.]

A MAN may rationally view the missionary undertaking today with a confident and hopeful spirit, on clear grounds that he can describe to other men. We are made hopeful and we communicate hope first of all by grasping the reality of the facts. Let me name only four of these facts—

First is the indisputable fact of the miracle of re-deemed and transformed individual persons. I was not surprised that when, last night at our little Latin-American dinner in New York, Mr. Day tried to report to us, in the brief time that he had allotted to him, his impressions of Mexico, he turned instinctively and irresistibly to the remembrance of individual Christian men and women whom he had met all over the States of Mexico, in whom the miracle of a purified and transformed character had been wrought by the power that goes with the message of the living, transforming Christ.

One wonders, as he talks with some of the young leaders of India today, how they can miss this point, in their new opposition which they are voicing against the low-caste movement, for example, an opposition which is, as a matter of fact, one of the most interesting and perplexing problems in the life of the church in India today. One wonders that some of their young leaders do not see and appraise this miracle of change in individual personal character among these poor outcast folk, dropped through the bottom of human society, who are as nothing, a people who were not until Christ touched them and made them a people who were.

They come thronging back into my own mind tonight, these men and women whom I met across the world this last year, the intellectual peers, some of them, of the best we have in our own land, and the spiritual equals, if not the spiritual superiors. One sees what they were, against what odds they hold their gains from Christ, the power that is pouring out from their lives, drawn from no source except the great original source, and he cannot have any misgivings as he comes home from those living friendships that he has formed with these men and women all over the world, a new order of the Apostles of Christ, as visibly and really re-made as those men whom Christ gathered into His little group years ago and sent out re-made to be the re-makers of the world.

Or take, secondly, the fact of these great tides of changing life and truth that are visibly pulsing through the world. I have quoted many times to friends recently the editorial of Mr. Nateson's paper, "The Indian Social Reformer" in Bombay, on the occasion of the arrest and imprisonment of Mr. Ghandi. Many of you must have become familiar already with these striking words. Mr. Nateson is referring to the impress made by the trial and imprisonment on the thought of India, and he says, "That while it has shaken the faith of some people in the efficacy and morality of non-violence as a political method, it has prompted a much larger number including many who have set themselves for years to counteract the proselytizing work of missionaries to turn to the figure of Christ upon the cross in reverent contemplation. Orthodox Hindus, militant Arya Samagists, devout Mohammedans, and of course, Brahmans, have had their minds turned to Calvary in commenting upon the event. It may be said without exaggeration that the Mahatmi in jail has achieved in a short while what Christian missions had not been able to achieve with all their resources of men and money in a hundred years. He has turned India's face to Christ upon the cross.

One need not pass any judgment on Mr. Nateson's comparisons, but one can rejoice in his positive statement. It was one of the things that interested us most as we passed through India trying to study the movements under the surface of its life, the new standards of judgment which had come, the new courts to which appeals were made. We left Bombay a day or two after Christmas and I remember the leading editorial on Christmas morning in the Bombay "Chronicle," which is, I suppose, the leading Nationalist newspaper in India, in which it justified the ideals that lay behind Mr. Ghandi's life, and the principles on which the Nationalist movement was going forward. The National Congress was in session at Ahmedabad and it was making Mr. Ghandi absolute dictator over Hindus and Mohammedans alike, mind you; and the Bombay "Chronicle" was justifying the departure from old ideals and the acceptance of new conceptions, not by any appeal to Hindu scriptures, by any citation of Hindu Dieties, but by appealing straight to the spirit and principles of Christ.

A friend sent me the other day the report just issued on the subject of prostitution in that great city. One read it with many different grounds for interest, but with none that equalled the interest he felt in it because it was illustrating the great shift in moral conceptions, due to the transformation of ideals and of judgments controlling the common thought of men, some of whom were unaware how far they were being brought under the dominance of the mind of Christ. A hundred illustrations we could cite here this evening by putting our minds together, of the way in which the thought of Jesus is penetrating the life of the world, and the mind of Christ becoming the standard by which all the life of mankind must be judged.

Or take, third, the striking fact, as one looks back, say over a hundred years of history, of the way in which, very slowly, but still very surely, we have been subjugating the conscience of nations to the ideal of missionary obligation. When the East India Company was at work, it made no missionary apologies for its acts. If it wanted to take land it took it without any pretext that it was doing it as a trustee or for the benefit of the people of whom it was taking possession.

The selfish principle felt no need of apologizing for itself a hundred years ago. How great was the change that had taken place when the Congo Free State was set up, for example, barely a generation ago, when old political ideals had ceased to be any longer possible, when nations could not think any longer, or act any longer under old categories that their moral sense had not questioned before. And then turn today to the mandates under which the different nations have been assigned by the League of Nations territory taken over from Germany, recognizing a new principle of national trusteeship and of missionary duty and reflect what influences have brought about this change in the common minds of men with regard to the relationships of nations, within a hundred years.

Or take only one other fact which can be put in either one of two ways—the growing consciousness of men that we have in the Christian gospel the only hope of the world, or put otherwise, the growing despair of men that there is any other hope of the world unless we have that hope in Christ.

I will not linger on the facts longer. If there were time we could multiply them, the indisputable facts which a man needs imply to look at and grasp, in order to have his feet set on a safe road to sure confidence and hope with regard to the steady progress and the sure ultimate triumph of the reign of Christ over the life of the world.

In the second place a man who is, or wants to be, hopeful today can justify his hope to himself and others by the apprehension of a true perspective, by seeing more accurately than we have been accustomed to see the days of a hundred years ago when our enterprise began. I was reading this last week in two volumes of the Missionary Magazine of the old "Massachusetts Missionary Society" in the decade prior to the incorporation of the American Board, and those old discolored, time-worn books brought back with great vividness to one's mind the air that men breathed in those early years of the last century when the modern missionary enterprise in America began. All that one ever needs to do in a discouraged mood is to turn back and read of the actual missionary sources, and enter into the actual spirit of men in the days when the great hearts launched this missionary enterprise at the beginning.

We stand in the midst of the difficulties and problems of our own day, and we often come at them child-fashion, as though we were the first men that were ever called upon to deal with them. Why, all this has been the stuff of missionary administration from the beginning, and our problems now are not one bit more difficult, and our resources are far nearer and richer than those with which the founders had to deal a century, even half a century ago. What we need to dispel a great deal of our cheap despair is simply an accurate knowledge of the earlier terms of comparison. Let any man go back and measure those days against our days and he will thank God for the way and the distance we have been led.

Think of the change that we ourselves have seen, those of us who have been a generation now in this missionary enterprise, both inside and without. We have seen this issue of the native church and the mission grow up within the last thirty years. How much happier are the men who live in the generation in which that issue has become acute than the men who lived in a generation when that issue was dead. We have seen, ourselves, an amazing growth of the spirit of tolerance across the world. I contrast again and again what I saw in the Mohammedan world twenty-six years ago with what I saw in the Mohammedan world this year. And while of course the eddies have come again, and will come yet once more as we are experiencing them now in Northwestern Persia, where six months ago the stream was running almost without a hindrance, but where now, due to the Turkish successes, a little back eddy has set in, the stream moves on. All one needs to do is to look over a little longer time, and he sees how far and fast the great steady current has borne on.

And outside the missionary enterprise also, almost all of us here can remember the day when an American Secretary of State said that an American missionary when he went abroad forfeited his political rights and became a political pariah on the face of the earth. We heard an American Secretary of State saying that within our own time. No man will talk that way in our day, nor in our children's day.

I say all that men need to do is simply to look back and see accurately the conditions of the times that have gone and then to grasp the facts of our own day, and many of the clouds will go out of his sky and the surety of a great hope deepen in his heart.

In the third place, we can assure our own hope and propagate the spirit of hope in the churches at home by being ready ceaselessly to enter into larger calls of duty. I wonder whether a great deal of our despair has not been due to our over-familiarity with too long accepted boundaries to our tasks, whether again and again energies that were adequate to a task when we assailed it have not died down simply for the reason that we took on no new task. The very preservation of those energies, not to speak of their enlargement, was dependent upon our courageously assuming new and larger obligations.

One sympathizes deeply with those European Missionary Organizations who are compelled by financial condition to curtail their work and to contract their fields. I never saw anything sadder this last year than missionary stations being abandoned, and great missionary organizations that only a few years ago led all of the missionary work of the world, closing missionary enterprises and reducing their work. Let us hold fast just as long as we can here in our American societies to the principle of expanding duty. I think back over the history of our own Board, for example, and I remember again and again when we had come to the point where our work was beyond our resources, where there was no way whatsoever to enlarge our resources except to enlarge our work and make sure that our work could still be more in excess of our resources than it had been before.

And I think back when Korea was occupied and the Philippine Islands and the Province of Hunan; and I think now over our proposed occupation of unreached areas of the Province of Yunnan and our taking over work in northern Mesopotamia, and our new tasks in Northeastern Persia and Northwestern Afghanistan. It is not because there are any surplus resources for these new tasks, but because we believe that unless we assume larger tasks we shall not continue equal to the tasks that we have already assumed.

And collectively, how urgent is the appeal of these larger tasks in this day. There is the task of a more adequate geographical occupation of the world. Since coming back I have heard men say that the old missionary call is not valid any more, and that we cannot go any longer to the students of this land with the appeal that we used to address to them in the earlier days, of tremendous unoccupied fields still waiting for men to come out, for pioneers. There are huge unoccupied areas in the world to-day, great geographical areas unoccupied, great strata in the lives of nations unoccupied as yet, and great typical problems standing out in the nation, in the Church even in the missionary enterprise, with which the Christian Church has not yet begun adequately to grapple. This racial problem, for example, is one of them. Do we intend to surrender it to men of the school of Madison, Grant and Lathrop Stoddard? Their books have got a vogue and a power in America that no Christian books dealing with the race problem under Christian principles have as yet acquired. Does the Christian Church mean deliberately to turn its back on the problem of race, and surrender that problem to men who are going to mislead humanity into the morass into which some men with their false interpretations of history and of human life are leading many to-day.

I say again, there are as great calls to the Christian Church to-day to pass out into new and larger tasks as the Christian Church has ever had in any earlier generation; and that to feed the fires of a blazing hope in the Christian Church to-day we must be courageous enough to grapple with the new and larger tasks.

And last of all, we shall preserve our own hope and foster a deeper and a richer hope in the hearts of other men, if we will keep our grasp unrelaxed upon the great spiritual foundations, the sufficiency of our Gospel, and the adequacy of the power of our risen and living Lord.

There is creeping very subtly into many of our schools and colleges to-day—and outside of our schools and colleges, too, you can find it without difficulty—the view of the missionary enterprise which Frick sets forth in a book that is criticised in a book review by Dr. Micht, in the current number of the International Review of Missions, the view that we have been familiar with from the beginning, that Christianity is only one of a number of rival religions, which are to single together and pool their best, so that the collection of their best will be the ultimate faith of mankind, instead of the old idea, exclusive, if you please, that the Christianity of the New Testament is an absolute faith. Our knowledge of it is not absolute. We need all the help we can put to understand the faith, but the faith is an absolute faith, with one Lord, the only name given under heaven and among men, the only way and truth and life.

If there is to come a parting of the ways in the days just ahead of us, it must come, for the only missionary enterprise that will endure and prevail, must rest in the future on the same foundations on which it has rested in the past. It is not a quest for something that Christianity does not possess. It is an effort to share with the world, the things that Christianity does contain, that to be sure we ourselves do not adequately apprehend, of which we cannot set up ourselves as being the exclusive interpretation, but that are there, not needing to be supplemented, or corrected, or enriched. It is all there, in Our Lord, Jesus Christ, Himself, the one sufficient Savior, the adequate Light of the world, the full Desire of the nations.

A More Unified Approach to Christian Education

By Robert L. Kelly, D. D.

Head of the Council of Church Boards of Education and the Association of American Colleges

[The following was delivered as an address at the Annual Meeting of the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, Indianapolis, Indiana.]

First of all the churches must be jarred from their state of self-complacency. It is true that much has been accomplished within the last few years in the field of Christian education. We may point to the enlarging work of the Council of Church Boards of Education in affiliation with the Association of American Colleges; to the recent marriage of the International Sunday School Association and the Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations; to the hundreds of millions of dollars which have been contributed freely by the members of the churches since the war to the denominational colleges; and to the constantly rising tide of enrollment for the past three years in the theological seminaries.

But the failures of the church in Christian education are tragic enough to keep us all humble. Many agencies to-day, alas, in numerous instances in increasing measure—denominational colleges, theological seminaries, boards of education, and even interdenominational councils—are in a perpetual state of armed neutrality. Many have been surrounded since their founding and are still surrounded with barbed wire entanglements.

The churches need to repent for their educational sins of omission and commission. In the State of California the religious forces are now so repenting. The religious world was startled a few days ago with the announcement that the Superior Court had handed down a decision making the King James version for the Bible a sectarian book, and, therefore, preventing its purchase by school libraries or by any other agency supported by public funds. I hold in my hand a certified copy of the decision with a covering letter by the clerk of the Supreme Court of California. The decision of the Superior Court is unanimous. It sets forth that there is just one point at issue; namely, whether the King James version of the Bible is a sectarian book, and calls attention to the requirement of the State Constitution and to the Political Code which provides that it shall be the duty of boards of school trustees "to exclude from schools and school libraries all books, publications, or papers of a sectarian, partisan or denominational character." The argument of the Court is that "since controversies have waged for centuries over the authenticity of the various versions of the Bible, each sect insisting that its version is the only truly inspired book" and that since the King James version is recognized by Protestant churches as the official version, it is within the meaning of the law a sectarian book within the meaning of the Political Code. The decision may be considered ridiculous, but it is based professedly upon the centuries of contention of the churches.

It is a hopeful situation that the religious forces of California, now that it may be too late, are bringing forth fruits meet for repentance. All with one accord, they are appealing to the Legislature—Protestants, Catholics, Christian Scientists, Jews—urging that a definition of the meaning of sectarian be enacted before the case goes to the Supreme Court, which will prevent any standard version of the Bible from being considered as sectarian. How blessed it is for brethren to dwell together in unity; and under the threat of an adverse decision by a Supreme Court, they can so dwell.

In the second place, the churches must recognize their educational function. There is no denying the fact that in many cases the educational arm has been paralyzed through disuse. Certainly there must be no less emphasis on evangelism at home and abroad, national and international, but the churches must learn to think and speak the language of education. Our boys and girls are speaking that language and they understand it and approve it; the language of the laboratory, the classroom and the athletic field; the language of science, of sociology, of evolution. They must be taught that Jesus was the world's greatest teacher; that in a not unimportant sense, He was the world's first great biologist. The world needs to be saved and it also needs to be taught. If it is taught aright, every field of education must be permeated with the spirit of Christ. If this is done, it will have to be done by the churches. It will not be done officially by the State.

A few of the denominations are keenly alive to this situation. A notable illustration is found among the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. That church is not hiding its educational light under a bushel. It affords a striking illustration of a new and widespread awakening to the problems of Christian education. The awakening did come too soon for the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. During their seventy-five years of history, they have lost no less than ninety-nine colleges and universities and one hundred and twenty-six academies. Perhaps many of these educational adventures were ill advised, but it is a fearful wreckage of educational agencies within three generations. The salvation of the churches as well as of the children depends upon the diffusion of the spirit of Christ into every phase of educational activity; and only as this is done, will a prophetic vision be developed among our young people against the demands of a new day.

Churches must see their educational problem steadily and see it whole. There is no institution, no denomination, no international council that now sees the whole problem of Christian education. It has taken just fifty years for the enterprise of higher education under the auspices of a single denomination to come together on a united program in one of the Mississippi Valley States. A most unusual, perplexing and distracting courtship preceded the marriage of the Sunday School agencies referred to a moment ago; and strangely enough, at the very first convention after the marriage was consummated, indeed at the marriage feast attended by thousands of the friends most interested, the chairman of the committee on education of the new council took occasion to threaten the existence, not of the Sunday schools but of the church colleges. "If the church colleges do not do their duty," said this speaker, "they must be put out of business."

Perhaps the Episcopal Church has advanced farthest among the Protestant communions in their effort to unify their forces of Christian education. With the Episcopalians, this has become organic union. They do see their problem steadily and see it whole. The Presbyterian Church, North, is in process of uniting its educational agencies as well and to the same end; but as we know full well among the churches in general there are General Boards and College Boards and Sunday School Boards and Missionary Educational Boards and Publication Boards, and each is putting on drives or campaigns with little or no reference to the others.

Of course the organic unity of the educational organization is not necessary. What is required is unity of purpose, community of feeling, the spirit of co-operation. In very few of the churches are we now giving to individual missions and detached enterprises. Most of us have learned to give to missions. Some of us have ceased to make the distinction between home and foreign missions. But in the field of Christian education we are still interested in detached institutions and agencies. There is as yet no league of Christian education, or organization, or council. We have not yet seen our problem whole.

The churches must assume larger responsibilities for Christian Education in the schools. This means the Sunday schools, the week day schools, the private schools, the public schools. At a meeting of professors of girls' schools under private management in the United States, it was the universal testimony of the members present that since the war a generation of girls is found in the schools alert beyond anything heretofore known to the deeper things of the spirit. The churches must capitalize this hunger and thirst after righteousness in the schools. By authority of recent official action by the great central standardizing agencies of the country, the North Central Association, the Southern Association, and the authorities of literally hundreds of colleges, the responsibility for adequate Bible study in American education is now placed upon the schools. These educational institutions and agencies are saying that when the schools teach the Bible as effectively as they teach other subjects, Bible literature will be accepted for admission to college. The college examination board in New York has declared that when the schools are teaching Bible and presenting students for examination, examination questions will be issued by them. The eyes of the leaders of Christian education are now on the schools.

The colleges must reconsecrate themselves to the task of Christian education. For generations they have been doing much. They must do much more. Here is the record of one small college placed in my hands within the week. This is a college whose enrollment at this moment is four hundred and fifty-five regular liberal art students. During its history it has had nine thousand students. This little college of one hundred years or more counts among its former students eighteen hundred ordained ministers of the gospel, forty-two moderators of the Presbyterian General Assembly, ninety-one presidents of colleges or universities, two thousand teachers, engineers, chemists and business men; four Cabinet members of the United States, eleven United States Senators, ten Governors of States, ninety-one United States Congressmen, nearly three hundred State legislators, twenty-one judges of the State Supreme Courts, two judges of the Federal District Courts, one hundred and forty-four judges of county courts, more than thirteen hundred attorneys at law, seven hundred doctors of medicine.

It is hardly worth while to expect to put this kind of college out of business. No one can say that it has served a larger purpose in training ministers than in training Christian laymen, who became United States Senators, Governors of States, members of Cabinets, and judges of courts. The denominational college has had a large program. It will continue to have this program.

At the same time, the denominational college meets an unparalleled opportunity at this moment and an unprecedented demand as well that it enlarge its work in the technical field of religious education. How can the schools teach the Bible unless they have trained teachers; and how can they have trained teachers unless colleges inaugurate adequate training. There is growing demand for approved courses in religious education.

And there is a growing disposition to meet this demand. Within the last few weeks a few venturesome souls in the faculties of the colleges in the Connecticut Valley conceived the idea of holding a conference in behalf of religious education in the colleges. It was believed by the most optimistic that forty members from these colleges might respond. When the day for the convention came, one hundred and sixty professors were present and the conference is reported of far-reaching consequence.

The theological seminaries must become educational institutions. Speaking of them as a class, they are not now such. They are training schools in fact if not in name. Many of them poorly equipped in personal and material resources. Of eighty-three hundred students in the theological seminaries in the United States and Canada last year, forty-five hundred at some time had attended college. Only three thousand were college graduates; and of this number fully one-third were graduates of sub-standard colleges—colleges that have not been approved by the agencies of educational standardization. In other words, one-fourth of our ministers now in process of preparation in the seminaries are full-fledged college graduates. In this statement, no reckoning is made of the large number of students in the scores of training schools which do not call themselves seminaries. The churches must equip the seminaries so that they may make a real contribution to the work of Christian education. The preacher is the greatest leader of the church and if he fails to appreciate the power of the church's educational function the result will continue to be tragic indeed.

The various agencies of Christian education must be Christianized to the extent that they show a disposition to yield. Up to the present our psychology has been the psychology of the campaign, of the drive, of the program of extension. The time has come for adjustment, for distribution of functions, for apportionment of tasks. The time has come for yielding. In the field of Christian education shall we not put to the test the declaration of Jesus, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

The time has come for active unselfish co-operation. The friends of Christian education must get together, and they must stay together, think and work and pray together. The college cannot say to the Sunday school, "I have no need of thee." The Sunday school cannot say to the seminary, "I have no need of thee." The seminary cannot say to the rest of the educational world, "I have no need of you." Alas, they can say this and they have said it and are saying it in many instances now. But the time has come to arrest this policy of negation, this blighting policy of isolation, this spirit of sectarianism, partisanship, preference and jealousy. The time has come for the churches to be aroused to their opportunity and their sacred duty.

Not long since the editor in chief of one of the great weekly newspapers of America, which is recognized as secular, and which has never been accused of being religious in summing up its conviction as to its own place in the life of America, said: "Such an affirmation is, of course, essentially religious. It means the worship of a God symbolized not as Power, but as Understanding and Love." And then it added: "Weekly publications with limited circulations are, of course, pitifully inadequate spokesmen of so vast and pretentious an idea. Its only sufficient spokesmen are the schools and the churches. But the schools and the churches are not aroused either to the grave existing danger to civilization or to their own opportunity and function. Some time soon they will wake up. Until that time comes very little may help. Even an insignificant weekly can do something to keep alive in those members of the community who believe in the power of truth to set men free."

What, therefore, a weekly newspaper dares to proclaim as its function for this day and generation, that I declare unto you as the educational function of the churches.

An Open Letter from the Hartford Council of Churches

Dear Brethren in the Ministry:

The world is confronted by a most serious crisis. No man of thoughtful mind can blind himself to the disintegrating forces that threaten civilization. It is no time for easy optimism but for a stern and resolute facing of facts.

Another world war is possible. Some say it is being prepared. If it should come it would be destructive on a scale hitherto unknown. It might compass the utter collapse of modern civilization.

Certain it is that historic causes of conflict still persist in national rivalries and aggressive policies. These will have their inevitable issue so long as the war system remains as the court of last appeal.

The system, as the instrument of aggression, is condemned at the bar of public opinion. The spirit of humanity denounces it as intolerable. It is contrary to the fundamental principles of our democracy. It violates the heart of Christianity. As men; as citizens and as Christians we seek to abolish it as a system and to provide a proper substitute.

At such a time as this the church of Jesus Christ cannot be silent. Over against the system that so readily leads to war she not only urges her ideals of brotherhood for the individual, but as a constructive agent in human society she must promote an organization of mankind in harmony with her ideals and lending itself to the spirit of the Master.

Civilization finds itself in default because nations in their relations to each other are not thoroughly organized on the basis of justice and good will. Our civilization breaks down at the national boundaries. The mind of Christ cannot function fully or effectively under the present order.

Some way must be found to base all human relations, not only personal, but now particularly national, on a foundation where justice shall be the accepted standard. The will to good must be given a chance throughout the entire scale of human interests. Deference to the law of right inherent in man, now generally accredited by individuals, is the unmistakable requirement for international stability and peace.

Our Christian conviction is urgent that the United States shall find ways of co-operation with other nations to avert the likelihood of war. A permanent relation should be established corresponding to the vital interests already actually involved. It is disheartening and unworthy of our noblest ideals for our nation to stand aloof when the needs of humanity are so pressing.

We commend the proposed participation of the United States in the Permanent Court of International Justice. We approve the informal co-operation our Government is now giving to the League of Nations along the lines of humanitarian interests. We urge the importance of some properly constituted association as an instrument of international understanding and co-operation. We should welcome a conference of nations, called by our President, to consider ways and means of reconstruction in a sadly disordered world.

We are convinced that something must be done and that right speedily to solve the grave and menacing problems and to bring mankind to a new level of reliance on the principles of justice interpreted in this free and open conference and maintained by co-operation.

Thirty ministers of Hartford and vicinity at the Hartford Ministers' Meeting on Dec. 18 entered into a general agreement to present to their congregations on the Sunday following Christmas, Dec. 31st, the subject of the World Crisis and Christian Responsibility. We hope that at an early date you will do likewise. A State-wide movement will have great significance. The statement above is submitted as suggesting the importance of the theme. Use it freely if it appeals to you.

CHARLES F. CARTER, Chairman
Immanuel Congregational Church.

ERNEST deF. MIEL,
Trinity Episcopal Church.

JOHN F. JOHNSTONE,
First Presbyterian Church.

L. H. DORCHESTER,
First Methodist Church.

J. N. LACKEY,
South Baptist Church

December 23rd, 1922.
Hartford Council of Churches,
27 Lewis St., Hartford, Conn.

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

Week-Day Religious Education*

THIS large volume is the most thorough discussion of the whole field of religious education by the pastors and church teachers in week-day classes and in the public schools. No one interested in the great problem—and it is one of the realest problems we have—and who wants to know just what has been done, and what the students of the problem believe should be done, can afford to be without this book.

The first seventy pages of the book are devoted to a thorough survey of the achievements in the various States of the Nation. This survey by Mr. Erwin L. Shaver is a record of most astounding progress. The writer of this page has been interested in religious education all his life, but he must confess he had no idea how widely week-day religious education was being practiced. This survey deals almost entirely with the activities of some three hundred and seventy public schools from which Mr. Shaver got data. Under fifty tables, with such headings as: Amount of Religious Instruction per Week for Each Pupil; Oversight by Public School Officials; Relation of the Sunday School and Church; Supervision by Pastors; Part Time and Full Time; and Percentage of Attendance, the whole system is most helpfully discussed, and the methods of many individual schools given as examples. The whole problem, when it comes to the Church approaching the school-master with the proposition of religious education in the public school is most succinctly and accurately put by Mr. Shaver in the following paragraph:

"In one of these latter cities the attitude of the public school head is worthy of attention. He takes the stand that it is the duty of the public school to take charge of the entire time of the child (aside from that directed by the family life) and fill that time with wholesome social activities properly supervised; hence a long school day. This attitude is not limited to this one place but is found in a greater or less degree in many of the more advanced school systems. What is more, it is in such places that the competition, if we may call it such without appearing to be unfair, is not only a matter of time, but of the character of the activity itself. The pupils do not care to leave their public school work for the less interesting class in religion. We must bear in mind the fact that in its appeal to initiative, social impulses and self-directed effort the modern public school does not rely upon truant officers and the old type of disciplinary measures to secure results. It is this very appeal to the active nature of the child which leads him rather than drives him and produces a love for rather than an aversion to the school-room. This changed nature of the work of the public school is evident in the plans and purposes of the heads of our public schools. In conversations with these leaders the surveyor found repeatedly a new note sounded, namely, education for character and citizenship, which utilizes the best methods in educational theory and makes close approach to the very thing for which the church has long been standing. The more important fact is not so much, it seems, the crowding of the time schedule as the fact of a new purpose and a new method in public education. The latter as well as the former must be taken into consideration in studying the question of relationships between the public school and the new movement in religious education."

The aims of Week-Day Religious Education are discussed by fifteen experts and here an interesting divergence of opinion is apparent at once. One group advocated the teaching of the Bible primarily, trusting it to do its own work. The other group placed its emphasis upon behavior, social living and the expression of the Biblical spirit in life. To quote the summary on page 157: "The first group expressed convictions as follows: Store the mind with Biblical material and it will have its inevitable results. Secure a large increase of memory deposit. Get across as much of the Bible as you can in the one hour a week. Make information and memory two of the aims. Some suggested definite, clear, dogmatic teaching of the Bible and perpetuation of the Christian religion as interpreted by each Church. The emphasis of the other group was upon improving society; developing habits, attitudes and appreciations that would result in definitely Christian conduct; social living; Christian citizenship; behavior; social control by folks whose lives are motivated by religious ideals; to bring the experience of religion into more close contact with the week-day experience of the children." The weight of opinion seems to be on the side of those who desired to teach the Bible and allow it to do its own work.

The balance of this most valuable book consists of essays dealing with every phase of religious education—twenty-five papers altogether—by such men as Professor George A. Coe, Hugh Hartsonne, Professor Benjamin S. Winchester, Professor George A. Stewart, Dr. Jesse B. Davis and Walter Albion Ignious. There are thirty pages of diagrams. There is a report of the Con-

*A Survey and Discussion of Activities and Problems, edited by Henry T. Cope; published by the George H. Doran Company, New York. Price $2.00.

INTERNATIONAL LESSON

The Rich Man and Lazarus

By Rev. Stephen A. Norton

[Note: THE CHRISTIAN WORK has been anxious for some time to have the International Sunday School lessons treated by the ablest man that could be found. Happily not only has it found one man, but several. Arrangements have been made with the Pilgrim Press of Boston to use each week the notable expositions of the Monday Club of Boston. This club is made up of several of the most outstanding preachers of New England. Every year they contribute short sermons on the International lessons. These are bound into a volume which has become an annual and highly valued institution, "The Monday Club Sermons." We are sure our readers will greatly appreciate these expositions—the best that can be found by such men as Doctors Barton, Jefferson, Bridgman, Brown, Dunning, Pierce, Sperry, Griffis, Bushnell, Page and Clarke. Anyone wishing the whole series in advance can secure the volume from the Pilgrim Press, Boston, Mass.—Editor.]

LUKE 16: 19-31

"Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed."

Luke 16: 26.

THE consummate art as well as the vital message of this parable finds full expression in these words. The story leads almost imperceptibly but inevitably to this occasion. It is like a path one follows, through groves which obscure the scenery, at times over levels or even declivities; but when he reaches the height and looks back he sees that the path led all the way toward just this point. Jean Ingelow's beautiful and pathetic poem, "Divided," itself a parable, is like this parable of Our Lord. It is the story of two friends walking in the meadow with clasped hands, one on either side of a tiny rivulet. The rivulet broadens and becomes a brook, and they unclasp hands but still talk together. But the brook becomes a river, and at last the tidal harbor of ships, and the friends are forever divided:—

Glitters the dew and shines the river,
Up comes the lily and dries her bell;
But two are walking apart forever,
And wave their hands in a mute farewell.

The tiny rivulet was the beginning of a great gulf fixed.

So we follow the story of a widening gulf.

Here were the rich man and the beggar as we first catch glimpse of them, separated indeed, but by a crevice which might have been quickly crossed—at least from the side of the rich man. How small a thing for him to step to his door before which lay a fellow mortal sick and hungry; how easily he might have supplied the most pressing need, recognizing the human relationship made the more obvious and real by want! But he kept his own side, the side of abundance and elegance and arrogant self-satisfaction. It is not suggested that this man was profligate or vile or had robbed the poor. He had simply ignored the poor. The starving beggar at his door was no concern of his. Let him share with the dogs if he could the scraps thrown on the garbage heap. The poor was divided from his neighbor.

We go on with the parable, and we find the gulf widening at the gateway of the cemetery. "It came to pass, that the beggar died." Well, what of it? Who cares? Bury him in the Potter's field and have done with it. The town, per force, will pay for a cheap box. "And the rich man also died, and was buried." He had a funeral; he was "entombed." See the procession moving in stately order through the streets; count the carriages; note what tribute is paid to "our distinguished fellow citizen" who was habitually arrayed during life in purple and fine linen, and who goes to his grave with solemn obsequies befitting his station. Rear over him the splendid marble shaft for which provision has been made in his will.

But we did not see from this side what is beyond the Potter's field and the gorgeous monument. We did not hear the rustle of the angels' wings. Jesus lifts the veil, and lo, the gulf has widened far. The veil is not lifted to satisfy our curiosity about details of the future life, but rather to reveal the truth that life goes on in its chosen way. The rich man is selfish still; he is thinking only of his personal wants and their gratification; for he has not found in the new surroundings the means to satisfy his tastes and desires. And yonder afar and at rest is Lazarus, "comforted."

We shall miss the deep meaning of this story if we spend our time trying to learn from it the exact status of those who have passed into the experiences beyond this life. The parable itself explicitly teaches that. Jesus was interested in the right use of opportunity here. To enforce the necessity of that he suggests in broad outline and in figurative language something of the inevitable connection of the present with the future. He uses language which his Jewish hearers understood. "Abraham's bosom" means little to us; it meant much to them. But the difference between the peace and the pangs here portrayed appeals to us. If the "flame" of which the rich man complains can have no material reality, the fires of remorseful memory are sufficiently real. And especially vivid is the picture of the wide separation and the impassable gulf. That voice saying, "Son, remember," must hush any feeling of injustice done Dives. One use of a future life must be to rectify the apparent injustices of this. Memory, going over the course of cold indifference in the presence of suffering that might have been relieved, can make no complaint of its award. Dives makes none. Thomas Hood tells the story of a selfish woman who in a dream saw herself in her past neglect, and saw also the faces of the poor she might have helped:—

Each pleading look, that long ago
 I scanned with a heedless eye,
 Each face was gazing as plainly there
 As when I passed it by.
 Woe, woe for me if the past should be
 Thus present when I die.

With memory and conscience awake there is no need of other "flame." Conscience and memory must approve an award that has been freely chosen. Character is what we have made ourselves, it is not changed by a decree. It is not death but life which decides destiny. What one has made himself by his use of opportunity, by the way in which he has met the appeals along life's path, by the reaction of his soul to his surroundings—that is destiny. One who has hardened his heart in the presence of human sorrow, has cared nothing for the suffering of the needy, has lived only to enjoy his "good things," careless about those who suffer, has written his own destiny with the free hand of choice. We reap what we sow; we build our own prisons or palaces; we have no just complaint to make of the situation into which our own choices have led us.

The award of character is not only just, it is inevitable. There is a great gulf fixed between selfishness and loving service which may not be bridged by wishes. One may not live his life of careless indifference and find himself at the end of his journey where the path of struggle and sacrifice for the good would have led him. Diverging paths lead to different goals. Character made by the choices of the years is not changed in a moment; the gulf between it and character of the opposite kind is not easily crossed. We are not thinking about any arbitrary decree of God which has purposely made an impassable gulf. We believe with Paul that nothing can separate us from the love of God, and that no gulf is too wide for him to pass over. But we are thinking of what is everywhere observed among men, that character tends to permanence, and destiny is linked with it.

What divine grace in the long eons of the future may be able to do for souls steeped in selfishness and sin we may not say; but surely we may say that a character of loving trust and one of arrogant egotism do not belong together here or elsewhere. Between them in the nature of things is a great gulf fixed. Professor William James in his great chapter on "Habit" is more insistent on this truth than are most theologians when he says, "The hell to be endured hereafter, of which theology tells us, is no worse than the hell we make for ourselves in this world by habitually fashioning our characters in the wrong way. . . . We are spinning our own fates, good or evil, and never to be undone."

Must we leave it so—"never to be undone"? I cannot think his parable gives warrant to that word. The gulf between good and evil is indeed fixed forever. The way back along that gulf we do not see. It may be there is no way back. And yet I think the parable we are studying gives a glimmer of light in that direction. We must remember it is a parable, a story to illustrate a truth. The man on the wrong side of the gulf is in "Hades," not in a final hell. And there must be something good left in him, else why his plea on behalf of his brothers—the first intimation of anything else than selfishness in his soul? Perhaps divine grace may yet bring a drop of water to make that seed of unselfishness grow. We may not dogmatize in the interpretation of this obscure parable, but the plea of Dives that his brothers may receive more light on the way would seem to have in it something beyond a complaint of injustice done himself.

But at best the plea of Dives for his brothers is mistaken; it has no basis in reality. Not more light, but more life those brothers need, even as he had needed it; more of the life of compassionate fellowship with God and good. There is light enough to lead men in the path of loving service. "They have Moses and the prophets." Nay, they have written on their consciences the message of the prophets—"What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" It was just that Dives had done. His brothers might do it if they would. No help in the performance of such duty would come to them from muttering spirits of the underworld. What God requires, what character demands, what destiny depends upon is the use of the light we have in loyal service of God in the use of the opportunities he gives us for human help. There need be no gulf between our souls and duty. It is not necessary to know all that the future has of marvel or surprise in order to know that right is right, that God is love, and that kindness is his law.

The gulf whose reality is obvious, and of whose broadening depths all should be aware, is that between love and selfishness, between kindness and cruelty, between ease and effort for the good. A life devoted to self-interest, intent only on the "good things" which may be secured and used for personal gratification, heedless of larger interests of the soul and of the world—such a life is following a path which diverges more and more from the way of righteousness and peace. Between it and the way of the doer of the will of God a growing gulf is fixed. None need wait till the gulf is impassable before it is recognized. Every cry of need across the broadening chasm is warning as well as plea for help. It is the pleading voice of the old prophet, "O come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord." It is the gracious warning of Jesus, "He that would save his life shall lose it."

So we come back to recognize here and now the gulf, which here and now may be crossed, between privilege and privation. Here it is, the gulf between wealth and want, between power and penury, between the haves and have-nots of our human world. Nobody with eyes can ignore the gulf and its significance. Here are riches absorbed in sumptuous living, with overflowing abundance for table and for travel and for display. And here is grinding poverty, striving for enough to keep soul and body together in decency. We need not confine our gaze to individual cases of such contrast; we may think of society, meant to be a brotherhood but become the arena of struggle between classes, with the strong always in the ascendant and the weak always going to the wall. It is the broadening chasm of which we are thinking, and which must be bridged, rather, healed, for the future of society itself as well as of the souls composing it. How shall it be closed up unless power uses its privilege of noblesse oblige? Not glorying in opportunity for the sake of selfish gratification, but using opportunity for the healing of society's sores and the cementing of human bonds of brotherhood—this is the hope of rich and poor alike, of employer as of employe, of capital as well as of labor. The chasm must be closed. The powerful must use their power for all. If this nation could not live half slave and half free in days gone by, no more can it in days to come. Brotherliness on the part of all who have power must supplant selfishness and greed of personal gain. Dives must share with Lazarus, not as a dole of charity, but as the recognition of human right.

One cannot discuss Dives and his relation to Lazarus in these days without thinking of the helpless peoples holding out their hands to us for bread and common comforts. Yonder are the survivors of persecution and massacre in the Near East, with no apparent hope save America. Nor is it for a day they must share our food and warmth. Those orphans must be fed and sheltered until they may care for self and go about the work of life. The remnants of the oldest church in Christendom must be saved as seed-corn for future harvests of righteousness in their land. Shall they share our abundance now? That was the question answered in the parable with scorn and indifference. And these are but examples of many others who look this way for succor.

And what of the people who are starving for the bread of life? We have the knowledge of a God of grace and mercy and peace, and multitudes have it not. Shall they share our privilege? Shall they also sit at the Lord's table and find their hunger and their thirst assuaged? It is for the people of privilege to answer. And answering they decree their own destiny. For none can keep the treasure of God who will not share it with others. Heaven is possessed by being dispensed. "There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty." To go forth in service for the sorrowing is to find ourselves not only united with them in bonds of love, but with all the good and great who rejoice in the eternal kingdom of service. It is to share in closest fellowship the joy of Jesus.

STEPHEN A. NORTON.

The Churches and the Arbuckle Case

(Continued from page 98.)

to be the judgment of the religious and social forces of the country.

Mr. Hays made a full statement to the committee explaining that his action had been taken wholly upon his own personal responsibility, without pressure from those who were financially interested in the Arbuckle films, because he did not feel that he ought to stand in the way of Arbuckle's "making good" in case the opportunity should come. Mr. Hays carefully explained also that this did not mean the "reinstatement" of Mr. Arbuckle in the employment of the motion picture producers.

For the Federal Council of the Churches, Rev. Samuel McCrea Cavern, one of the General Secretaries (who attended in the absence of the Very Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, the Federal Council's representative upon the Committee on Public Relations) declared that if the motion picture producers really cared at all for the confidence of the church people of the country they should neither release the Arbuckle films already in existence nor employ him as a star in future films. Similar expressions were made by Mr. John P. Moore, representing the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A., and by representatives of many other organizations.

The full statement made public by the Committee is as follows:

"The Committee on Public Relations, having received from Mr. Hays a report on the Arbuckle matter, is impressed with the sincerity and genuineness of his motives in showing a willingness to allow every one a chance to go to work and make good if he can. The committee, however, does not believe that there should be any action taken which would result in bringing Roscoe Arbuckle again

A few churches have already adopted this book for their services

RESPONSIVE SCRIPTURES

(for Worship in Church and Home)

Cloth, $1.25

By Robert Cluett

Author of "Day by Day with the Master" and "Every Morning"

A foreword by Dr. S. Parkes Cadman states, in part: "Mr Cluett has made an admirable selection in this volume. . . . It should be used for domestic as well a public devotion. . . . Pastors, teachers and religious educators may employ this lectionary as the basis for their work."

"I have looked over RESPONSIVE SCRIPTURES and am delighted with it. I am sure that any church using it will find their service enriched—I can commend the book heartily to any looking for a new responsive service."—Rev. Edward A. McMaster, Pastor, Congregational Church, Williamstown, Mass.

At your bookstore or from us

ASSOCIATION PRESS

Pub. Dept. Inter Comm. YMCA

347 Madison Avenue

New York

before the public as a motion picture actor.

"In the judgment of the committee it would be extremely detrimental to the youth of America for Arbuckle's pictures to be released for circulation, since it is highly desirable that reminders which would naturally come with his reappearance on the screen should not be thus placed before the public. Such release would also, in the opinion of the committee, tend to destroy public confidence in the purpose of the motion picture industry 'to establish and maintain the highest possible moral and artistic standards in motion picture production and develop the educational as well as the entertainment value and general usefulness of motion pictures.' The committee, therefore, recommends to Mr. Hays that he advise the motion picture industry to refrain from exhibiting pictures in which Mr. Arbuckle appears, and that any consideration shown him, as an individual, should be along lines not involving his appearance before the public as a motion picture actor.

"The committee takes this occasion to reaffirm its desire to assist in every possible way in the improvement of motion pictures, and to express its confidence in the practicability of the program which is being developed under Mr. Hay's leadership for securing better pictures and for realizing the highest possible usefulness of motion pictures in the recreation and education of the American people."

IF you don't say, "I saw your advertisement in the CHRISTIAN WORK," how will our advertisers know that their advertisement is bringing returns? You want credit for everything you do. So do we. Make it a habit to say, "I saw your ad. in the CHRISTIAN WORK."

THE COMMUNITY CHURCHMAN

A Monthly Magazine for all churchmen who are community minded

A working tool for every pastor and layman, informing, inspiring and helping him to make his church of larger social and spiritual service to its community.

Annual subscription price, $2.00

Rate to Ministers, $1.50

Single copies, 20 cents each.

HANDBOOK OF THE COMMUNITY CHURCH MOVEMENT

This Handbook (84 pages, paper-bound) contains concise information concerning the numbers, varieties, methods of organization and kinds of service of the community churches throughout the United States. Price 65 cents, postpaid.

Address, Dept. W

THE COMMUNITY CHURCHMAN
2822 Annette St., Indianapolis, Indiana

Tusculum

A thorough Christian-character-building College. Established 1794. Address

President O. O. GRAY, D. D., Greenville, Tenn.

Pulpit Gowns

and Choir Vestment
Custom Tailoring
FOR CLERGYMEN

Pulpit Hangings and Bookmarkers

Cox Sons & Pining

131-133 East 23rd. New York City

COLLECTION ENVELOPES—8c per pack of 52, n Cartons (Also Storehouse Tithers' Envelopes) write iDufold Trifold Company, Asbury Park, N. J.

WHOOPING COUGH

Asthma, Spasmodic Croup
Bronchitis, Coughs & Influenza

The most widely used remedy for whooping cough and spasmodic croup. The little lamp vaporizes the remedy while the patient sleeps.

Introduced in 1879 Vapo-Cresolene "Used while you sleep"

Send for descriptive booklet 63A
Sold by Druggists

VAPOR-CRESOLENE CO. 62 Cortlandt St., New York

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND
220 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY
BELLS

One Book a Week

Continued from page 123

ference on Week-Day Religious Education held in Chicago, March 31st of 1922 and there is an illuminating introduction by the editor of the volume, Dr. Henry F. Cope. (Sunday School teachers as well as pastors will find this book stored with helpful suggestions.)

While writing upon this subject mention should be made here of the extremely interesting October number of the magazine "Christian Education," (The Council of Church Boards of Education, 111 Fifth Avenue, New York), which devotes all its pages to a discussion of "The Religious Education of College and University Students in the United States." The sixty pages are full of most valuable information and the discussion of the problem is from many angles. It is not an easy problem. There is no doubt that our higher education has become largely secularized and we all know that there is no adequate system of religious education in the United States for college and university students. Dr. Kelly and the other writers believe that all this can be remedied, that the colleges would not be hostile to such approaches as the Church might make, and that the Church is neglecting—they hope it will not be for long—a great opportunity.

UNIVERSITY BIBLE COURSES at home. Use spare time. Enroll now. Finest books. Best courses. Hundreds studying. Lose no time from your regular work. Catalogue free. Write Prof. C. J. Burton, Bible University Eugene, Ore.

Bible Students

The Parallel Edition of Moffatt's "A New Translation of the New Testament" is now ready—the King James Version side by side with Dr. Moffatt's incomparable rendering. Dr. Moffatt supplies an Introduction to New Testament study.

Cloth, Net $2.50; Imitation leather, round corners, Net, $3.00; French morocco, limp, round corners, Net, $4.00; Levant, divinity circuit, round corners, Net, $6.00.

At Your Religious Book Store
GEORGE H. DORAN COMPANY
244 Madison Avenue New York

The Woodlawn Cemetery

Is readily accessible by Harlem trains from Grand Central Station and by subway. Small lots at reasonable prices. Write or telephone (4855 Gramercy Park) for Book of Views or representative. Office 20 E. 23d st., New York City

Communion Ware of Quality

Best materials. Finest workmanship
ALUMINUM or SILVER PLATE
Send for Illustrated Catalog with
REDUCED PRICES

INDIVIDUAL COMMUNION SERVICE CO.
Room 304 1701-1703 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

IRRESISTIBLE

Join Our Delightful "Christian Work" Party

ON THE GREAT WHITE STAR LINE "S. S. BALTIC" SUMMER CRUISE TO THE HOLY LAND, EGYPT, TURKEY, GREECE, SPAIN ITALY, ETC.

61 Days, $600 and up, Starting June 27, 1923

A SURPASSING SUMMER VACATION OPPORTUNITY

For Ministers, College Professors, Teachers and Business Men

IDEAL SUMMER WEATHER ON SHIP BOARD

With the Average Temperature on Shore lower than Boston, New York or St. Louis, Nights Cool. Practically no Humidity

Clark's 20th Cruise
to the Orient

STOP-OVERS IN EUROPE

Return tickets first class
good on Adriatic, Baltic,
Cedric, Celtic, etc.

Until

January 1, 1924

S. S. BALTIC

A FASCINATING ITINERARY

Madeira, Cadiz, Seville (Cordova, Granada and the Alhambra), Gibraltar, Algiers, Athens (Corinth, Eleusis), Haifa, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Bethany (Nazareth, Sea of Galilee, Samaria, etc.), Alexandria, Cairo Naples, Pompeii, Aome (Capri, Sorrento, Amalfi), Monte Carlo, Cherbourg (Paris and the Battlefields, London, etc.), Liverpool to New York.

D. E. Lorenz, Ph.D., Author of "The Mediterranean Traveler" and Managing Director of Clark's Orient Cruise of 1922, and "Round the World" Cruise of 1923, is organizing a party of Christian Work readers. Why not take advantage of this remarkable opportunity and spend your vacation months visiting the most fascinating countries in the world? No travel worries—just rest and enjoyment. Rates include regular shore trips, landings, drives, guides, hotels, railroad fees, etc.—everything first class.

WE INVITE OUR READERS TO JOIN OUR PARTY

ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET (70 pages) AND SHIP DIAGRAM SENT FREE POSTPAID.

Note:—A few vacant rooms are available on our Mediterranean Cruise, Feb. 3, 1923, and on our Round the World Cruise, Jan. 22, 1923.

Address: Cruise Department, CHRISTIAN WORK

70 Fifth Ave., New York City

When answering advertisements please mention the Christian Work

Luxurious White Star
Transatlantic Liner

S. S. BALTIC

23,876 tons register.
Three great promenade
decks — Sumptuous
Public Rooms, 24 Suites
with Private Bath.

The Climax of Luxurious
Travel

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

A Religious Weekly Review

FEBRUARY 3, 1923

---

Elements in Happiness

T. Rhondda Williams, D. D.

Mr. Coue in America

Observer's Letter

Anglo-American Friendship

Charles E. Jefferson, D. D.

The Christian Faith of Abraham Lincoln

E. B. Sanford, D. D.

The Ideals of a Chinese School of Theology

T. T. Lew, D. D.

LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

---

Three Dollars a Year

Ten Cents a Copy

Important Selections from

More than 100 New "Revell"

A "REVELL" BOOK
Ask for it

BOOKS OF THIS SEASON

COMPLETE LIST
FREE

FOSDICK | Christianity and Progress

By HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK, D.D.

Dr. Fosdick accepts the challenge of the Church today, and subjects the theme to a searching analysis in his new book. $1.50

SNEATH | Religion and the Future Life

Development of Belief in Life After Death
Edited by E. HERSHEY SNEATH

Profs. Boaz, Jackson (Columbia), Hopkins, Bacon, Porter (Yale), Jastrow (U. of P.), Paton, MacDonald (Hartford Sem.), Fairbanks (Mich.), etc. $3.00

STRONG | What Shall I Believe?

A Primer of Christ in Theology

By AUGUSTUS HOPKINS STRONG, D.D., LL.D.

"The last message of a great teacher—one who devoted his life to the exposition of Christian creed and doctrines." $1.00

HILLIS | Great Men As Prophets of a New Era

By NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS

Dr. Hillis' latest book strikes a popular chord. The subjects include: Dante; Savonarola; William the Silent; Oliver Cromwell; John Wesley; John Milton; Garibaldi; John Ruskin, etc. $1.50

VAN DYKE | Thy Sea is Great Our Boats are Small

and Other Poems of Today

By HENRY VAN DYKE, D.D.

These verses Dr. van Dyke describes as an attempt to give expression to certain present-day aspirations not possibly finding utterance before. 50c.

JEFFERSON | Under Twenty

Messages to Big Boys and Girls

By CHARLES E. JEFFERSON, D.D.

An acknowledged master of clear, unmistakable presentation, which finds ample expression in admirable addresses. $1.50

DAVIS | Preaching the Social Gospel

By Ozora S. Davis, D.D.

The new book on preachers' problems today, by the author of "Evangelistic Preaching," is the next book every preacher should read. $1.50

DARBY | Jesus an Economic Mediator

God's Remedy for Industrial and International Ills

By JAMES E. DARBY, D.D.

Christian Index: "Dr. Darby's book will go far toward remedying conditions, if leaders in both camps—labor and capital—will study his message." $1.50

KING | Nerves and Personal Power

By Dr. D. MACDOUGALL KING, M.B.

Some principles of Psychology as Applied to Conduct and Health. With Introduction by Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. $2.00

RADER | 'Round the Round World

By PAUL RADER

A clarion call for world evangelization, written by one of the most virile and compelling forces in present-day American Christian activity. $1.50

JOWETT | God Our Contemporary

A Volume of Complete Addresses

By JOHN HENRY JOWETT, D.D.

Among the pulpit-giants of today Dr. Jowett has been given a high place. Every preacher will want at once this latest product of his fertile mind. $1.50

JONES | The King of Love

Meditations on The Twenty-third Psalm

J. D. JONES, D.D.

Dr. Jones is one of the greatest of living preachers, and on both sides of the Atlantic, his splendid gifts are fully recognized. $1.25

BERRY | Revealing Light

By SIDNEY BERRY, M.A.

A volume of addresses by the successor to Dr. Jowett at Birmingham, the underlying aim of which is to show what the Christian revelation means in relation to the great historic facts of the Faith. $1.50

SPURR | The Master Key

By FREDERICK C. SPURR

Last Minister of Regent's Park Chapel, London.

A fearless, clearly-reasoned restatement of the terms of the Christian Gospel and its relation to the travail through which the world is passing. $1.35

BABSON | New Tasks for Old Churches

By ROGER W. BABSON

Suggestions for the solution of today's problems, clear-cut and courageous, regarding the physical, social, and spiritual salvation. $1.00

HARPER | The Church in the Present Crisis

By PRES. WILLIAM ALLEN HARPER

Hon. Josephus Daniels says: "Dr. Harper has ably presented the demand that the church shape the thought and life of the future. It is a book of faith with wise directions and guidance." $1.75

McGARRAH | Money Talks

Stimulating Studies in Christian Stewardship

By REV. ALBERT F. MCGARRAH

A wealth of fresh material, popular in style, yet deeply inspiring in tone. A companion volume to "Modern Church Finance" $1.25

PRATT | The Master's Method of Winning Men

By DWIGHT MALLORY PRATT, D.D.

Introduction by Frederick L. Fagley, D.D.

A plea for "personal evangelism," containing numerous instances of its proving the most effective agency of the Christian religion. $1.00

VANCE | In the Breaking of the Bread

By JAMES I. VANCE

United Presbyterian: "A volume of communion addresses marked by deep spiritual insight and knowledge of the human heart." $1.25

BOWIE | The Road of the Star

By W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D.D.

A volume of addresses which bring the message of Christianity with fresh and kindling interpretation to the immediate needs of men. $1.50

BRYAN | In His Image

By WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN

The epoch-making book against Darwinism that is awakening religious leaders—startling educators—influencing legislation! Eighth Edition. $1.75

CONWELL | Unused Powers

By RUSSELL H. CONWELL, D.D.

To "Acres of Diamonds," "Why Lincoln Laughed," Dr. Conwell has just added another volume of his choicest addresses, written out of the knowledge and wisdom of a man who has long faced the stark realities of life. $1.25

ATKINS | The Undiscovered Country

By GAUIS GLENN ATKINS, D.D.

A group of addresses marked by distinction of style and originality of approach. Dr. Atkins' work, throughout, is marked by clarity of presentation, polished diction and forceful phrasing. $1.50

HOUGH | The Strategy of the Devotional Life

By LYNN HAROLD HOUGH, D.D.

A book dealing with the problem of sustaining true spiritual life amid the vast life of a great city—a problem of increasing gravity. 75c.

GUNSAULUS | Prayers of Frank W. Gunsaulus

By FRANK W. GUNSAULUS, D.D.

Christian Work: "Dr. Gunsaulus was one of the most richly-endowed preachers of his generation, and his prayers reflect a mind and heart wondrously full." $1.25

HALLOCK | A Modern Cyclo-pedia

Of Illustrations for all Occasions

By G. B. F. HALLOCK, Editor of "The Expositor."

A valuable handbook for Preachers, Sunday School Superintendents and all Christian workers. Nineteen hundred and thirty-eight illustrations. $3.00

CHAPMAN | Evangelistic Sermons

By J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, D.D.

Edited and Compiled by Edgar Whitaker Work, D.D., with Frontispiece

Strong, fervid gospel addresses, eminently characteristic of one of the great evangelists of his time. $1.50

TORREY | The Gospel for Today

New Evangelistic Sermons for a New Day

By R. A. TORREY, D.D.

A new volume of appealing addresses, by the well-known evangelist and Bible teacher, characterized by unusual clearness of statement and frankness of appeal. $1.50

BANKS | The New Ten Commandments

By LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

Apt quotation, fitting illustration, drawn from literature and human life give point and color to his work, which is without a dull or meaningless page. $1.50

MITCHELL | The Drama of Life

By THOS. R. MITCHELL, M.A., B.D.

A series of reflections on Shakespeare's "Seven Ages," which has already won the enthusiastic endorsement of Sir William Robertson Nicoll, Chas. W. Gordon, D.D., (Ralph Connor) Archdeacon Cody and Prof. Francis G. Peabody. $1.25

At All Booksellers, or of the Publishers

FLEMING H. REVELL COMPANY, Publishers,

NEW YORK, 158 Fifth Avenue

CHICAGO, 17 N. Wabash Avenue

When Answering Advertisements Please Mention The Christian Work

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

CONTINUING

THE EVANGELIST AND NEW YORK OBSERVER

Vol. 114.—No. 5

February 3, 1923

Whole No. 3008

CONTENTS

WORLD OF TODAY.....	131
EDITORIALS:
The World Conference on the Life and Work of the Churches: Rev. Frederick Lynch, D.D.....	135
Protestantism and the World's Necessities: Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D.D.....	136
Elements in Happiness: Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, D.D.....	137
OBSERVER'S LETTER:
M. Coue in America.....	139
THE WEEKLY SERMON:
The Ideals of a Chinese School of Theology: Rev. T. T. Lew, D.D.....	141
GENERAL:
The Christian Faith of Abraham Lincoln: Rev. E. B. Sanford, D.D.....	143
Anglo-American Friendship: Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, D.D.....	146
LITERARY SUPPLEMENT .....	148
ONE BOOK A WEEK:
Heredity and Child Culture.....	155
INTERNATIONAL LESSON:
The Spirit of Prayer: Rev. Henry Stiles Bradley, D. D.....	156

THE CHRISTIAN WORK; Published weekly; 10 cents a copy, $3.00 a year in the United States, $3.52 in Canada, and $4.04 in all other countries (postage included.)

Publication and circulation office, 75 Baker Street, Providence, R. I. Editorial and advertising office, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Subscriptions may be forwarded to either of the above offices.

Entered as second class matter November 18, 1922, at the U. S. post-office, Providence, R. I. under the act of March 3, 1879.

Printed in U. S. A.—Published by The Christian World, Inc., Frederick Lynch, President; Henry Strong Huntington, Vice-President; Benson Y. Landis, Secretary-Treasurer.

Printed by Norman C. Lynch Co., Incorporated, 75 Baker Street, Providence, R. I.; 70 Fifth Ave., New York.

The World of To-day

THE INVISIBLE EMPIRE

The reports from Bastrop, Louisiana, have made the whole country realize what it means for any body of men to attempt to rule a community extra-legally. The Ku Klux Klan of Morehouse Parish, Louisiana, is made up of men who like to consider themselves the best citizens. They set out to put a stop to boot-legging, gambling and bad living of every sort in their county. They intended to be in fact, as they sometimes signed their communications, "regulators." When they suspected that one of the young women of the parish was not living correctly, they went to her parents' home at night, and ordered the girl to come with them, put her on the train for Little Rock, Arkansas, that very night, and ordered her never to return. Later, as the result of a petition in the young woman's behalf, they relented enough to allow her to come home. According to the testimony given at the public hearing held at Bastrop, they took the choir leader of a Methodist Church away from his church one Sunday morning before service and whipped him in the woods, bidding him straighten up and be a man. He himself claimed to be a good citizen. Dr. McKoin, the Mayor of Mer Rouge, was one of the Klan's most dictorial leaders. When he reported that he had been fired on while driving his automobile, the Klan set out to find and punish the would-be assassins. Many of the citizens of the Parish believed that McKoin himself fired the shots which pierced his car. The Klan, however, concluded that two or three of the young men of the neighborhood were guilty. As the crowd came home from a ball game at Bastrop last August 24 a company of masked and armed men stopped the various cars and took five men off with them. They later released three of the men. The other two were never seen alive again. Under the leadership of Governor Parker, a brave and determined man, the Louisiana state authorities set out to solve the mystery. After the state police had begun searching for the bodies a tremendous unexplained dynamic explosion on the border of Mer Rouge, a Morehouse Parish lake, brought to the surface the bodies of the two lost men. Their bodies bore the marks of fiendish torture. The Louisiana Attorney General ordered a public hearing at Bastrop, Morehouse Parish county seat, to gather testimony as to the murder and as to the activities of the Ku Klux Klan. The investigation revealed the Ku Klux as an organization some of whose purposes were good, but which pursued them by wholly indefensible means. The hearing also showed that a good part of the Parish people approved the Ku Klux and that those who bore witness involving it were, not infrequently, in terror of their lives for fear of the Ku Klux revenge. It would seem that every state threatened by the Ku Klux should make even the wearing of a mask in public a serious crime. But most of all is the need of developing a public opinion which will leave law enforcement to legal authorities. Any other policy is the result of anarchy or leads to it.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

THE MISSIONARY SITUATION IN ALASKA

On September 12, 1922 the last land grant college of this nation was established three miles from Fairbanks, Alaska, under the name of the Alaska Agricultural College and School of Mines. While one can find signs of progress in many places in Alaska, nevertheless the territory suffers from booms and depressions as have many mining districts. The bulk of the population has moved out of Douglas, for instance. House after house in the town is boarded up, store buildings are deserted, and the mine property is being wrecked. Except for an occasional Roman Catholic service and a very sparsely attended evening services at the Episcopal Church, every church in the town was closed until the Congregationalists opened a Sunday School. The Sunday School has prospered. Valdez likewise is declining. Anchorage, where eight thousand people lived six years ago, hardly numbers eighteen hundred now. Nome, which looks so great a dot on the map, is a town of but four hundred people. After all the years of missionary work in Alaska, among both whites and natives, there is not a single self-supporting church there. With but one person in every ten square miles on the average, self-supporting churches are scarcely to be expected. Ten mission boards are at work among the fifty-five thousand people of the territory, supporting one hundred thirteen stations with a missionary for every five hundred people, at a cost of nearly $5 per capita in contributions from outside of Alaska. The amount of money spent is by no means improper. The impropriety lies in the denominational rivalry. In the report on missions in Alaska presented at the Home Missions Council at Atlantic City last week, Dr. S. Hall Young, the veteran Presbyterian missionary, bluntly said, "Lately the Episcopalians have sent a man to Point Barrow, and have talked of establishing a mission at Wainwright (near Point Barrow.) This would be a distinct encroachment, and their mission would be composed of our members." We only quote the statement as an illustration. The superintendent of the Congregational work in Alaska summed up the Alaska situation in these words:

As a whole, all missionary investments in Alaska have not accomplished what I think they might and could accomplish if sectarian propaganda could be submerged in a cooperative process of Kingdom building. The effective ministers in Alaska are earnest men who would like to do community service in a large and undenominational way. The people would rally to a guaranteed single church for each town program. This is as fine a field for home missionary demonstration of unity as China is for the foreign workers. If a practical federation of churches in Alaska were worked out in the principle of one church with a resident pastor for each place, and only one until that church was self-supporting, a new spirit would be put into the ministers I have met. To this very end the Home Missions Councils' Committee on Comity and Co-operation has called into being the Associated Evangelical Churches of Alaska, with its Central Committee. "All phases of missionary work in Alaska are under the care of that organization," according to the Chairman of the Committee on Comity. The new organization should in due time function efficiently. We look for the day when the denominational directors of missions will frankly base all their plans on their honest opinion as to what the view of Jesus would be in facing the same problem. They will be interested in genuinely Christianizing the people and the social order and no more concerned for a particular denomination than He would be.

THE GRANT CONTROVERSY

We sincerely rejoice that Dr. Grant has raised the great fundamental question of liberty of thought in the Church. We of the Church are too much inclined to gloss over the question. We will give men liberty, but we want nothing said about it. We recognize that other men in the pulpit differ from us; we are willing that, so long as they are genuine followers of Jesus, with His marks upon their thinking and action, they should lead their congregations along the roads of a Christianity which takes for granted God's teachings in biology and historical psychology; as well as in the social and religious ideas of Jesus. We expect the idea of liberty of thought to keep on growing in the Church. But none of the great unified denominations have stood up and said to all the world, "Men are absolutely free to learn and to teach in the Church all that God teaches them, through every channel of His teaching, so long as that teaching touches human life." If the Church is a universal and eternal institution, as we like to say, it must come to this position. So the Episcopal Church in New York today has a great opportunity before it. Let Bishop Manning fairly face the proposition which Dr. Grant has brought forward in his letter. Let him honestly say that the Apostles' Creed represents the idea of Christianity and its form of presentation which the Church held perhaps three centuries after the beginning of our era. But the Church is bigger than the creed. The Church does not depend on dogmas. The Church is the organized body of those who in teachable spirit long to know the full will of God and practice it, who are convinced that the great essentials of the teaching of Jesus and the way of Jesus are in close conformity with that will and who accept His purpose of bringing near the Kingdom of God as their absorbing purpose. Let Bishop Manning say, "The Church is not afraid of any truth God has to teach. It is the most open-minded, humble-minded institution in the world. It enters the kingdom of God because it is as a little child. And every man of sincere openness of mind will find himself at home and at peace within its universal fold." If he will do it, he will send a great breath of freedom and reality through the Christian world. May the men of this generation grasp the opportunity that is presenting itself, in denomination after denomination, so to define the Church and so to let all the world know its reality.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

BISHOP MANNING AND DR. GRANT

For many years the Episcopal Church of the Ascension in New York has had the reputation of being a sort of "low church cathedral." Before Dr. Percy Stickney Grant made it known over the country by his forum and utterances it was a center of liberalism in the diocese of New York. Certain very recent events, however, bring Dr. Grant's relationships with the Episcopal Church into more prominence than ever before. Sunday, January 14th, he preached a sermon, which included, among other things, the following: 1—A presentation of the limitation of the usefulness of church buildings as the result of their consecration (this applies especially to such churches as the Episcopal), and condemnation of the use of buildings for church services only. (These matters became an issue several years ago when Bishop Burch limited the forum of the Church of the Ascension by ruling that meetings must be held in the parish house rather than in the church building and by insisting that topics be submitted to him for censoring. Any man whose head had not been touched by the hands of a bishop could no longer speak publicly in a consecrated church.) 2—A statement to the effect that Jesus did not have "the same power as God," and also an opinion that this view is shared by most ministers who have studied science in the modern universities. 3—A statement of disbelief in any peculiar power of priests because of consecration or of bishops through apostolic succession. 4—The opinion that marriage has significance and sacredness by the will and consent of society and of those who are married rather than because the Church has stamped it a sacrament.

The sermon, as was to be expected, aroused much criticism in Episcopal and other circles in New York and elsewhere. As was also to be expected Bishop Manning called on Dr. Grant Wednesday, January 17th, and discussed the sermon with him. As a result the Bishop gave the newspapers the following letter addressed to the rector of the Church of the Ascension.

Since my conversation with you last Wednesday afternoon I have given most earnest thought to the matter which we then discussed. That conversation was, as you know, in some important points not reassuring to me, and I feel called upon to let you and the church know clearly what my judgment is in the matter.

You will, I hope, believe that what I write is not written under any sense of irritation nor with personal feeling of any sort. If you were my own brother I should feel obliged to write you what I am now writing. If I understand you aright you confirm as correct the reports of your sermon preached last Sunday and also other utterances which you are reported to have made since that time.

The impression which you have given to the church and to the public is that you deny the miraculous elements of the Gospel and that you no longer believe the statement of the Christian faith as contained in the Apostles' Creed. The Apostles' Creed is the statement of the Christian faith which not only every minister but every member of this church is required to accept. As a minister of this church you are obliged constantly and publicly to declare your belief in it.

At your ordination you were asked publicly and solemnly, "Will you then give your faithful diligence always so to minister the doctrine and sacraments and the discipline of Christ as the Lord hath commanded, and as this church hath received the same, according to the commandments of God, so that you may teach the people committed to your care and charge with all diligence to keep and observe the same?" To this question you replied, "I will so do, by the help of the Lord." If you cannot now conscientiously accept and teach the Christian faith as contained in the Apostles' Creed, it is plain that you cannot consistently continue to hold your commission as a minister and teacher in the Protestant Episcopal Church.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

In my judgment, therefore, you are called upon to follow one of two courses. You should at once publicly correct the impression given by your recent sermon and state clearly that you do accept the faith of the church as set forth in the creed, or if you do not accept this faith you should voluntarily resign from the ministry of this church.

This in no way restricts or conflicts with your personal liberty or your freedom of thought. You are at liberty to teach whatever you believe, but you are not at liberty to deny the faith for which the Protestant Episcopal Church stands and at the same time continue as one of her ministers. It is incumbent upon all of us to follow what we believe to be the truth wherever it may lead us, and if it leads you outside the Episcopal Church, it is your duty courageously and honestly to follow it there, but so long as you elect to remain a minister of this church loyalty to its creed is a binding obligation upon you. If you do not believe in Jesus Christ as God and Saviour you are restricting your own freedom and injuring yourself by remaining in your present position.

The question here involved is one not only of theology but of honor and good faith. According to your own statement it appears that you have not only given up belief in this or that less important doctrine but that you have lost your belief in the Saviour Himself as He is presented to us in the Four Gospels and in the Apostles' Creed. You will say that this church allows great liberty of interpretation as to the meaning of the articles of the creed. This is quite true, and I rejoice in the great liberty of thought which this church allows and desire to uphold it to the utmost limit that is lawful and right. But interpretation of a fact or a truth is one thing and denial of it is another. Interpretation means reasonable explanation of a fact on the basis of its acceptance as true. To call that interpretation which is in fact denial is a misuse of language. There is great liberty of thought and expression in the Episcopal Church, but this does not give her ministers the right to deny the essential faith for which the church stands.

In a great charge to the convention of this diocese entitled "Law and Loyalty," which I would gladly make my own, Bishop Henry C. Potter said, "This church has her standards of faith embodied in the creeds and offices and articles which, taken together with Holy Scripture, are her rule of faith. In the interpretation of these there always has been, and there always will be, a certain latitude of interpretation for which every wise man will be devoutly thankful. But that that latitude exists is no more certain than that it has its limits, and that transgression of these limits, by whatever ingenuity it has been accomplished, has wrought only evil in lowering the moral tone of the church, and in debilitating the individual conscience is, I think, no less certain. . . . Out of all the conflict and clamor of opinions, above all the vagaries of individual sentiment or inclination, there rises that thing which we call loyalty, whether to God, or our country, or our mother, the church."

I do not believe in heresy trials if these can possibly be avoided. They ought never to be necessary in the church, where the spirit of love and patience and fellowship should reign. If any man knows that he cannot fulfil the terms upon which he holds his office in the ministry he should voluntarily retire from it. But to quote again the words of Bishop Potter: "Toleration in a body which professes to hold and teach revealed truth must have its limits."

I call upon you to correct unmistakably the impression which you have publicly given of your disbelief in our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour, or if it is not possible for you to do so, then to withdraw from the ministry of this church.

Thus Bishop Manning deliberately takes the position that the doctrines of the Church must be enforced and that the thought of rectors must be controlled. His is simply a statement that what the Church has ordained, no matter how many years ago, must be followed to the letter now. Dr. Grant must profess what the Church has decreed about Jesus rather than what he himself believes to have been the nature of Jesus. Consent to a creed is of more importance than interpretations of Scripture by the individual mind and conscience. What the Church has ordered to be the religion about Jesus is paramount over what the mind and conscience of a man believes to be the religion of Jesus. My church is the final authority, not the conscience of the individual. Conformity is a requisite of spirituality. "Toleration in a body which professes to hold and teach revealed truth must have its limits"—to be enforced, of course, by the bishops and the majority of the clergy. Is it to be true of the Church at large that a man may not follow what he honestly believes to be the truth and still remain in it?

Dr. Grant, on Sunday, January 21st, preached a sermon on "A Constructive Program," in which he amplified his own position, but did not directly answer Bishop Manning. Later in the week he published his answer to the Bishop. These will be found in next week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN WORK.

EDITORIAL

EDITORIAL STAFF

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

Frederick Lynch

ASSOCIATE EDITOR

Henry Strong Huntington

MANAGING EDITOR

Benson Y. Landis

LITERARY EDITOR

Tertius Van Dyke

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Edmund de Schweinitz Brunner

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT

Violette Reynolds

CONTRIBUTING STAFF

Henry A. Atkinson
Peter Ainslie
Hugh Black
S. Parkes Cadman

Sidney L. Gulick
Rufus M. Jones
E. Guy Talbott
T. Rhondda Williams

EDITORIAL COUNCIL

Nehemiah Boynton
Williams Adams Brown
Howard Duffield
Sherwood Eddy
Irving Fisher
J. W. Johnson

George Foster Peabody
George A. Plimpton
Howard C. Robbins
Fred B. Smith
Cornelius Woelfkin
Shailer Mathews

Charles S. Macfarland

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS

Austria: Professor Carl Beth
Canada: Dr. J. Lovell Murray
Czechoslovakia: Professor Francis Zilka
France: Rev. Professor Wilfred Monod
Germany: Direktor A. Hinderer
Great Britain: Rev. Sidney M. Berry
Hungary: Dr. S. Szabo
Switzerland: Pastor Adolf Keller

Churches of Christ in America. The discussion was very earnest and it was voted at the end of the three days' session to call a Universal Conference of all the Churches to consider Life and Work. The presiding thought, voiced again and again, was that the world was waiting for some utterance of the universal Church on the great social, economic and international problems facing the world; that this utterance should be worthy of the divine and glorious character of the Church and of such nature that all the world should heed; that it might go out to the world as a divinely inspired, prophetic, fearless message to the governments and peoples of the world.

The question of the time for the conference was debated and it was felt that although the need of the church's help was urgent it was better to come together with careful preparation and large representation three or four years later than to meet at once in an unprepared state. It was also voted that the Conference be one of Churches, to which the delegates should go up officially appointed by the various communions with power to speak for the Churches. A large international committee was created with four divisions: America, the British Empire, Continental Europe and the Eastern Churches. These groups were to interest the churches in their own field in the great conference and then come together again a year or two years hence for conference. The Archbishop of Sweden was elected Chairman of the International Committee and Doctors Macfarland and Lynch joint secretaries. The American Committee organized itself soon after the return of the delegates to America and Dr. Arthur J. Brown was made Chairman, Bishop Luther B. Wilson, Chairman of the Executive Committee, and Dr. Henry A. Atkinson, Secretary. Most of the Protestant communions have already appointed representatives upon this American committee.

Last August the International Committee met in Helsingborg, Sweden, as the guests of the Archbishop of Sweden. The three days' sessions were devoted to discussions of plans and subjects to be treated at the Conference. The date of the Conference was set for 1925 and the place chosen was Stockholm. It was voted that six commissions should be set up to prepare reports on such subjects as the Christian solution of social, economic and international relationships, the Church's message to the world, which would include evangelism and missions, and Christian education. Each of the five branches will appoint its own commissions on these subjects and these commissions after having made a thorough study of their subjects will compare notes with the commissions appointed by the European brethren so that a joint report may be presented at Stockholm. The American commissions have already been appointed.

The meeting held in New York was well attended and the day's discussions brought to light three things. First of all there was a general feeling that unless the conference at Stockholm should be really representative of the whole of Christendom—at least of Protestant

The World Conference on the Life and Work of the Church

THE well attended meetings in New York last week of the American Branch of the large International Committee of arrangements for the World Conference on Life and Work of the Churches in 1925, brought before the world again one of the great recent ventures of the Churches. When the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches was meeting at the Hague in the summer of 1919 Archbishop Soderblom of Sweden, Dr. Macfarland and a few other outstanding churchmen drafted a resolution which was brought before the World Alliance to the effect that the Alliance recommend to the various national federations and churches of the world that a great ecumenical conference be officially called to consider the life and work of the churches in the period of chaos and reconstruction which the churches are facing. The resolution was passed and a small committee met in Paris soon after to take the first steps to persuade the official bodies of the churches to take action.

In the summer of 1920 a very representative body of churchmen came together in Geneva at the call of Archbishop Soderblom and the Federal Council of the

EDITORIAL

Christendom—it would not be worth holding. All communions must be there and have many of their ablest leaders there. The Churches must feel such an interest in the matter that the Conference will stand out in history as having as determining an influence upon the life and work of the Church as Nicea or Constance had upon its doctrine.

Secondly, some message must go out from the Church that shall be so arresting that all Christendom will heed it and know where the whole Church of Christ stands upon the great moral, social and international problems of the world. The time has come for the Church to make some pronouncement as to just where it stands in regard to the whole social order. Particularly did the delegates present feel that the time had come for the Church of Christ to speak to the world some word upon war.

Thirdly, the feeling was expressed that unless the Church was willing to take the Conference so seriously that it is willing to have its delegates take time—no matter how much time—to give the utmost debate and prayer to the great issues facing Christendom, it was not worth while to meet at all. Upon this point we feel very strongly. The very existence of civilization is at stake. Great wounds exist that can be healed only by divine wisdom and divine help. Millions of men in all lands are confused, distracted, perplexed, looking for guidance and finding none. Faith is at a very low ebb. Enmities and hatreds are poisoning humanity. Powers of darkness are stalking over the earth. These millions are looking to the Church for some word of faith, of light, of guidance, of assurance—some positive, confident word. Many are waiting upon the Church to utter this word. The right word from the whole Church of Christ might be one saving, stabilizing word for civilization. The Conference in the light of these chaotic, threatening conditions should be willing to sit together for weeks, or months, until this word is framed. If the Conference at Constance could sit five years to save a doctrine surely the Conference at Stockholm should be willing to sit as many weeks or months to save a world. Has not the time come when the Church must take itself seriously and count no cost of time or money if it can save the world from the present slough of despond? It is Christ or chaos.

F. L.

Protestantism and the World's Necessities

SONS and daughters of the Reformation are under heavy bonds for the good behavior of Democracy, and of its concomitance in Nationalism, Socialism, Industrialism and Capitalism. Having helped to draw the wine, they have to regulate its drinking. Should it prove too heady a tipple for under-nourished brains and moralities, the world has a right to call upon Protestantism for an explanation and a remedy. It is easy to talk about the progress linked with our paternal faith; but there is no progress, as the term is usually understood, apart from ethical progress. Far more important than the sale of indulgences in the sixteenth century was the rise of Capitalism, the abolition of the old economics, the release of individual energies in other than spiritual avenues. The founders of modern trade and manufactures were sheltered by the spirit of revolt against hierarchies and feudalisms. Socialism and even Bolshevism now aim to supplant Capitalism as it once supplanted Feudalism. We witness the creation of a monstrous governmental engine in Russia, more complicated than those of mediaeval monarchy and the Renaissance Papacy, and far more destructive of individual liberties, rights, and moral obligations. Protestants are dealing, not with Tetzels or a Medician Pontiff, but with Lenine, Trotzky, and other less notorious but scarcely less influential malcontents and despots. If the Reformers asserted anything, it was religious independence; freedom of conscience, of thought, of utterance, as against monopolized authority and uniformity of belief. Their protest created forces which travelled beyond their desires, and were reduced first to a spiritual, then, later, to a political philosophy. This philosophy culminated in the Revolutions of the Eighteenth century. The search for an economic philosophy ensued, and is now in process, embarrassed by selfishness and greed, and by the errors and crimes of preceding eras. We, as Protestants, cannot dodge the historical consequences of our ancestral policy. The prime service we can render the world is to set our own house in order, that we may wisely apply the teachings of the New Testament Evangel and of Old Testament ethics to the phenomena I have named. The useless quarrel with modern learning should cease. The wastes and confusions of denominationalism should be done away with. The foundations of a true social science should be laid, with allowances for the human equation. And not only Protestantism, but the whole Church of God, and all rightly disposed people, will have to find or make room in the divisive institutions of mankind for the universalism of which genuine Christianity is the living soul. In brief, reintegration by means of pacific interpretations, and without concessions to the baser elements, is the capital business of the Church, as it is the crying necessity of the world. Probably it will be a slow process, moving with Time's ameliorating drift, and exterminating many cherished prejudices. But the course it takes is the important matter.

I do not plead for the pleasing of hypercritical ones who ask for better bread than can be made with wheat, nor for the satisfaction of anaemic starvelings who crave a fool-proof world. Still less, if possible, should apostles of the mundane be coddled. They would explain away every religious mystery, and sterilize the finest spiritual instincts. The jaded moods of the secularist are no more helpful than the fanatical harangues of the zealot. Too many suppose that men and women who have an intelligent faith should always retreat before those who either have it not or make it repellent to their fellows. The ostentatious triviality of much current opposition and fault finding is unable to conceive the realities of Protestant conviction. A great deal which is paraded as modern thought is not thinking at all, but simply a deplorable conglomeration of erroneous ideas which will not subside, despite repeated exposures. Illogical, capricious, irrelevant, this type of mind takes short cuts, in cross country fashion, to coveted conclusions. But there is an intellectual realm of true scholarship, occupied by men of profound and scientific learning, which Protestants should regard with reverent affiliation. Our fellow Protestants have a large representation there, and they share in its illustrious achievements. Those mistaken clergymen and laymen who attempt to placate an effete orthodoxy by strangling the thinking and inquiry of that realm will fail, and they ought to fail. Believing souls cannot long escape the invasions of organized knowledge, nor is there any need to evade them. It is the sole function of science to deal with visible realities. It is the sole function of religion to deal with the boundless realities of the invisible universe. It is the function of a well equipped Church to heal the breaches of faith and intellectualism by its vital correspondence with the love of truth. The center of its trust is neither a creed, nor a book, nor a cosmogony, but a Person and a Life. It assimilates whatever is assimilable, because it administers the ultimate life and law of human being. It supplements science and learning without defaming them. Warned by its past annals and by the futility and hollowness of ecclesiastical conflicts with knowledge, it welcomes every verified conclusion as an addition to the truth which sanitates society. The research that matures and disciplines the reasoning faculties is grateful to such a Church, because its own vehicles for communicating spiritual verities are thereby enlarged. The casual and purposive interpretations which all learning presupposes and religion supplies are among the world's chief needs. It implores us for a spiritual ideal in more complete accord with the meditated experiences of life. And Protestantism should fulfil its request without forfeiting intellectual integrity at the behest of blind obscurantism.

EDITORIAL

S. P. C.

Elements in Happiness

WHEN we come to reflect upon the easy way in which we have all been wishing each other a Happy New Year, it might be well to think of a few things we ought to mean in doing so. 1. We ought to refuse the notion of finality to the estimates we have formed the other people, especially where those estimates are unfavorable. To form an unfavorable estimate of another person is always a certain impoverishment in our own life, which we must suffer if the estimate is just. But it is well to consider that no estimate can be fair to all there is in a character, and we should therefore hold ourselves open to new discoveries. Behind a certain manner or habit which is not agreeable there may be something quite admirable, and we should not be led by the manner to an unknowing sort of judgment. And again a judgment which is just at one time may be unjust at a later time, because there are so many possibilities in character which cannot be gauged at any one particular period. The idea is much too prevalent that people never change. As a matter of fact changes of temperament and even of disposition often do take place. There is no doubt that our estimates of other people are very vital elements in our own happiness and often in theirs. Upon these our behavior largely depends. They make all the difference between smooth working and friction, between joyful fellowship and constant irritation. You may have made up your mind that the other person is unsympathetic, or does not understand things as you do, so certain subjects are tabooed, many avenues of communion are closed, you feel tongue-tied even when you are seething with feeling within, you do not express yourself because you think the expression will be misunderstood, so there is no real happiness between you. It would be well to make another attempt at a deeper mutual understanding. We must hold ourselves ready to revise our estimates of each other. I am quite sure that much unhappiness is prolonged in life through attaching finality to such estimates. One has seen cases where they have been discovered to be ill-founded; something broke the seal of judgment under which mutual sympathy was imprisoned, and it sprang forth in a new stream of joy. Individuals often have no idea how it would affect their happiness in 1923 if they could make themselves at the beginning of it entirely willing to reconsider their unfavorable judgments of other people, willing to see good points in those they dislike, and to make the most of any good they discover in them.

The same must be said of judgments concerning people in the mass. Many are unhappy with the thought that the world generally, that society is untrustworthy or unfriendly. These judgments are sometimes reached by quite good people who have perhaps once or twice been betrayed, who have several times been unfortunate in friendship, and who are over-sensitive. There is a great difference on this point between different temperaments; some are naturally more open and easily trustful than others, though they are not necessarily better in any fundamental virtue. These two types will find the world very different in its attitude towards them. On the whole the open and trustful attitude will meet with a response in kind. It may be rebuffed, it may even be betrayed; but response in kind may be fairly expected, and will usually be found. Many people who are so lonely need not be so lonely as they are. They may have difficulties in temperament, and perhaps in their history, but we have to take life in hand and apply will to it along the lines of trustful wisdom. If we do so, most of the difficulties can be overcome. A quick eye to discover the friendly good, and the helpful sociability would make a tremendous difference to many lives.

EDITORIAL

2. It is equally important for men and women to hold themselves open to revise their estimates of themselves. Especially those who underestimate themselves, and do not as a consequence count in the world's upward life for anything like what they ought to count. Self-depreciation is quite a common fault, and many glorious possibilities of service and of happiness are unexplored because of it. To believe too little in yourself is to fail in duty to the world. It is also to leave a source of joy and happiness untapped. If at the beginning of a new year everyone, instead of thinking of himself as great or small, would just determine that he will count on the right side of life for every ounce of his power, be it much or little, what a tremendous difference it would make to multitudes of people. Christianity would make every individual important and precious in the sight of God, and an instrument of God's work in the world. Traditional Christian theology perhaps went too far in claiming for man the central place in the universe. Our planet is not central as men used to think, and there may be higher beings than man in the universe. But it remains true that man is the highest work of God known to us. And if our planet is only a speck of matter in space it is of no less importance to us than it was when men thought differently. If we can no longer claim that the sun and the moon and the stars were created on purpose to give us light on the earth, their service even in that respect is not less than it was before. The vastness of the universe does not really belittle man. Rather the fact that he has discovered it, and can think of it, makes him greater than he was. It would be a strange thing to argue that because Columbus discovered America, and America was so big, therefore Columbus dwindled in significance. Christian theology may have monopolized God too much for one planet, and especially for man, and confined God too much to one particular plan for doing men good.

But it remains true that the highest knowledge of God possible to us is by the revelation through man. And that human nature, which, in spite of all its mixture and its wickedness, flowers in pity and self-denial, in mercy and love, does reveal something very glorious beyond itself in communication with it. This is the revelation of God, the full meaning of which is seen in Christ. It is the mistake of some theologians ancient and modern to draw the veil very deeply and darkly over mankind in general in order to show up the uniqueness of Jesus. They need not; Jesus is unique enough when you have given humanity its fair due. Surely Jesus Himself often told ordinary men to look into themselves for a clue as to what the character of God was. And it is always true that the best in man is the revelation of God, and his moral and spiritual nature is really the source of revelation. If this were not so, men could not have recognized any divinity in Jesus at all. It is a tremendous mistake to try and exalt Jesus at the expense of general humanity, and to prove His uniqueness by denying the life of God in men. The more you know the love of God in your own heart, the greater will Jesus become to you. That God has given to everyone of us something of Himself, and that therefore there is for each some work of His to do, some truth of His to declare, some beauty of His to manifest, some divine purpose to fulfill, which no other individual can fulfill is, I think, a truth of the Christian religion. I do not see that this belief is invalidated by anything in science, or in psychology, or even in Christian theology. This kind of estimate of men will never produce pride or arrogance; nothing is so sure to produce the combination of humility and power. When we feel that the Highest is urging up from within, and manifesting through us, then "Our utmost for the Highest" will be the motto of our life, and the utmost will appear to be too small. I should despair of the Gospel if it meant bringing Christ to men who were entirely devoid of God in themselves. The very hope of the appeal is that there is that divine spark in every man which may be kindled to glorious flame by the igniting fire of God's great Son. It is on the basis of the realization of what He is that man can become what God wants him to be.

3. Happiness in religious life demands that we should not let any experience mark the limits of attainment, or any work done be the terminus of achievement. Believe in the possibility of richer experience, of wider knowledge and of nobler work. "High hearts," says Dr. Martineau, "are never long without hearing some new call, some distant clarion of God, even in their dreams; and soon they are observed to break up the camp of ease, and start on some fresh march to useful service." There are those who "do good only to see the better, and see the better only to achieve it; who are too meek for transport, too faithful for remorse, too earnest for repose; whose worship is action, and whose action is ceaseless aspiration." There are new depths to fathom, new heights to climb, in the adventures of the spiritual life. No experience of the past is a measure or a limit to what the soul may find and do. In this faith the soul may always find newness of life. Formal religion can become very stale and tiring; stagnant theology can become a burden and a fetter, but the eager mind and the high heart will thrill to new revelations, and find that the years of life are new with the joy of God.

T. R. W.

THE OBSERVER

Mr. Coue in America

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

MR. COUE has made his triumphal tour. Upon his arrival in New York the great dailies devoted whole pages to him; but he was soon relegated to the back pages because he worked no miracles in that city. Indeed there was a distinct note of disappointment seen in the daily write-up of the reporters. They had evidently expected him to stand on the City Hall steps and as the lame, the halt and the blind passed by, lay his hands upon them and they would rise up and run off leaping and shouting as when Peter laid hands upon the cripples years ago. Instead of that they discovered a very unimpressive, modest man who disclaimed any miraculous or even hypnotic powers; who had no deep or new psychological secrets to reveal; who made no claims such as the Christian Scientists make of having a new religion that would heal all diseases flesh is heir to; but who merely and quietly said that he had discovered through long years of experience in the little city of Nancy that, "As we thought of ourselves, so to a great degree we were." This is as old as philosophy and it is in all religions. There have been teachers of it and healers by it by the thousands through the ages. In our own day Mr. Trine, Mr. Dresser and others have been preaching it—with much more. All the prophets of healing by prayer and faith and divine power flowing into us have taught auto-suggestion as emphatically as does Mr. Coue. So Mr. Coue comes bringing no new thing except himself and his triumphant reception. In Cleveland the city turned out to greet him. (This is the most hopeful thing I have read of an American city in a long time. Before this it has always been a victorious prize fighter that the cities have met at the railroad station.)

Mr. Coue is a very interesting man. He is gentle, modest, looking like a storekeeper in a small town. (He is a druggist in Nancy.) He does not quite understand all the fuss that is being made over him. Some years ago he heard of an American who had written some books on the influence of the mind over physical states. He sent for them and they interested him so much that he began testing out these theories on some ailing friends in Nancy. He had considerable success and began developing theories of his own as the years went on. To the world he has summed up his own views in two phrases which have become universal property; one: "Every day in every way I grow better and better"; the other: "It passes." There is nothing new in either one of these phrases, but Mr. Coue has had the power of making people believe them as they said them. Indeed this seems to be his chief claim to uniqueness among the thousands of people who have said much the same thing. Perhaps I can do nothing better than devote the remainder of this letter to an account of his work at Nancy by one who was present at several of his meetings and made a rather thorough study of them. I quote from "Emile Coue: The Man and His Work" (Dodd, Mead and Company) by Hugh Macnaghten of Eton College:

"In describing my own experiences at Nancy, let me say at once that I witnessed no miraculous cures, but although this disappointed me at the time I now regard it as a positive advantage, because it would be so easy to be biased and misled by a single exceptional case and consequently to miss, or at least to misinterpret, the whole meaning of M. Coue's work. Beyond doubt there have been not a few instantaneous cures which might be, and probably were, regarded as miracles by the majority of those present at the time, but M. Coue would never be one of this majority; he is never tired of affirming that he works no miracles, all he claims is that he is able in most cases to help us to cure ourselves. 'I cannot help you,' he would say, 'if you have broken an arm or a leg; in that case you will go, if you are sensible, to a surgeon; but I may be able to help you to to recover the use of a limb or an eye which from the mere fact of long disuse has ceased to act as a limb or an eye in being.' It is true that at times he has seemed to achieve much more than this. A helpless cripple carried into the room has left M. Coue's presence on his own feet, cured and triumphant; but the explanation is simple; the cripple had long ceased to believe in the possibility of walking and therefore the disbelief had translated itself into a real inability. The moment that he believed M. Coue, who had told him that he had the power of walking, that moment he was able to walk. As he first walked, shouting, 'Je marche, je marche,' and presently ran round the room, doubtless he seemed to himself a living and walking proof that miracles do happen; but to M. Coue he presented only one more example of the truth that, what you think, in the sphere of possibilities of course, tends irresistibly to become true for you.

"At the first conference we were about a dozen English of the upper and upper-middle class and about the same number of French, of whom the majority were poor. As M. Coue goes his round and questions each of those present, one by one, there is plenty of evidence of human suffering in the long but unmonotonous tale of various ills from which the many patients are suffering. Yet almost invariably the pervading tone is one of hopefulness. The sceptic of yesterday is a little less sceptical today, in another's eyes despair is changing to a gleam of hope, my nearest neighbor slept better last night than on any night during the last ten years; the woman next to him says, 'I feel a little better, but——.' Here M. Coue cuts her short, for 'buts' spoil it all. Almost every one was better, and there were no miraculous cures. Some improvement, however, took place before our eyes: one old man, who at first could not raise his arm, ended, thanks to much encouragement, by raining blows on M. Coue's shoulder, though not, I must admit, as vigorously as M. Coue himself would have desired. Another man, with rheumatism in both knees, after a little rubbing by M. Coue and many repetitions of the ca passe formula, found himself able to walk with comparative ease. Any such visible improvement was infectious and we all took courage. When M. Coue has made his round and has said some words to each of us, he tells us to close our eyes, and recites his gospel of health; we are just to listen without effort; a wise passiveness is best; indeed, we may sleep if we will, for our subconscious mind never sleeps and never forgets, and so his words sink in. We are to be very careful to eat slowly and turn our food into a kind of paste before we swallow it; thus certainly, but only thus, will constipation cease to be. We shall sleep soundly; our dreams, if we dream, will be pleasant; troubles and worries will melt away and we shall awake and sing; there will be no more fears, no more thoughts of unkindness; shyness and self-consciousness will vanish.

"And how are we to win this great reward? Very easily it seems; without effort. As soon as we nestle on the pillow we are to close our eyes and recite without stress, but just audibly, the well-known formula some twenty times: 'Every day in every respect I grow better and better,' or, if we think that those things are better said in French, 'Tous les jours, a tous points de vue, je vais de mieux en mieux.' It seems childish, does it not? It is really childish, and that is a very different thing. And if we wish we can add the childish words, 'par la grace de Dieu,' or 'Thank God,' and so turn it into a prayer. Does this sound to you more like the Pharisee's prayer than the Publican's? To me it rather recalls the Samaritan who of the ten healed of leprosy alone returned to give thanks to God. Whenever in the course of his little sermon M. Coue mentions a disability or sickness, from which any one person in particular among his audience is suffering, he approaches that person and touches the part affected. One hardly realizes it as strange that he should remember as he does the ailments of some thirty persons, many of whom he is seeing for the first time. Only very rarely he makes a slip, as when, for instance, he touched a friend of mine on the thumb that was not gouty, and said that very probably it would soon be like the other. Thank goodness; he is too intensely human never to make a mistake, and he will, I know, forgive me for hoping that in his particular forecast he was mistaken. He is himself as quick as lightning to take advantage of any mistakes that his patients make in describing their own condition, and his quiet humor is a constant source of delight. Nor are there wanting humorous episodes. For instance, hardly had M. Coue finished speaking of the certain cure of constipation when the sufferer he had been addressing hurried from the room, announcing, with mingled surprise and triumph, that the event was going to justify the prediction. These things are said more easily, without offence, in French; there was only a little ripple of sympathetic laughter while M. Coue smiled at the startling sudden fulfilment of his promise. Yet always M. Coue is careful to assure his audience 'I cure no one,' all that he offers is his help in teaching others to cure themselves. On Friday there were two lectures in the afternoon, the first by M. Coue himself and the second by his friend and follower M. Rene de Brabois. Let me quote a single sentence which specially appealed to me from the second lecture. Our friend (we feel from the first moment that he also is our friend) is speaking of sleeplessness. How is sleep to be recaptured? This is his answer: 'Si vous faites un mouvement pour l'attraper, il vous echappera comme un oiseau,' i.e., 'Make ever so slight a movement to capture sleep and it will escape from you like a bird.' It is fatal to call in your will, to make an effort, to determine to go to sleep. If you say, 'I will go to sleep,' imagination will answer, 'No, you won't'; and by a law which knows no varying the will yields to the imagination. You must say, 'I am going to sleep,' or better say it in French, 'Je vais dormir,' repeat it very quickly making the sound of a humming bee (comme une abeille qui bourdonne) over and over again, but above all make no effort to sleep."

The above is the best description I have seen of Mr. Coue's work. One contributory cause to the success of such seances as those described here is the fact that where several people are all gathered together seeking health, interest in one another's success helps each individual both to concentrate and to believe. It is the old story of the individual effort being augmented by the group effort. Perhaps this has a good deal to do with the success. It is all very interesting and there is no doubt that there are great forces in us, which if rightly used and guided, can lift us out of many ailments. It is a question worth asking whether if these efforts are supplemented by prayer and faith they could not lift us even further out of our troubles.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Ideals of a Chinese School of Theology

By Rev. T. T. Lew, D. D.

Dean of the School of Theology of Peking University

[The following sermon delivered at Dean Lew's inauguration, is of considerable significance coming as it does from far away China. Dr. Lew is a leader and scholar of great vision and is at the head of a remarkable movement in China. Our readers will be interested to know that Peking University has just launched a million dollar building program to make possible the removal to a new site near the Summer Palace where the institution may realize to the full its great possibilities. Construction of the school and theological building is already under way.]

THE Church catholic has poured into China, for over a century, financial resources, her best manhood and womanhood, and with painstaking care and in spite of numerous difficulties, has laid down the foundation of the Church, and entered an educational scaffold on which to build the super-structure of the Church. The pioneers and the martyrs would rejoice to see the gathering of today in this land of martyrdom, the realization of a University School of Theology. We who are here today are overwhelmed with its significance and a sense of grave responsibility. As one who has been called unexpectedly to respond reluctantly to serve the School as its Executive Officer, I hesitate to state anything beyond an acknowledgment of gratitude for your unusual confidence in an inexperienced and unqualified young man. Yet, as the School is also young and indeed is in its infancy, I venture to think aloud before you, my comrades, what our hopes for the School should be, as the first act of my allegiance.

The School of Theology of Peking University should be first of all a training school for ministers to a world torn in pieces by racial prejudices, class struggles, petty differences and unforgiving attitudes. It should send out ministers of reconciliation; ministers who will follow the Redeemer to bring peace, love and good-will among men and who will affect the atonement between sinful humanity and the holy, righteous Father. To a world hungry for hope, joy and comfort, disappointed in promises made in good faith but never realized, it should send ministers of evangelism, proclaiming to every creature the Gospel of the Son of Man. To a Church which has been under the tutelage of different nationalities and which has entered into a period of definite self-consciousness and self-realization, a Church which is still depending upon the tutelage of her friends and benefactors of other races, in a church which draws workers from every principal denomination of the Protestant Church, and from almost every leading country of Christendom and which embraces the activities of one hundred and eight organizations, it should provide ministers of co-operation who will defend bravely and protect wisely the comprehensiveness of the Church, leading the Church and its twenty-four thousand workers through the labyrinth of difficulties and conflicts in order to accomplish the great common task of evangelizing China.

For a Church definitely looking forward to make herself felt in the coming new social order and whose respect for learning is part of her sacred inheritance, for a Church whose greatest need is spiritual life made intelligent with proper, definite, intellectual equipment, for a Church which has found her life through the educational effort of her founders, the School of Theology shall provide ministers for teaching, well qualified to undertake the task of educating the thousands of students within her walls, and the countless number who are waiting to come in. For a Church whose spiritual life was formed in the crucible of fires of persecution of the early days, and purified and intensified by continuous heroic sacrifice and repeated martyrdom, a Church whose appreciation of spiritual life, as evidenced in the products which have come from the humble past and is intensified by the on-rushing of competing demands and lurid attractions of the modern age of changes and vicissitudes, a Church which possesses a rich heritage of poetical imagination waiting to be developed, and gifts of expression which need to be consecrated, the School should provide ministers of worship well trained in the sacred arts of worship, leading her four hundred thousand Christians to the Holy of Holies, enjoying the privilege of genuine communion with God and to worship Him in the beauty of holiness.

But to make our School adequate for the training of such ministers, our School must stand as the granary of rich heritage of the Church catholic. The Church in China, by the grace of God began her life many centuries later, which has enabled her to enjoy the privilege of a rich deposit of spiritual experience, intellectual findings, and the results of social experimentation. As the mighty force of Christianity moves on through the centuries, touching at various points human achievements and failures, absorbing, regenerating and purifying the arts of the ancient and mediaeval worlds, of extinct and extant races, it has accumulated possessions which surpass any other organization of the human social order. To enjoy such heritage is the greatest boon of the Christian Church of China. Our School of Theology should be a place to which people can look for the availability of a contact with such a heritage. Our School shall serve as its guardian and transmitter.

Serving as the training school of ministers with full appreciation of the past, its respect for historical continuity shall not fix its outlook only toward the past. Our School shall in the third place strive to be the rallying point and the recruiting ground for the Prophets. God forbid that our School shall be a house of manufacture, turning out priests and priests only, whose only ability is to perform prescribed formula, whose chief accomplishment is to fulfill the punctilious observances of antiquated practices, whose eloquence does not go beyond the parrot-like repetition of set doctrines, and whose zeal is confined to the blind championship of the faith of other people, and whose only virtue is slavish acceptance and obedience to the deliberations of those who have lived before them. No, the world is suffering from a famine of prophets. The paralyzing condition and ineffective service of the Church throughout Christendom in meeting the pressing demands of the age is not a reflection upon the Church for the lack of priests, but a ringing rebuke to her for the lack of prophets. The heart-broken cry of the Master over Jerusalem is just as poignant today as it was eighteen centuries ago.

The Church has not been without prophets, but she has killed them, and behold she is still in this very day persecuting the few who are still living. Loyalty to the faith has been misdirected from the right channel, to the channel of fighting against progress, the covering up of new flashes of heavenly light. The cry of repentance and of revolution has been again and again drowned in the mocking voice of "Crucify Him, Crucify Him." If our School of Theology can in any way serve the Christian Church of China and the Church catholic as a whole, it must make itself the rallying point for the prophets from all the corners of the earth. Its teaching, its life should furnish fires to produce that metal out of which prophetic stuff can be made. Their own people may not respect them, their own church may disown them and the multitudes who are after bread rather than Truth may stone them; they shall find at least one place where they can feel that there are some who have not bent the knee to Baal.

But the Church does not live only upon the sudden flashes of insight of the Prophets. Truth does not become available to people and its benefit reach the multitude always and only through the voice crying in the wilderness. Our School shall in the fourth place, fix itself to become an efficient laboratory of the investigators and experimenters of Truth. Investigation carried on prayerfully, reverently and fearlessly, unmolested by any considerations of selfish interest, be it that of individuals or parties, untrammelled by prescriptions of well-meant intentions but hurtful results. Investigators shall live under no shadow of worry and anxiety. Their only fear should be their failure to follow the light of God to Calvary. Along with investigation must go hand in hand experimentation. Experiments should be devised for the application of every truth which is worth investigation to the point where it can be made a part of the life of the Church, and through the Church a part of the life of the people. The lovers of Truth shall point to Peking as a place where the cruel sceptre of conventionalities does not and cannot hold sway.

Truth in intangible form scarcely benefits anyone. The Peking School of Theology should, therefore, in the fifth place, become an inspiring study for the spiritual artists, a place where they may give free play to their constructive imagination and articulate expression to spiritual experience and intellectual findings. There the artists are inspired; they see visions; they build new standards; they re-evaluate and re-interpret and accomplish that which is urgently needed today, restatement.

Future generations should find in the Peking School of Theology a place where revelations are not the stories of by-gone days but spiritual messages of Christianity, always enjoying perpetual youth and inexhaustible vigor.

Finally, the School of Theology shall strive always, first and last, to be a strong force for genuine Christian character. Her environment and her life should imprint upon its constituents the unmistakably clear marks of a Christian. The School is to provide Christian ministers and the supreme task of the Christian ministers is to build character and reproduce Christ's likeness in weak human nature, through His regenerating power. The School shall mould its men and women to be the true children of a loving Father, and it shall teach the Church to live in peace and harmony, to love to agree to differ at the same time: to have a good sense of proportion, an inflexible will of resisting the encroachments of evil machinations which lurk around the Church, and to conquer all obstacles which interfere with the development and the perfection of Christian brotherhood and all embracing communion of saints. "By their fruits ye shall know them." This is the acid test and the Peking School of Theology not only does not fear but should always be in a position to welcome it.

Are these ideals too high and the standards too ambitious? Dare we say that they are? In the metropolis of this great nation, in the continent, facing a new world and entrusted with the responsibility by the Church catholic. What else can we do? With pigmy force and meagre resources, what else can we do, but with humble and reverent hearts place our five loaves and two fishes at the feet of the Master whose eighteen hundred years under Galilean sky, in the same evening glow blessed them and multiplied them, and what is more all were satisfied and there were left remaining fragments a hundred fold more than the original little offering. In this spirit I come with trembling, yet joyful heart, to associate with you, the members of the faculty of Theology, and co-workers of the University.

The Christian Faith of Abraham Lincoln

By Rev. E. B. Sanford, D. D.

Honorary Secretary of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ

FROM early manhood an earnest student of the Bible, Abraham Lincoln after passing through a time of doubt and perplexity came in his later years to firm confidence and trust in the verities of Christian faith.

Fifty years ago I spent an enjoyable evening with the Reverend Dr. Miner who was pastor of the Baptist Church in Springfield, Illinois, at the time Lincoln was elected President of the United States. The parsonage was almost next door to the Lincoln home and the families were on close neighborly terms. The horse and carriage of Mr. Lincoln were frequently offered to Dr. Miner for his use in making calls upon parishioners living on farms outside the city. The Baptist pastor was naturally deeply interested in the career of his lawyer friend and neighbor and rejoiced in his election as President. He stood near him on the day when he made his tender farewell address to the company that gathered about the train that was to take him to Washington. These words could only have fallen from the lips of a follower of Christ: "My friends," said the man on his way to martyrdom and immortality of fame, "no one not in my situation can appreciate my feelings of sadness at this parting. To this place, and the kindness of these people I owe everything. Here I have lived a quarter of a century, and have passed from a young to an old man. Here my children have been born, and one is buried. I now leave, not knowing when or whether ever I may return, with a task before me greater than that which vested upon Washington. Without the assistance of that Divine Being who ever attended him I cannot succeed. With that assistance I cannot fail. Trusting in Him, who can go with me and remain with you, and be everywhere for good, let us confidently hope that all will yet be well. To His care commending you, as I hope in your prayers you will commend me, I bid you an affectionate farewell."

It was a tearful company of neighbors that saw the train bear away the man whom they had known in the years that from obscurity had brought him to a commanding place of influence in his home city and state and had now, by the will of the people, made him the greatest personality in the nation. We can understand that those who had followed with pride the career of their long time and honored friend, with peculiar interest and solicitude, watched his action during the fateful days of the War for the Union. At a heart-breaking period of this strife, that filled so many homes with tidings of death and suffering, sickness invaded the White House and the youngest son of the President, "little Tad," the pet of the household and the constant companion of his father, was stricken by illness that in few days proved fatal.

In the hour of this sore bereavement the thought of the President turned to his old ministerial friend in Springfield. He wrote to Dr. Miner asking him to spend a week as the guest of the "White House." At once responding to the invitation, he had during these days an opportunity of close companionship with the President, and was permitted to witness the pressure of innumerable duties which this war time brought to the attention of the sorrow-stricken head of the nation. In long afternoon drives the President found the coveted opportunity of conversing with his friend regarding the theme that was then having a constant place in his thought. That theme was the light which the Scriptures give upon the destiny of man and the immortality of the soul. Mr. Lincoln bore testimony to his friend that in Him who is the "Resurrection and the Life," he alone found hope and comfort.

In these hours of companionship Dr. Miner said he was struck with the unconscious feeling of respect and affection which Lincoln manifested in all his contact with the private soldiers of the army. As their carriage passed along the streets the President quickly acknowledged the salute of officers and would recall their names for the benefit of his friend. But when the salute was given to some private on duty, Dr. Miner said that, evidently in an unconscious way, Lincoln would partly rise from his seat. It was the outward expression of his inner heart thought and respect for the soldier in the ranks.

The friends parted with the hope that some time they might be neighbors again in their Springfield homes. But this was not to be. Their next meeting was to be beyond the shadow of mortality in the land of light and immortality.

Bolsheviki Warring on Religion

Patriarch and Metropolitan of Petrograd Held as Traitors—Archbishop of Moscow and Other Anti-Soviet Prelates Seized—Priests and Laymen Executed for Opposing the Pillage of Churches by Red Soldiers

By Courtesy of the "New York Herald"

Moscow, Nov. 1.

ACCORDING to the official report of May 12, the Archbishop Vedensky, the priests Kalinovsky, Krasnitsky and Byelkov and the Preceptor Stradnik made their way to the Troitsky monastery, the greatest in Russia, if not in the world, to see the Patriarch, who was under arrest there. (He is now under arrest in the Donoskol monastery, also near Moscow.) Krasnitsky enumerated the Patriarch's wrongful acts against the Soviet power. "Under your guidance, Patriarch Tikhon," said Krasnitsky, "the church has fallen into complete anarchy. By your counter-revolutionary policy and particularly by your opposition to the confiscation of the church valuables, it has lost all authority and all influence over the people. I call upon you to summon immediately a general assembly of the church and to cease completely administering the church until that assembly has given its decision."

Such is the Bolshevik story, which adds that "after some reflection the Patriarch signed his resignation, with a transfer of his powers to one of the higher hierarchs until such time as the church assembly met." The official statement carefully refrains from giving the name of the higher hierarch to whom Tikhon transferred his powers; and the general impression made by that statement is that the Patriarch admitted the truth of the charges made against him by Father Krasnitsky and agreed to submit himself to the judgment of the proposed assembly.

The New York Herald correspondent has been able to obtain from the highest source a full and authentic account of what happened on this occasion. It comes in a confidential note from an eyewitness and I give it here.

The priests mentioned above came to the Patriarch late at night and made him get out of bed. His Holiness came in a nervous and disturbed state of mind, but when he saw who were waiting for him he quickly regained possession of himself. The Bolshevik priests intimated that as a result of his arrest the church would remain without supreme guidance; but that as the Government would not permit any bishop proposed by His Holiness to replace him, it would be better if he named, as temporary acting Patriarch, Bishop Antonine, in whom the civil power had complete confidence. This Tikhon refused to do. Then the priests gave him to understand that, should he persist in this decision, all the eleven condemned persons would be executed, whereas if he obliged the Government by appointing Antonine as his successor their pardon was possible.

Some present or future Russian painter will be able perhaps to do justice to this scene and make of it a worthy companion picture to that awful one in the Tryetakovsky Gallery at Moscow, where John the Terrible is represented as embracing the body of his son, whom he himself murdered.

Scene. Night. A monk's cell in the great Troitsky monastery. On one side the old Patriarch, holy, but weak and simple minded. On the other side a group of debauched Communist priests who had all of them been police spies, urging the Patriarch to appoint as his successor, with unlimited power over the ancient Church of Russia, a degenerate Archbishop who was secretly associated with the Bolshevik leaders and who was, moreover, of unsound intellect.

The argument lasted all night. Finally Krasnitsky pointed out that the Patriarch was a prisoner. Under the circumstances he should, in accordance with the ordinance made by the supreme church administration on November 7, 1920, hand over his power to one of the two substitutes put forward at that time. These were Agafangel, the Metropolitan of Yaroslavl, and Vennamin, the Metropolitan of Petrograd. The Patriarch agreed to hand over his powers to one of these two, leaving the selection to the Government. The priests asserted that the Metropolitan Vennamin would never be allowed to take over the administration, but that there was no objection to the Metropolitan Agafangel. They also assured the Patriarch that the civil power would put no obstacle in the way of a general church assembly. The idea of calling such an assembly was welcomed, indeed, by the Patriarch. According to the ordinances of the 1917-1918 assembly, which re-established the Patriarchate in Russia, assemblies were to be summoned by the Patriarch every three years.

As a result of this long conversation, which lasted until daylight, the Patriarch signed with his own hand two documents, a letter to "Comrade" Kalinine, president of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee, and a letter to the Metropolitan Agafangel. The text of the first ran as follows:

12th May, 1922.

In view of the extremely difficult position of the church administration, which is the result of my having been summoned before a civil court, I consider it in the interests of the church for me to place temporarily—that is, until the church assembly has been summoned—at the head of the church administration either Agafangel, Metropolitan of Yaroslavl, or Vennamin, Metropolitan of Petrograd.

PATRIARCH TIKHON.

In his second letter the Patriarch informed the Metropolitan Agafangel of his appointment as Acting Patriarch, and begged him to come to Moscow as quickly as possible. Both letters were handed to the priests for delivery.

"Thus the Patriarch resigned neither his office nor his power," say the higher hierarchs of the Russian church.

On the day after an official notice announced to all Russia that the supreme head of their church had temporarily abdicated, all the Government newspapers published an appeal "to the faithful sons of the Orthodox Church of Russia," signed by "Bishop Antonine, representative of the progressive priesthood of the town of Petrograd." Then came the names of the "progressive priests": A. Vedensky, V. Krasnitsky and E. Byelkov of Petrograd; M. Stradnik, a preceptor; S. Kalinovsky, E. Borisov and V. Bykov of Moscow, and Rusanov and Ledovsky of Saratov.

"The heads of the priesthood have taken the side of the people's enemies," wrote the Bolshevik priests, "and the result has been that counter-revolutionary movements are continually breaking out inside the church. The latest of these unfortunate manifestations occurred when the church treasures were converted into bread for the hungry. On that occasion when there should have been a joyful movement of love toward our sinking brethren, there was instead, an organized opposition to the State. This opposition led to bloodshed and that blood was shed by men who wanted to prevent bread being given to Christ, when he was a-hungering. By refusing aid to the hungry, the church people tried to bring about the overthrow of the State. The appeal of the Patriarch Tikhon became the standard around which the counter-revolutionaries gathered clothed in the garments of the church."

The signatories declared they considered necessary the immediate summons of a general assembly to try those responsible for the destruction of the church, to decide the question of church administration, and to establish normal relations between the church and the Soviet Government, which had signified its assent to summoning this assembly. The Government newspapers gladly opened their columns to this proclamation.

Disgusted by this proclamation, friends and parishioners of the signatories demanded explanations. Bishop Antonine declared he was compelled to sign by the threat that if he refused the eleven condemned priests would be shot. Father Ledovski said the same. Father Bykov said that he had refused to sign, but that his name, nevertheless, had been printed among the signatories. A short time after

Father Borisov publicly seceded from "the Initiative Group."

On May 13 Father Vedensky and Krasnitsky, with a Government agent, went in a Government motor with the Patriarch's letter and the text of the above appeal to the Metropolitan Agafangel, Yaroslav. But they wanted him first to obligate himself to be guided by the Government through them. Agafangel demanded freedom of action and refused to sign any such document. He gave the priests only a letter for the Patriarch in which he said that he accepted the charge and would leave for Moscow as early as possible.

But he was unable to do so. Counting on Agafangel's advanced age, the Government had thoughtlessly consented to his appointment as Acting Patriarch. It hoped to find in him an obedient tool who would cover by his ecclesiastical authority all that was done under the dictation of the civil power by Antonine and his associates. But the Metropolitan retained more obstinacy than the Government had supposed, and it was then decided not to permit him to leave Yaroslav. The following night a search was made in his house by the secret police but no evidence against him was discovered. Nevertheless Agafangel was compelled to state in writing he would not leave Yaroslav and the Patriarch's letter notifying him of his appointment was taken from him.

On May 19 the Patriarch Tikhon went in an ordinary carriage without guard through all Moscow to the Donskoi Monastery. He stopped at the famous Iversky shrine to pray before the Blessed Ikon, Virgin Mother, venerated throughout Russia for centuries. Before leaving the shrine he blessed the assembled people. When he entered the Donskoi Monastery all the entries and exits were closed by Red soldiers. The "progressive priests" seized his rooms as soon as he left them. The Bolshevik representatives removed the seals from the archives in Chancery and then handed over to the "progressive priests" the whole machinery of the church administration.

"The progressive priests," partly from Moscow, partly from other towns, do not enjoy much respect of the laity, but they made an effort to obtain assistance of the best Moscow clergymen. Kalinovsky, Vedensky and Krasnitsky went around to such of the bishops as were not in jail, inviting them to join their group and scattering everywhere the most deceptive promises. They appealed to Bishop Ilarion and V. V. Guriev, secretary of the Supreme Church Administration, both in prison, promising them immediate release and quashing of the prosecution pending against them, but they only succeeded in winning over Bishop Leonide, an insignificant personage. To have some shadow of right to administration of the church they needed powers of some kind from the Patriarch, and they finally obtained those powers by deceit.

* * *

The priests of the old church, having no longer a center of union in the person of the bishop, act without confidence or harmony. But the faithful have shown hostility to the usurpers at public discussions instituted by the "initiative group" to propagate the new church policy. Three of these overflow meetings took place in the hall of the Conservators, holding three thousand persons. Statements and discussions accompanied by continual outbursts against the "reformers" who were called "traitors," "Jews," "murderers" and asked, "How much are you being paid by the secret police?" Bishops Antonine and Leonide were overwhelmed with insults on leaving the church after the service. May 29 was set for the consecration of Father Albinsky as bishop, the ceremony to be performed by Bishops Antonine, Leonide and Ionannika. But from early morning thousands of people blocked the entry to the cathedral, so that neither the bishops nor the candidates (who had been warned beforehand of what was awaiting them) dared appear in the cathedral, and the laying on of hands had to take place in the small chapel of the Patriarch. Not long ago a woman in Petrograd threw a stone at the High Priest Vedensky, wounding him in the head.

The program of "the initiative group" is clearly given in the Living Church, its organ in the press, and also in its original appeal. Its first task is to call the assembly. Here they will apparently exhibit gerrymandering, violence, deceit and corruption enough to make the most corrupt political "boss" in America blush with shame. All bishops hostile to the new church will be arrested on various pretexts or obliged to sign an undertaking not to leave their dioceses. Therefore they will be unable to attend the assembly. The Bolshevik Government holds the railways and will not allow unfriendly prelates to travel.

The tasks of the assembly will be:

(1) To judge and depose the Patriarch for his anti-Government actions. The civil power will try to show it is trying the Patriarch not as head of the Orthodox Church, but as a political criminal. But civil power will not prosecute until the Patriarch is dethroned and unfrocked. Even now the Soviet newspapers call him always by his original name in the world, not by his ecclesiastical name and title, Patriarch Tikhon. It is first necessary to detach the church from the Patriarch, and the "reformers" must convince the assembly that the Patriarch was guided by political and not by religious motives. To condemn the eleven priests to death it was necessary, as we have seen, for the Soviet Government to obtain the adverse expert opinion of Bishop Antonine, and in order to condemn the Patriarch it needs the adverse expert decision of the assembly.

(2) This unfortunate country, torn to pieces, has its only symbol of unity in the Patriarch. In him is the national center to which it tends. This is no secret to the Soviet Government. So the assembly, after having condemned the Patriarch, unfrocked him, given him back his name in the world and driven him forth from sanctuary in order that he may be seized by the Bolshevik police and tried for his life as a political criminal, will then declare that the monarchical principle has had its day for the church also. In other words, they will do away with the recently established Patriarchate, decapitate the church and replace the Patriarch by a synod; that is, by an impersonal and arbitrarily composed Soviet of bishops, priests and laymen—lackeys of the Government, which is already waxing enthusiastic over the advantages of the synodal system—as if "Comrades" Bronstein & Co. cared for any system of church government.

(3) The third clause of the assembly program touches on the relations between the new church and the State. "The separation of church and State must be recognized by the church, distinctly, unalterably, once and for all." But this separation is conceived in the somewhat original form of a complete subordination of the church to the civil power. Patriarch Tikhon dwelt on that very point when I saw him in April, 1920. "The State has separated itself from the church," he said to me, "and I think it has acted wisely, but it should therefore refrain from continually meddling, as it does, in ecclesiastical affairs."

Most readers of The New York Herald are aware of the political position in Russia. The Communists who rule Russia place at the head of all institutions, which are filled with secret enemies of Bolshevism, so-called "Communist Cells" of two or three men, to observe, inform and terrify the employees of those institutions. Now, Bishop Antonine and his colleagues are preparing at the present moment for the church a Communist Cell of that kind. And it is probable that such a cell will be formed, if it has not been formed already. A number of clergymen and laymen have applied to the All-Russian Central Executive Committee for permission to form themselves into such a cell; but it is significant that they have so far concealed their names. Let me quote, however, from their somewhat vague and long winded application:

"Being desirous in the measure of our understanding and force to aid the Soviet Government in the matter of the national religion," they propose "to form, in connection with the Central Executive Committee a special All-Russian Committee for dealing with matters affecting the Orthodox church. An Orthodox bishop, fully authorized to deal with ecclesiastical affairs, should be at the head of this committee."

The proposed committee is charged with several duties. The first and most important is, "to select from the whole mass of the Orthodox priesthood and laity those persons who recognize the justice of the Russian revolution and are loyal to the Soviet power, to protect those persons from any adverse church decisions and disciplinary punishments that may be inflicted on them by the Patriarchal administration." This paragraph is printed in heavy type. It is evidently the center of gravity. But the committee's duties are not confined to this. It is also to compel the church to assist the Government in the execution of its Communistic schemes.

(4) The last important point in the program of the assembly which is to be summoned is the formal blessing of communism. This economic doctrine now wishes to receive religious justification. "The Church," writes the reformers, "cannot remain indifferent to the spectacle of the struggle now going on against social economic untruth, against social economic inequality, against the existence of capitalism in the Christian world. It must condemn from the religious and moral point of view the principle of inequality in the social economic world, must condemn it finally and unalterably."

Continued next week

Anglo-American Friendship

By Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, D. D.

Minister of the Broadway Tabernacle Congregational Church, N. Y.

MR. WALTER H. PAGE, one of our greatest ambassadors to Great Britain, wrote many wise things, but none wiser than this—"I do know something about the British. I know enough to make very sure of the soundness of my conclusion that they are necessary to us, and we to them, else God would have permitted the world to be peopled in some other way." There are reasons why the United States should cultivate the friendship of all the nations of the earth, but there are special reasons why she should begin with Great Britain. There are reasons why America should be the ally of all nations in the great struggle for liberty and justice, but the nation with which it is easiest and most natural for her to unite is Britain. One can think of a union of the United States and Russia, the United States and Spain, the United States and Japan, but all these seem artificial combinations compared with the union of the United States and Britain. We belong together, as Page said. We are necessary to each other.

It is easier for us to work together than it is for us to work with any other foreign people, because in the first place, we speak the same language. We can understand each other without the aid of an interpreter. It is not easy to think in a foreign tongue. A difference of language is always a barrier in international intercourse. It can be surmounted but not without effort. When we converse with Britain, we are mutually intelligible from the start.

We have the same traditions, legal and social and ecclesiastical. We are a conglomerate people. Many nations have made their contribution to our life. Within the last hundred years three million three hundred and nineteen thousand Russians have entered our gates; four million seventy-eight thousand Austro-Hungarians; four million two hundred and eighteen thousand Italians; and five million five hundred thousand Germans. All these have brought with them inherited characteristics and customs. Each racial stock has left its mark on our thought and feeling, and has variously modified our career. But all of these foreign countries put together have not exerted the influence on our national character which has been exerted by the eight million three hundred and thirty-three thousand Britons who have found a home under our flag. In the first place, the British immigrants have for the most part been men and women of superior quality. The immigrants from Russia have been almost entirely from the peasant class, and the same is true of the immigrants from Italy. Germany has sent us not a few from her upper classes, but the bulk of the Germans have come from her peasant population. On the other hand, multitudes who have come from England and Scotland and Wales have been educated and resourceful men of high social standing, intellectually and morally equipped to become active forces in the shaping of community life. These British immigrants have come at strategic times in the course of our national development. Between 1620 and 1640, there came to New England twenty-five thousand Englishmen who exerted a greater influence upon the civilization of the new world than any other twenty-five thousand people who have ever crossed the Atlantic. These Englishmen laid educational foundations which have exerted a moulding power over the American mind and heart through nearly three hundred years. These men cut channels through which American feeling has flowed to the present hour. They created reservoirs of life from which refreshing streams have flowed all the way to the Pacific. It is because our colleges and universities were nearly all founded by men moulded by British culture and dominated by British ideals that the soul of Britain has been stamped upon the American people as has been the soul of no other nation. We have learned to think at the feet of Britain. It is her poets who sing to us. What foreign poets can compare with Shakespeare and Milton, Byron and Burns, Tennyson and Browning in inspirational power over American hearts? We are not ignorant of the statesmen of other lands, but certainly our American boys are more familiar with Cobden and Bright, Disraeli and Gladstone, Chamberlain and Lloyd George, than with the statesmen of any other European country. The treasure house of English literature is open to us because we have the key. No other foreign novelists have ever found so large a place in our hearts as that occupied by Scott and Dickens, Thackeray and Trollope, George Eliot and Rudyard Kipling. Nations fed on the same intellectual meat come at last to possess similar aspirations and entertain like ambitions. It is fitting that they should work together in noble causes.

But it does not follow that two nations will be friends because they speak the same language and read the same books. There are reasons why the maintenance of friendship between America and Britain is especially difficult. Language is a possible blessing, but it is also a source of embarrassment. We always know what the British are saying about us, and it would be well sometimes if we did not know. They also know what we are saying, and this is not always conducive to an increase of friendly feeling. Not a sarcastic or cutting word spoken by either side escapes the other. Both nations have cultivated the freedom of speech to the point of license, and Britons and Americans are alike in being sometimes brutally frank. We speak oftener of Britons than of any other foreigners, and in our talk there is sure to be many a foolish word. Britons also sin with their tongue. "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth." The tongue is indeed a fire. It sets on fire the course of nature, which includes London and New York, and sometimes there is no doubt that "it is set on fire of hell."

We are in especial danger of clashing because we are so much alike. We are commercial above all other peoples and we go to the ends of the earth in search of trade. Both of us are keen for concessions. We itch for special privileges. Both of us want the earth. It is natural that we should again and again step on one another's toes and fall into ugly humors. Commerce works for peace, and it also works for war. Because the Briton and American are adepts in exploitation, it is inevitable that there should be occasional clashes. In reaching for oil wells and gold mines, both nations forget sometimes their good manners.

Then again, we are not unlike in disposition. If the Briton is arrogant, the American is bumptious. Neither one likes to be talked down by the other, and yet that is what both are inclined to do. Arrogance passes easily into insolence, and insolence settles down into contempt and hatred. If we were more different in temperament, we should be less likely to quarrel.

Moreover, both peoples have memories which are not pleasant. A Briton does not forget that America was once an English colony, and an American does not forget by what process that relationship was discontinued. It is foolish to remember unpleasant things so long, but people do it, and it is not easy to change human nature. One of the blackest curses of war is that it lives in the memory for generations. Americans do not forget the war of 1776, or the war of 1812, or the war of 1861, nor do Britons forget them either. It is because of these memories, which, like smouldering subterranean fires, burn on in the heart, that we need to cultivate with unflagging zeal the feelings of appreciation and good will. The past becomes a curse when we allow it to spoil the present and blight the future. Britons now alive are not responsible for what their fathers did in the eighteenth century; nor are we accountable for what our fathers did. We are responsible for the building of a happier and nobler world. Remembering wrongs eats up strength, and nourishing feelings of resentment is degrading. The heart is healthy only when it is sweet. Life is strong only when the spirit is friendly. Instead of brooding over George III, it is more profitable to brood over Edmund Burke, and instead of meditating on Lord North, it is more sensible to meditate on Charles James Fox. The most English section of the English people have always been our friends. They stood with us through the revolutionary war and through our civil war, and they will in every coming crisis be found standing by our side. There is a higher Britain, as there is a higher America; a coarser and more earthy Britain as there is a coarser and more earthy America. It is important that the better America and the better Britain join hands in working for the betterment of the world. There are great tasks to be accomplished in the coming years. There are mighty perils to be met, vexing problems to be solved, giant enemies to be combatted. No one nation alone is sufficient for the arduous work which lies just ahead. Kindred nations must get together. They must consolidate their strength. Britain and America should work together because of their enormous size. The biggest of the empires and the biggest of the republics belong together in the great conflict for mankind. For these two giants to hold aloof from each other would be a betrayal of humanity. They are the two richest of all nations. Gold has been given to them above all others. The gold must be spent in the service of the human race. To squander it in arraying themselves one against the other would be a crime, for which there could be no forgiveness. They are close together physically. The Atlantic is but a brook, and often India is not far away. In the western world the two nations touch. We have a common boundary of three thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight miles. That is the most beautiful boundary line upon the planet. In all its vast length there is not a fort, not a gun. That line is a revelation and a prophecy. It reveals the disposition of the two nations. We trust each other. We are neighbors; we are friends. Friends we are going to remain forever.

When nations are friends they help one another. At the Washington conference, on the reduction of armaments, Britain in the person of Mr. Balfour, came to our assistance. When Mr. Hughes, our Secretary of State, laid before the conference the radical and amazing proposals of the American Government, Mr. Balfour promptly arose and declared the willingness of the British Empire to fall in with the American plan. His attitude rendered it impossible for the other nations to stay out. They all came in. Britain and America standing together set the pace for all the world. In that hour it was made clear again what is the power of these two mighty nations when on any point of world policy they are agreed. There is no reform too great to hope for if only the two English speaking nations work together. There is no sore on the body of humanity which cannot be healed if only Britain and America combine their skill.

But nations cannot work effectively together unless they like each other. The hearts must be attuned, before the hands can do their perfect work. There must be a disarmament of the heart. Suspicions must be cast out. Ugly feelings must be overthrown. Hasty and irritating words must be discarded. Mutual confidence must be established in the hearts of the common people, and good will must be permanently enthroned. It is not to be expected that all Britons shall think like all Americans, or that Americans shall agree in all points with their British brethren. Uniformity of opinion is not essential to a genuine and rewarding friendship. Again and again we shall differ in opinion, and our policies on diverse matters will be far apart, but this need not break or even mar our friendship. Our ideals are one, our purposes are one, our spirit is the same, and, therefore, war between us is "unthinkable," as Roosevelt long ago declared, and a growing friendship is natural and wholesome and to be expected. By the decree of the King of Heaven, we are comrades and friends, co-workers in the great enterprise of bringing the whole earth under the sovereignty of Love.

The Literary Supplement

The Recent Outstanding Biographies

THE STORY OF A VARIED LIFE

An autobiography by W. S. RAINSFORD. Doubleday, Page & Company, New York.

The last few months have been very prolific in biographies, both here and in Europe. Here we have had Mr. Lansing's Memoirs, Mr. Page's most remarkable volume of letters, the letters of Mr. Lane, Mr. Depew's Memories of Eighty Years, Mrs. Field's Memories, the story of Cardinal Gibbons' career by Mr. Hill, Dr. Levermore's Biography of Professor Dutton. To this list of outstanding biographies Dr. Rainsford's story must be added. In some respects it is the most interesting of all; it is so intensely human and so intimate. Dr. Rainsford has kept nothing back, beginning with his earlier years. Indeed, these stories of the childhood years are intensely fascinating. The pictures of the father and mother, the early home and severe school-days are drawn with truthfulness. They were not altogether happy days. The schools where the boy suffered have largely passed away, but many others have told the same story of the schools in England and Ireland of those days. Dr. Rainsford says he never attended a really good school either in Ireland or England. There are very vivid pictures of the London to which the boy went from Ireland when his father was called to St. John's, Belgray Square. He was a sensitive, over-grown lad who found himself in the vast city without very much interest in anything and without much guidance. He did meet Theodore Waterhouse and he exercised the first real formative influence on the boy. He taught him that there was little success in this world without brains and the disciplining of them. Dr. Rainsford says he did not like work then and never has since, but Waterhouse taught him to force his mind to several hours' systematic work each day. This has been the salvation of his life for he always has got his sermons by hard work. His contact with East London while engaged in mission work interested him in emigration schemes. Meanwhile he had ominous threatenings in his chest. He went to Canada in connection with this work and there also in the great wilds found healing. He also found himself. He decided to enter the ministry of the Church of England.

Returning home, he entered Cambridge University. His college life was unsatisfactory. He was too much of a genius, too individual. He worked hard but alone. He made few friends. His vacations among the poor of London brought him real returns. In looking back over those days, he realizes how much more he could have done for the people had he understood that the fault was in their training and surroundings more than in themselves and that what they needed was not the old super-natural gospel, but a new city, new homes, and human sympathy and love—what Jesus took to the oppressed of his day. He went to Norwich from Cambridge but soon he began to have doubts about things. He found his mind balking at the recital of the baptismal service and the Athanasian Creed. He resigned and came to America as a missionary—what outside of the Episcopal Church we should call an evangelist. His story of his experience as an Englishman to these first missions is both extremely humorous and pathetic. The upshot of it all was that he was so successful that he was called to St. James', Toronto. His experience here was extremely interesting. During his first months of preaching, while he was preaching his old mission sermons the great church was packed. Then his own ideas began suddenly to change. The new ideas of the Bible; the more liberal interpretation of theology; the changed emphasis on the character of God suddenly possessed him—the ideas Munger, Smythe, and many others were preaching, and Rainsford, always true to himself, preached accordingly. The attendance fell off, as it had done in Munger's church, and Smythe's in New Haven at first, but soon others took the places of those who left and in time Rainsford was master both of his own thoughts and of the situation.

The balance of the large book is taken up with the story of St. George's, New York. All of my readers know that story and I need not tell it here. But there is no better or more stimulating and suggestive book to the minister who wants to reach the people—all the people—around the church than this story. When he came to St. George's, New York, he found a huge church from which all but a few of the original parishioners had moved away. All around it was a new population of immigrants and working boys and girls. Rainsford determined to make this church a parish church again. The whole wonderful—wonderful is not too strong a word—story is told here in detail and with exciting vividness. I know no dime novel more full of incident and some of it was of the dime novel kind. The end was four thousand enrolled communicants and a great parish house swarming with people from the neighborhood. These things contributed to the wonderful success of this venture. First of all was the fact that Rainsford and his assistants—often students from the seminary—dropped everything else and went right into the homes of the people. They even went into the saloons. They opened a Sunday School behind a bar-room. They gradually convinced the people that the church was theirs.

The second contributing cause was that Rainsford was able to enlist the original group which he found when he came from J. Pierpont Morgan, W. J. Schiefelin and others of the great and wealthy at one end, to the German sexton—who plays a great part in the book—at the other end, in the most devoted, loyal spirit. They toiled with him night and day. Mr. Morgan good-naturedly growled about not being able to do his work so busy was he at St. George's. (Some of the most interesting passages in the book are the glimpses of the many men Rainsford knew intimately—Morgan, Roosevelt, John Morley, Brent, Brooks, Tyng. There are dozens of them. There are many interesting sidelights on Mr. Morgan's character.)

The third element in the success of the venture was the preaching. For years Dr. Rainsford went into the pulpit and talked to the people. He knew the human heart, as who could help knowing it living among the people as he did, and his sermons were directed to their needs. The church had open arms for everybody, free pews, with many ushers waiting to seat the people; the continued emphasis on the church as the home of the people. During all this time Rainsford was preaching the most liberal theology in the most outspoken way (much to J. P. Morgan's disgust, who hated the theology and loved the preacher, who contradicted him on Monday and was the first man there on Sunday.)

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

The personal element in the book is very prominent. Dr. Rainsford very frankly tells the story of his transition period. He started with the older, evangelical gospel and ended with a faith which it is hard to distinguish from Unitarianism. The story runs all through the book but one chapter is devoted to "Changes of Belief" in which he sums up the process. He outgrew the individualistic emphasis on Christianity long ago. The mistake is to be thinking about the salvation of one's soul. Brotherhood is the great thing and humanity will create new forms of Christian morality to meet the new social needs. As to him himself religion now means "the giving of the best we have to the best we know." He thinks the church is lumbered up with outgrown doctrines, creeds, and methods. One keeps articles that have absolutely nothing to do with Christian faith or life, miracles and the like. Christianity is the consecration to the Christian ideal—the only hope of the Church is in liberation.

By FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D. United Society of Christian Endeavor, Boston, Mass. Price $5.00.

Friends of Dr. Clark have been waiting for this book for a long time. Now that it has come, it is like a letter from one friend to another. The book has all the simplicity and charm of Dr. Clark's own character. It is not only a story of his life, but it is a story of his travels and of the many friends he has made in all parts of the world. The opening chapters make a delightful sketch of his father and mother. His own childhood is passed over briefly but it is interesting as showing the influence of a really Christian home upon character. Of course the chapters dealing with the pastorate at Lewiston, Maine, are absorbing because it was here that the Christian Endeavor movement was born. It was born just when the churches were perplexed with the problem of its young people, what to do for them, how to make the church a real element in their lives and it came as a Heaven-sent answer to this great need. It spread rapidly throughout the nation and in a few years there was a Christian Endeavor Society in almost every Protestant church in all the world. Those churches that did not adopt it formed societies which were largely founded on it, such as the Epworth League. Dr. Clark, of course, soon had to resign his pastorate and give all of his time to this rapidly growing work. When it was organized into a national society he became President and soon he became President of the world society. For many, many years he has devotedly given himself to this work alone and that without any compensation. It will be a great surprise to many to know that Dr. Clark has never received any salary as an officer in the Christian Endeavor Society. He has lived largely upon the proceeds of his pen.

Of course some of the most interesting portions of the book are the stories of Dr. Clark's travels. He has attended conventions in almost every city in the world. Between the meetings of these various national and local groups he has traveled in many lands and rested in many towns of Europe. During all these years of travel, he has written letters home, not only to the Christian Endeavor World but to all religious papers, and in many of the secular papers these letters have always been read with eagerness.

Of course another charm in the book is the picture of the great men he has met in every land. Dr. Clark has been fortunate in his acquaintance with the great and the good in all countries. Being himself of a most friendly disposition, he has everywhere made for himself friends and much of the charm of these glimpses of great men is that they are pictures of their personal, companionable characteristics rather than of their commanding greatness. In these pages one sees Mr. Moody and a hundred others at home.

As one reads on from page to page he becomes quite engrossed in Dr. Clark's theories of Christian nurture. On the whole, they are so natural and so sane. There have been criticisms on the part of many of one or two features of the Christian Endeavor movement, particularly that of the pledge. The chief criticism has been that the pledge in its minuteness and details is seldom kept. To all such criticisms Dr. Clark brings the answer and evidence of experience. After all the proof of his theories has been their workableness. To those who criticize the Christian Endeavor movement, Dr. Clark simply answers, "See what it has done." It should be said, however, that no one has been more open to suggestion than has Dr. Clark. Persistent in one aim, he has been the most broad-minded of men.

Finally, a word should be said about the delightful pages in which Dr. Clark describes the process of fulfillment of one or two of his long-cherished personal ambitions. Through all his life he had always desired above all things else not only to have a home but to make the home himself. His story of the buying of the old farm in its practically delapidated condition and how he rebuilt the house and rescued those acres of swamp, scrub oak and weeds is charming. Through all the pages of the book there shines the character of a gentle but persistent soul.

LIFE OF CARDINAL GIBBONS: Archbishop of Baltimore

By ALLEN SINCLAIR WILL, M.A., LL. D. E. P. Dutton & Co., New York.

The Life of Cardinal Gibbons in two handsomely printed volumes of six hundred pages each has been written by one who not only has had all records, correspondence and memories of many who were close to the great Cardinal at his command, but by one who was the close and intimate friend of many years' standing. This accounts for the personal touch, the human note running all through these volumes. We have here many delightful pictures of the gentle, kindly man as well as the long record of his public achievements and his career as a great ecclesiastic. Mr. Will had even held long talks with the Cardinal on his own philosophy of life with the purpose of some time being able to give the world an intimate and accurate picture of the Cardinal. Indeed Mr. Will began work on this biography as far back as 1909, not beginning at that time the daily conversations with the Cardinal but beginning to collect material from every source, that he might have the Cardinal's advice in the matter. (Mr. Will published some of the notes for the present biography in 1911 in a volume of four hundred pages.) The Cardinal had also kept a journal since 1868 which Mr. Will had at his disposal.

The Cardinal's life was intimately bound up with Baltimore. He was born there and spent most of his life there, having served for a time in North Carolina and as Bishop of Richmond. As Archbishop of Baltimore and later as Cardinal, he soon came to be identified not only with the Roman Catholic Church throughout the nation, but with public life in all its phases. The biography does well to dwell upon this, for he had more contact with Protestants than any other Roman Catholic Prelate in America has ever had. Living near Washington he became the beloved friend of practically all the Presidents and was constantly called to Washington to give advice on public affairs. He was a born counsellor, adviser and peacemaker. Irenic, gentle of disposition, kindly toward everybody, he helped to heal many a wound, smooth many a sea. His counsel was always being sought by Rome, and to him is largely due the sensible course which has generally been pursued by the Vatican in this country. The case of Henry George and Father McGlynn is told at some length and is "a case in point." The Cardinal used every influence to head off the demand by many American ecclesiastics that Henry George's book be openly condemned. In the Cahensly movement Cardinal Gibbons showed how he could fight when occasion occurred. Our readers will remember that this was a movement to perpetuate the nationalities of foreigners in America by using their languages in the churches and appointing bishops of their nationality. The Cardinal saw this was destructive of every fundamental principle of Americanism. He comes out with a tremendous utterance against the movement, declaring that "God and Our Country" should be the watchword of everybody in America. He came into touch with every great movement during his long life and his liberal views on most subjects along with his intense Americanism and his companionable nature made it possible for Protestants as well as Catholics to work with him. For instance, he served for many years with a group of Protestant leaders on one of Mr. Carnegie's peace foundations, and relationships were of the kindest and most helpful nature.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

The latter half of the second volume is devoted to estimation of his character and work, of his interests and personal life. The world war was a terrible blow to him and he never quite recovered from it. We are told in the chapter on his preaching that great numbers of Protestants were always present whenever he preached. In another chapter we are shown how much of a reader he was. Consumed with great executive tasks and administrative burdens, with a worldwide correspondence, we are told that he insisted on having a part of every evening when he was at home for reading the great books of the language. Mr. Will points out how his many sermons show the vast extent of his reading. There are interesting pages devoted to the extreme pains he took to keep himself physically fit. He really lived the simple life, he ate sparingly but always of nourishing food, he insisted on exercise in the open air every day and after he had gotten well over into the 80's it was not an uncommon thing to see him starting out for a three-mile walk in the environs of Baltimore. The writer of this review remembers how once he was talking to the Cardinal about Mr. Carnegie and was telling him how Mr. Carnegie walked around the big reservoir in Central Park every afternoon, rain or shine. Cardinal Gibbons speaking of this walking about instructed the writer to take back to Mr. Carnegie a challenge for a walking match. This was when both of them were well over into the 80's.

Among his friends he was all sweetness and gentleness. There was a kindly play of humor in his talk.

His relations with the Protestants were of the friendliest nature. When under severe attack by those who maligned him, it was seldom that he answered with a bitter or revengeful word. To those Protestants who would like really and truly to understand the best there is in the great Roman Catholic Church in America we would cordially recommend the reading of this book.

CONFESSIONS OF AN OLD PRIEST

By S. D. McCONNELL, D.D., LL. D. Macmillan & Co., New York. Price $1.25.

It is an interesting thing that just as Dr. Rainsford's story of his life which is so largely devoted to the story of his change of faith is published, Dr. McConnell's little book—it is only two hundred pages—should appear, which is pretty much the story of the same experience. Dr. McConnell has been for fifty years a minister in the Church. He was raised in the Scotch Presbyterian Church but his ministry has been in the Protestant Episcopal Church, as our readers know. It has been a very successful ministry and Dr. McConnell came to rank among the eminent preachers of his denomination. This book, however, contains almost nothing about his work. It is the autobiography of his mind, the story of the change from orthodox Christian faith to—well, what shall we call it? Perhaps the best word is his own. He believes in a church which is based simply and only on the Saviour, God. It should be "freed from bondage to history, untrammelled by Scripture, unharassed by definitions, open without question to all who 'neath life's crushing load' would find solace for their body and soul in symbolic union with the spirit and body of the broken God, the promise of all religions, the cry which makes all creeds one." This sounds very much like John Haynes Holmes' community church platform. In fact it is difficult to see how Dr. McConnell's general attitude is any more Christian than is that of Mr. Holmes. Dr. McConnell in tracing the path by which he has come to his present "emancipated position" examines the New Testament records with some minuteness. There are chapters on: Who was Jesus; The Ethics of Miracles; Jesus of the Gospels; Jesus and Christianity; Paul's Christianity; Jesus and Christ. The result of his examinations during the years began to satisfy his own mind that the Christ of the Church is not the Christ of reality, or the Jesus of the Gospels at all. But much more than that Dr. McConnell cannot feel that Jesus was right either in his idea of God or in his ethical teachings. Dr. McConnell is not sure that the loving Father of Jesus is the true delineation of God. He is sure that the teachings of Jesus are many of them impracticable and if universally adopted would lead to chaos. Not much is left of Jesus to Dr. McConnell except the sweetness of his character. Paul has given us an interpretation of Christ that is utterly foreign to anything in the Gospels. It is the Old Testament "Messianic," "proprietary." Not the religion of Jesus at all. Dr. McConnell discovered too, in his researches that our ideas of history are as far from the truth as our ideas of religion. The world that Jesus came into was not lying in moral darkness at all. "Instead of a 'heathen' world lying in moral darkness I saw one alive with moral earnestness." The real religion of today has come to us from the Gentile and not the Jew. It is time we stopped teaching our children these old fictions, time, too, we stopped teaching them about the Jews who were spiritually stupid and morally dull from the first. Dr. McConnell sees the thoughtful people everywhere leaving the

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

Church. The Church must open her eyes to these facts. "But she must look at things as they are today, not as they were in the fourth century or the twelfth or the eighteenth. She should no longer rest in a fool's paradise. . . . But the fundamental principle is the churches' door must be wide open and a welcome offered to everyone who wishes to enter and wishes to live his life following the Christian ideal, and upon no other condition expressed or implied." The dogmatic and too confident tone of Dr. McConnell's pages will considerably rile up the scholarly reader. He makes sweeping statements for which there are absolutely no foundations and states other disputed facts as though they were universally accepted.

Latin America

In March the Fifth Pan American Conference will be held at Santiago, Chile, and we therefore take pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to the following books on Latin America

HISTORY OF LATIN AMERICAN NATIONS

By WILLIAM SPENCE ROBERTSON, Professor of History of the University of Illinois. D. Appleton & Company, New York. Price $4.00.

This is the first comprehensive and reliable history of Latin America that has been printed in the English language. Its author has specialized in Latin American history for many years and has already produced a number of notable works in this field. Here he has undertaken an almost impossible task in one volume; so that the lack of detail in the history of each country is often disappointing. He has so thoroughly mastered his subject, however, that the generalization can be for the most part accepted without question.

The first six chapters are introductory to all of Latin America and as a background for study of the individual nations since they gained their independence. They cover the following: The environment of Latin America; European background; Discovery and conquest; Latin American colonies in the sixteenth century; The old regime in Latin America; Winning of independence. Then follow twelve chapters on the individual countries. Chapter seventeen includes Cuba, the Dominican Republic and the Central American Republics. The last two chapters are on problems and ideals of the Latin American nations and the relation of Latin American nations with other states.

The bibliography is comprehensive and well selected.

PROBLEMS IN PAN AMERICANISM

By SAMUEL GUY INMAN. George H. Doran Co., New York. Price $2.00.

Here is presented for the first time a book dealing with the whole question of relations, racial and political, between the United States and the twenty Latin American republics. It represents a collection of material gathered by Mr. Inman during his seventeen years association with Latin American countries and presents his matured views on the lessons that past relations have for the development of closer friendship between the Americas in the future. Some of the most important chapters are: Assets of Latin America, Problems of Latin America, The Monroe Doctrine in Latin America, Pan American Conferences, Latin America and the World War, Problems of the Caribbean Countries, and the Next Step to Inter-American Friendship.

This book is particularly valuable in preparing the mind of North Americans to confront the problems that will be discussed at the Fifth Pan American Conference to be held in Santiago, Chile, in March 1923.

THE NEW LATIN AMERICA

By J. WARSHAW, Ph.D. Thomas Y. Crowell Co., New York. Price $3.00.

This is a valuable book. It is human rather than historical in its treatment of Latin American life and problems. The author shows the tremendous development in Latin America during the last decade and in the chapter on "The End of Isolation," as well as throughout the book, he points very clearly to the fact that these twenty southern countries must now be considered an important part of the world. Some of the more interesting chapters are: Changing Industries, Paramount Foreign Interests, International Rapprochement. The Growth of Nationalism, Social Development, Public Enlightenment and Education, Cultural Development, The Position of Women, and As Latin America Sees Us.

The author speaks of four common misapprehensions which the reading of this book will dissipate; first, looking upon Spain as a decadent nation; second, lumping together Mexicans, Porto Ricans, Bolivians and Argentinians indiscriminately as "natives"; third, unduly stressing immoral conditions (Latin American morals are nothing more nor less than European Latin morals); fourth, considering Latin America as unsafe because of its revolutions, which in most instances are simply the clash of two leaders with a hand full of followers and cause no more destruction than our strikes.

GUIDE TO LATIN AMERICAN HISTORY

By HALFORD L. HOSKINS. D. C. Heath & Co., New York. Price $1.00.

Every student of Latin American history should possess this book since it has not only a large selected classified bibliography of material relating to Latin American history but has also a well-worked out syllabus for each of the historic periods in the development of Latin America and also for the various problems of those nations, including a splendid collection of references to Pan American and international relations.

CRUSADING IN THE WEST INDIES

By W. F. JORDAN. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York. Price $1.75.

The author, as agent of the American Bible Society, has lived in the West Indies for many years. He is a man of education, liberal spirit, a close observer and a lover of the people about whom he writes. While the object of the book is plainly missionary, there is much of general interest, character study, social conditions and commercial information for travelers. The most valuable part of the book are the four chapters on Haiti. While they are little more than travelogues, a clear picture is given of the life of the people. The dearth of material on Haiti makes this section of particular interest. Two chapters are given to Porto Rico and two to the little known French Islands. Rapid development for Santo Domingo is predicted. The last chapter includes observations on the importance of speaking good Spanish, climatic and sanitary conditions and a suggestion as to the supplying of good literature to Latin America.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

MEXICO AND ITS RECONSTRUCTION

By CHESTER LLOYD JONES. D. Appleton & Company, New York. Price $3.50.

This is one of the sanest books on Mexico written during recent years. It is one of the several volumes that have been produced recently at the instance of the Doheny Foundation, established by Mr. Edward L. Doheny, the oil magnate. This volume does not bear, as do some of the others, the odor of petroleum. Professor Jones, formerly of the Political Science Department of the University of Wisconsin has already established himself as a dependable authority on the Latin American question. His discussion of Mexico's present status, following ten years of social revolution, of economic conditions, the Mexican laborer, the foreigner under the new constitution, and of public finances, each of which is given one or more chapters, are most helpful, though of course some of his interpretations will be questioned.

INCA LAND

Explorations in the Highlands of Peru

By HIRAM BINGHAM. Houghton, Mifflin & Company, Boston. Price $5.00.

Plenty of romance has been written about the great Inca Empire and its civilization. But here is the best authoritative word of a scientist. Facts here brought out are not dry in the least, however, and those who have enjoyed Prescott will enjoy this modern "true tale" just as much.

A remarkably interesting account of expeditions conducted in 1911, 1912, and 1915 under the auspices of Yale University and the National Geographic Society to explore and map certain parts of Peru.

Professor Bingham's discovery of the wonderful Inca city of Machu Picchu on a well-nigh inaccessible peak of the Andes was called by the New York Times "the greatest archaeological discovery of the age." Buried beneath a jungle, its site inhabited only by three families of wandering Indians, this great stone city of the Incas was found in an amazing state of preservation, its temples, homes, streets, and burial caves bearing mute evidence of the high civilization of its founders.

The book is profusely illustrated and would make a beautiful gift volume.

HISPANIC ANTHOLOGY

Poems translated from the Spanish by English and North American poets. Collected and arranged by THOMAS WALSH. Hispanic Society of America, New York. Price $5.00.

The Hispanic Society of America has rendered a signal service to all interested in the Spanish tongue by the publication of this splendid volume which makes available to those who do not read Spanish or Portuguese some of the finest poems written in these languages. No volume that has appeared for many years will contribute more to the real understanding of the genius of the Hispanic peoples than will this one.

Translations are given of authors from Cervantes through Santa Theresa, Camoens, Juana Ines de la Cruz down to the modern poets like Ruben Dario and Amado Nervo. Among the translators are such well-known English speaking poets as William Cullen Bryant, Lord Byron, John Hay and Longfellow. The more modern poems are rendered into English verses by such writers as Dr. Thomas Walsh, Dr. Peter Goldsmith, Elijah Hill and Edward Fitzgerald. The reading of this volume will do more for a real appreciation of Spanish, Portuguese and Latin American life than the reading of a dozen books of travel.

This is the fourth volume of the Peninsula series of Hispanic notes and monographs which includes essays, studies and brief biographies issued by the Hispanic Society of America.

SOUTH AMERICA TODAY

By SAMUEL GUY INMAN. Committee on Co-operation in Latin America. Price 50 cents.

This is a recent report of Mr. Inman's observations on his trip to South America in 1921. The new social and religious developments are treated. The chapters are as follows: The Labor Movement, The Feminist Movement, The Temperance Movement, Movement to Modernize Education, Present Day Religious Conditions. Those who have not kept posted concerning social developments since the war will be surprised to see how rapidly these movements have taken form in South America. In the introduction the author says, "Political revolution in South America is being succeeded by social revolution. This outstanding impression is being borne in upon a present day visitor to the great continent in whatever direction he may turn."

The Drama and Religious Training

DRAMA IN RELIGIOUS SERVICE

By MARTHA CANDLER. The Century Company. Price $3.00.

The night has a thousand eyes, but Miss Candler must have a thousand and one. How else could she know so intimately the numberless religious dramatic productions in all parts of America during the past ten years? Her book is a compendium of the religious dramatic movement of our day. It is a critical evaluation of the movement. But it is more than that. Beneath the painstaking analysis and permeating the graphic descriptions of the various forms of religious drama, runs the burning enthusiasm of the prophetess. Miss Candler believes that the message of the church is the message that this generation needs for its own salvation and the salvation of civilization. And she believes that the dramatic medium is a most effective method of presenting that message with convincing power and beauty to the minds and hearts of modern young people.

There is a feeling in some quarters that the rapid increase in the use of religious dramatics is only a tendency to degrade the church. One cannot read this book and retain any such conception. Miss Candler finds the drama in the church developing, not toward entertainment, but toward worship. And she finds in that fact a "significant indication of our increasing spirituality." "Ten years, even five years—even a year of the right sort of effort in the experimental theatre of which we have been speaking cannot fail to have a regenerating influence upon the social, artistic, and spiritual life of the community." She gives an excellent summary of the practical steps taken thus far toward national organization of the movement for religious dramatics. And the Interdenominational Committee on Religious Drama which she mentions as the next step, is already a reality, such a committee having been appointed by the Federal Council of Churches.

Miss Candler has done her work exceedingly well and her book will be a standard for many years to come.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

THE DRAMATIC INSTINCT IN RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

By THOMAS W. GALLOWAY, Ph. D., Litt. D. The Pilgrim Press. Price $1.75.

Dr. Galloway is a Doctor of Literature; yet he knows how to express himself. He is a Doctor of Philosophy; yet he can say what he has to say in one hundred fifteen pages. He has been a Presbyterian elder these many years; yet he has retained his sense of humor.

He holds in this book that the primary purpose of plays and pageants in the church school "is to develop the children in the drama." But the five religious dramas which form the second part of the book, and which, we are told, were prepared by young members of his church school, show a very definite sense of dramatic values. This book will not supplant Miss Miller's book on the dramatization of Bible stories, which is a more elaborate and thorough-going treatment of the whole subject. But if Miss Miller's book is exhibit A, Dr. Galloway's is exhibit B in the evidence that young people are capable of dramatizing Bible stories under intelligent leadership and of gaining genuine educational values in the process. As Dr. Galloway says, "choice is at the core of character. . . . We want to develop in our boys and girls the power and the disposition and the habit of making right decisions or choices, whatever may be the circumstances." The production of religious dramas he finds to be the most faithful method of this development. His principles and methods are practically identical with those of Miss Miller, but in the actual production of drama he has shown a little more sense of dramatic values and has been less concerned with using the exact Biblical words.

Religious Education of Children

STORIES FOR SPECIAL DAYS IN THE CHURCH SCHOOL

By MARGARET W. EGGLESTON. Published by the George H. Doran Company. Price $1.25.

Another book of original stories from an experienced worker in the field of religious education. The aim therefore is usually evident, and is implicit in the story. There is never a dragged-in moral. The point of approach is often that of some occasion in the Church year, Rally Day, Thanksgiving, Christmas, the New Year, Young People's Day, Good Friday, Easter, Mothers' Day, Memorial Day, with some less usual times, such as "graduation of seniors." Many are from Mrs. Eggleston's own experience. One of the most valuable things is the suggestion that a story be used in the opening worship of the Church School to help give the needed atmosphere.

AS THE TWIG IS BENT

By ARTHUR H. LIMOUZE. Published by the Westminster Press. Price 40 cents.

Arthur Limouze is not only one of the pioneers in the Daily Vacation Bible School movement, but is still one of its leaders. Many schools have in their assemblies what is known as a "habit-talk," as distinguished from the Bible lesson, and this series of 26 habit-talks is the best we have seen. The movie habit, table manners, earning, giving, praying, worshipping, reading are included. The habit-talk has this advantage over the children's sermon, that it may be followed by a project in which they participate. This book would be stronger if it led to self-imposed projects of the pupils.

THE MOUSE THAT STOPPED THE TRAIN

By J. E. PARSONS. Published by H. R. Allenson.

Twenty-one stories, or rather children's sermons, unique in that they are for younger primary children rather than for juniors. They are about things the six-year-old understands. They are good, too, in spite of the title, and in spite of the moral that sometimes is appended. The dedication is good, "To my father, who by telling stories for nearly twenty years made Sunday afternoon a happy time for hundreds of tiny tots who passed through Southwick Sunday School, and to my mother who cared for the children at home, and made Sunday evening memorable for us by her winsome way of telling the old, old stories from the grand old book."

EVERY-DAY LESSONS IN RELIGION

By CLARA BELLE BAKER. Published by the Abingdon Press.

The three together make the third primary course in the Week-Day School series, Miss Colson's "First Primary Book in Religion" and "Second Primary Book" being its companion volumes, though for younger grades. The two smaller volumes of this set are readers, for the children, in spite of which they have quite unattractive covers. The stories in them are in splendidly clear type, and are well illustrated; a little more than half are Bible stories retold, and a little less than half, poems. For example, after "The Baby of Bethlehem," and "The Gifts of the Wise Men," which are well told in Bible language, a third lesson is the old carol, "Three Ships" (in the treatment of which in the teacher's book, however, is no suggestion that the ships are really ships of the desert, camels). The stories are "probably the first Bible stories that the children have read. To guide the child in his first reading of these greatest stories is a privilege which the teacher must accept with prayerful humility." The suggestion is that several copies of the readers be accessible in the room when the children enter the room for their first session in the fall. The sixty-four lessons are intended to cover a single year, which means roughly, two lessons a week. Some teachers, the author says, may prefer to change the order slightly, and take the harvest lessons in November, but the teacher who follows the order of the book will find no inappropriateness, for children will read in January about camping expeditions and seem to enjoy the contrast. We regret that the picture to illustrate the lesson on the brown thrush had to be one of a brown thrasher, which is not even a cousin.

A FIRST BOOK IN HYMNS AND WORSHIP

By EDITH L. THOMAS. Published by the Abingdon Press. Price $1.25.

A hymn book for leaders of music in kindergartens, and Beginners' and Primary Departments, to be compared with the old "Blue Jenks," to which it is far superior. It was much needed, not only for its hymns but also for its marches. Yet it is not final. Many fine tunes have mademorganatic marriages with inferior words, for example, weak words to "Integer Vitae." And some of the tunes are unworthy of the words, especially the older "infant class" tunes. Some revisions, as of "Fairest Lord, Jesus" bring hymns nearer the child's experience, and yet there are some notable omissions, in a field where good material is hard to find. It is weak in seasonal hymns, and stronger in missionary ones.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

Economic and Political Aspects of Life

THE ECONOMIC BASIS OF POLITICS

By CHARLES A. BEARD. Alfred A. Knopf, New York.

Recently "Wallace's Farmer" said editorially that politics is the arena where economic groups strive for advantage and mastery. These lectures of Prof. Beard drive home this definition. First we have an admirable synopsis of the teachings of Aristotle, Machiavelli, John Locke, Madison, Webster and Calhoun. In the second chapter, by means of numerous illustrations, Prof. Beard demonstrates that the State is made up of economic groups. Then comes a discussion of the doctrine of political equality as it has been expounded by Rousseau and as it has been attempted in democracies. The final chapter is on contradiction and outcome. Here Prof. Beard points out that "the democratic device of universal suffrage does not destroy economic classes or inequalities. It ignores them. Herein lies the paradox, the most astounding political contradiction that the world has ever witnessed. Hence the question arises: Does political democracy afford to mankind a mastery over its social destiny? To ask this question, according to Prof. Beard, is to answer it in the negative. For his final conclusion he goes to James Madison in the Tenth Number of The Federalist: "To express his thought in modern terms: a landed interest, a transport interest, a railway interest, a manufacturing interest, a public-official interest, with many lesser interests, grow up of necessity in all great societies and divide them into different classes actuated by different sentiments and views. The regulation of these various and interfering interests, whatever may be the formula for the ownership of property, constitutes the principal task of modern statesmen and involves the spirit of party in the necessary and ordinary operations of government. In other words, there is no rest for mankind, no final solution of eternal contradictions. Such is the design of the universe. The recognition of this fact is the beginning of wisdom—and of statesmanship."

INCENTIVES IN THE NEW INDUSTRIAL ORDER

By J. A. HOBSON. Thomas Seltzer, New York. Price $1.75.

Mr. Hobson starts by saying that the old economic order is collapsing. The new is being built. "The new order emerging in this country (England) is neither State Socialism, Syndicalism, Voluntary Co-operation nor Guild Socialism, but a blend of these and other schemes, varying with the conditions of the several industries. But it embodies certain common objects: (1) The abolition of unrestricted profiteering; (2) the substitution of representative government for employers' autocracy; (3) measures of apportioning the product equitably and by pacific agreement among the parties interested in the industry." Mr. Hobson's thesis is that there will be incentives in the new industrial order which will compare with or exceed those of the old. He presents his case very ably, and it very much needs to be presented in these days when the defenders of orthodox economics foretell nothing but dire consequences if the old order should be changed. There are chapters on Economic Activities and Their Incentives, Psychological Tests of the New Industrial Order, Brains in Industry, Incentives to the Efficiency of Labor, the Interests of Consumers, the Government of Industry. Mr. Hobson is a prominent English Economist and what he believes and attempts to prove is of great value to those who want to change the present economic order.

GUILD SOCIALISM, An Historical and Critical Analysis

By NILES CARPENTER, Ph. D. D. Appleton & Co., New York. Price $2.50.

Dr. Carpenter is now Instructor in Social Ethics at Harvard. This book is the result of eight years of study of the "Guild Idea," including personal investigations in England, where it has been most successful. The material is arranged in three parts: historical, descriptive, critical. The last is particularly interesting, though the other two are also admirable summaries. The author believes that the Guilds will make a real contribution toward solving industrial problems, but he is rather dubious now, after this thorough study, in regard to their value. He believes that the guilds disregard fundamental economic considerations, that they do not square to the facts, that they misread economic history and theory, etc. But he also pays tribute to the achievements of the guilds, their attempts at industrial democracy, their willingness to co-operate, the value of their experiments. The book, on the whole, makes valuable source material on the subject.

PUBLIC RELIEF OF SICKNESS

By GERALD MORGAN. The Macmillan Company, New York.

This book brings together very valuable information, including studies of cash relief and medical treatment by State-aided, voluntary insurance in Denmark and by compulsory insurance in England and Germany. All of these accounts are objective and frankly point out the weakness as well as benefit of the systems. The author takes his stand, however, for a separation of cash relief and medical relief and makes an interesting and effective argument for the adoption of compulsory health insurance for cash benefits only in America. He thinks medical relief should come from public health centres.

ROBINSON CRUSOE, SOCIAL ENGINEER

By HENRY E. JACKSON. E. P. Dutton & Company, New York. Price $3.00.

This is a well-written and fascinating book, with an attractive title. Mr. Jackson pleads for the recognition by employer and employed of the fact that they can be allies, that by a discovery of a community of interest there can also be found the road to industrial peace. Interpretations of the story of Robinson Crusoe make Part I. Mr. Jackson calls it an undiscovered book. In Part II. we have presented the lessons which modern industry can learn from Robinson Crusoe, and in Part III. Mr. Jackson elaborates on "How Robinson Crusoe solves the labor problem." The book is a rather roundabout plea that industrial groups should co-operate for the benefit of each and all.

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

Heredity and Child Culture*

DR. CHAPIN is a distinguished child specialist, but he has written a book of especial interest to ministers. He says a great many sensible things, not only about heredity, but also about social work, and his point of view is religious in the best sense. He has inherited a strain of religious interest, and again and again there bobs up his old-fashioned idea that the family is an institution of first importance and that the home is the best thing in American life. One comes away from the book with a new confidence in the importance of building up and ministering to the families of one's parish, and a new perception that ministering to people in age groups instead of in families has distinct limitations. Dr. Chapin's clear-cut common sense about institutional care for children is refreshing. This is a book for church workers to turn to for guidance in their social work, to be studied, especially by the leader of that neglected arm of the church, the Cradle Roll, and to be put in the hands of parents.

Dr. Chapin is one of America's best-known child specialists. A graduate of Princeton in the distinguished class of 1877, he has not only a large private practice, but has also given himself freely in social work. One of the founders of hospital social service, he has probably done more than any other living man to encourage childless couples to adopt dependent children, and the method he has worked out in the Speedwell Societies for caring for children in supervised and subsidized homes instead of large and expensive institutions is creative work of highest importance.

The latter method of caring for dependent children has come in for severe criticism from the Roman Catholic Church, which, in practice, is building up all over America huge child-sheltering institutions instead of developing Christian homes. As the author says, the United States, and, we think, especially the sections where Catholicism is strong, are institution-ridden. New York State, Maryland, California and the District of Columbia actually pay out huge sums of money each year to support public charges in privately run buildings. The whole system is wrong. The general death rate of children under two years in New York has been about one-fifth that of institutions. "Aside from infection, the infants in institutions often progressively lose weight and lie in rows of cots in an apathetic condition, as there are usually too few attendants to take them up for needed change and exercise. It is especially at night that babies lie unattended from this cause. They rarely get enough fresh outside air: oxygen is needed as well as food to keep them in vigor. All these factors result in the devitalized babies so often seen in institutions. There is an extraordinary agreement on this question among those who have had the widest opportunity for observation and experiment." As a substitute for the institution, except in the case of defective children, he advocates the "unit system of intensive boarding out." Four units are operating near New York, the first of which was along Speedwell avenue in Morristown, New Jersey, where a strong committee of women were the local managers. A number of good homes available for boarding out were found. A system of constant oversight was inaugurated, especially as to diet and hygiene, with a salaried physician and nurse. The foster mothers, under such training, become fairly expert in handling young children under conditions far superior to those of the big dormitory. The homes in which the children are placed are helped both financially and in morale. This is good, old-fashioned emphasis on the family, and is worth careful study. It ought to be said that Massachusetts and New Jersey are both undertaking now to board out children in family homes, and Pennsylvania does the same thing through its Children's Aid Society. An essential part of the plan is to try to place the children in permanent free homes.

About the illegitimate child he is again at variance with traditional theories. Of the mothers he says, "I have rarely seen any of these young women who could be considered. There is no connection between this class of women and prostitutes." If marriage is out of the question, he recommends, not that the mother keep her baby, for that is usually disastrous for the child, but that she face her trouble away from home, and, after nursing her baby long enough to give it a good start, have it adopted into some family able to give protection and training as well as love.

About the pre-school age he says, "Boards of health and welfare stations have concentrated on the infant with a result of lowering infant morbidity and mortality; school physicians and nurses have given oversight to older children, but the pre-school child has fallen between these two periods." Here is a unique opportunity for the Church with its Cradle Roll and other machinery. The original focus of tuberculosis infection is nearly always started during the early years. He recommends a physical examination every six months, for defects can usually be corrected at the start.

**Heredity and Child Culture.* By Henry Dwight Chapin, M. D. Published by E. P. Dutton & Company, 219 pages, $2.50.

INTERNATIONAL LESSON

FOR FEBRUARY 11, 1923

The Spirit of Prayer

By Rev. Henry Stiles Bradley, D. D.

LUKE 18:1-14

"The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise."—Psalm 51:17.

TWO classes of men in our time find it difficult to pray. The first is made up of those who, sympathizing with, and accepting the conclusions of the modern scientists, think that science has abolished superstition, and, in so doing, has also annihilated the realm of the supersensuous, and abolished God. The science of meteorology has destroyed the superstition of the "Prince of the Power of the Air." The science of medicine, as applied to insanity and epilepsy, has destroyed the superstition of demoniac possession and witches. The science of bacteriology and sanitation has destroyed the superstition of "scourges" and "plagues."

These people have come to have a wholesome regard for law. They remind us that law operates in all the realms of which we have any knowledge, and they draw the rational inference that it is the part of wisdom for us to discover the laws of nature and conform to them. They suggest that the cure for yellow fever is not prayer, but the annihilation of mosquitoes; the cure for bubonic plague is not sacrifice but the extermination of rats.

Law holds in physics, chemistry and biology and we cannot change it. So they have hastily concluded that there is no place for prayer.

They are right as far as they have experimented, but they have not gone far enough.

I not only have a body that is related to those realms in which the laws or forces of physics, chemistry and biology operate, but I am also a spirit and am related to the supersensuous realm in which my heavenly Father's conscious mind and heart controls, and prayer is at once my door of access to that realm, and the scientific method of appropriation of his Spirit. I use a hammer to drive a nail, hydrogen to lift a balloon; an alkali to neutralize an acid, bread for nourishment of my body, and prayer for the life and health of my real self. If I want spiritual strength, courage and peace it is as scientific to pray as it is scientific to put yeast in my dough if I want leavened bread.

Another class that have caught glimpses of the greatness of God are so overwhelmed with the sense of His infinity and eternity that they find it equally difficult to pray. They say truly that it is stupid to talk of abolishing God. He fills all spaces. He is in the cosmic sweep of nebulous mists, millenniums of light-years beyond the milky way. He is from eternity backward to eternity forward. His knowledge and wisdom are as truly infinite as are his power, duration or presence.

These people tell us that when they try, thus, to think of God they find it impossible to conceive that such an infinite being can pay any attention to a mote of a man dancing for a moment in the atmosphere of a tiny planet like the earth. How can such a puny atom in infinite space, existing but a puny moment in an eternity, presume to pray to God?

But these people should not overlook the equally important truth of God's infinite nearness and minute care. He is no more truly in the whirling star mists than He is in the dance of electrons within the atom. He is as careful to wrap the coat about a mustard seed as He is to "tighten the girdle of Orion." He colors the petal of the wayside weed with as exquisite precision as he paints the sky at sunset. He is as truly seen in a mother's love for her babe as in the making of suns and satellites, for He is not only "over all things and through all things, but in all men."

"Glory about thee, without thee; and thou fulfillest thy doom

Making Him broken gleams, and a stifled splendor and gloom.

Speak to Him thou for He hears, and Spirit with Spirit can meet—

Closer is He than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet."

The object of prayer is not to change or break God's laws, but to conform to the highest laws in the spiritual realm, therefore we pray that His will and not ours be done, because His will is inspired by infinite wisdom and infinite love.

We do not pray in order to attract the attention of an Infinite Being to the momentary needs of puny creatures, but to bring our child-spirit into harmony with the Father-Spirit, who not only sets suns spinning in their courses, but broods and yearns over His developing children; therefore we pray in childlike trust.

We do not pray in order to inform Infinite Wisdom of our needs, for he knows them far better than we, but, in communion with our heavenly Father, to become the more aware of our own lack; therefore we pray in sincere modesty and humility.

We do not pray in order to persuade a reluctant God to give us what we want. He is always eager to give us the best we can take. We pray in order that we may be developed and prepared to take the best.

Like the importunate widow we persist in prayer but, unlike her, we deal with One whose highest joy is to give us not only good things but His Holy Spirit,—His very self.

We pray to one whose very delays are for our good; therefore we pray in patience. We recognize the time element in the growth and establishment of good, and therefore we try to be reasonable with God.

We recognize that if God granted all our prayers the moment we make them we should bid a long farewell to manhood. If prayers were a sort of Alladin's lamp by which we could get anything we want the moment we ask for it, the world would be a bedlam. The old proverb says that if wishes were horses all beggars would ride, but that does not follow, for some beggars would wish that their fellow beggars should have no horses, and walking would be as popular as it is today.

We pray to One who, in His love for us, sifts, sorts, tests and chastens our desires. Most of us can devoutly thank God that He did not grant the very earnest prayers of our childhood, or youth, and has even withheld the earnest desires of our early manhood. Our ambition as a child of six was to be a policeman or fireman, but by the time we were twenty we were glad that our earthly father had different plans for us.

We pray recognizing that our chief need is not things, but character, which comes by working, waiting enduring delays, trying again and again after repeated failures.

When we realize that God is the great, friendly Father-Spirit from whom we sprang, who is the giver of every good and perfect gift, and the source of every noble thought and purpose, our prayer to Him takes the form of thanksgiving for His countless mercies and blessings. It is the prompting of our sense of gratitude for His loving-kindness. It is the child's utterance of loving appreciation to its Father for favors received.

But every thoughtful man also realizes his blunders, mistakes, faults, failures and sins, and so prayer becomes a confession and a cry for forgiveness. It is not self-righteous justification, nor boasting of our superiority over our fellows. The Pharisee who eulogized himself in the temple wholly lacked the spirit of prayer, but the publican who in humility besought divine pardon "went down to his house justified."

God is as necessary to spiritual life as sunlight is to vegetable life, and prayer is in man what heliotropism is in a plant. It is the bringing of oneself to the source of life and health and strength. It is the "turning of one's soul in heroic reverence to the All-wise, the Omnipotent, the Supreme."

One of the inevitable results of prayer is that we become divinely energized. We touch the source of power and it flows into us.

There stands a trolley-car, dark and still. The trolley-wire overhead is full of power, and it is in reach, but the trolley-pole is not in touch with it. When the connection is made the lights flash on, and the car moves up the hill. So, we are spiritually blind and impotent, while infinite power is in our reach, and prayer is the spiritual connection through which the divine illumines and energizes us.

Another result is spiritual transformation. The law in the spiritual realm is that we grow like that which we love, admire and adore. In prayer we "mirror the glory of the Lord with face unveiled, and so are transformed into the same likeness as Himself, passing from one glory to another."

The Ministerial Police Recorder of Princeton

Having disproved the adage that it takes a thief to catch a thief, the Rev. Dr. David B. Tomkins, pastor of Princeton's thriving Second Presbyterian Church, has announced his retirement as Police Magistrate and will henceforth devote himself exclusively to the duties of his parish.

His passing ends a dramatic chapter in the annals of the university town. Two years ago Dr. Tomkins criticised from his pulpit the laxity of law enforcement. Mayor Browne countered by promptly offering him, without any condition whatever, the post of Police Recorder. Some of the pastor's respectable parishioners shrugged their shoulders, and hardened criminals smiled contemptuously when Dr. Tomkins accepted.

It was believed that a man of his blameless and cloistered life could neither discover nor deal with crafty and long-practiced evil doers. This impression was heightened when Dr. Tomkins with other officials instituted a raid upon a little gambling room in an alley of the Negro quarter, where he understood "crap shooting" had been carried on to the annoyance of the neighbors. After the dice had been seized and carried off by police officers wiser in wickedness, it is reported that the uninitiated minister-magistrate remained hunting for the guns with which "craps" are "shot."

Such amusing stories ceased, and the hardened criminals put their tongues in the other cheek when Dr. Tomkins took off his coat and settled down to his task. He decided to turn back his salary to the borough as well as his part of all fines and costs, since he wished to make it too expensive to be disorderly and preferred not to share in the profits of this suppression of vice. Fines went up with the cost of living, and $25 to $50 was the usual levy on a first offender. * * *

A frequent woman visitor at the court had a neighbor haled before the bar of justice for "cussing her out" on the streets. The magistrate inquired of the complainant what her answer had been. The rejoinder proved to have been off the same piece with the cursing and equally unprintable. The magistrate did not wish therefore to strain the quality of mercy in this case, and scored a well-deserved "double" by fining both accuser and accused.

Though himself a motorist, he stopped the speeding nuisance by imposing characteristic fines upon all caught in his drag-net, including, it is said, a parishioner, a fellow minister, and several prominent citizens. It soon became apparent that Dr. Tomkins not only took his humble office seriously, but that he was really getting results, and he gave Princeton for miles around the reputation of being a spotless town. His refusal to accept reappointment, offered to him for the third time by Mayor Browne, has been received with the deepest regret. * * *

As a good Presbyterian, the doctor has always believed in original sin. He has, however, now discovered that some sinners are even more original than he had ever believed. It is said that some of these, having learned from Dr. Tomkins that the way of the transgressor is truly hard, have forsaken the primrose path and reformed, and may now be seen on Sundays trying to learn more from the doctor and shambling into the rear benches of his Nassau Street church. The good citizens of Princeton, with glum faces, are going about wondering what will happen in 1923, now that they are forced to return to the old unhappy separation of Church and state.

—New York Evening Post.

One Book a Week

Continued from page 155

About moral training there is a valuable chapter, with the striking suggestion that the early development of self-control will have beneficial effect through life on the internal secretion glands, which in turn seem to have a large influence on the development of man.

About marriage, he says it has not been taken nearly seriously enough. Applicants for a license ought to give proof that they are both physically and financially fit. Of the two hun-

THE TRAINING SCHOOL FOR CHRISTIAN WORKERS

(Interdenominational)

Under the auspices of the Woman's Branch
NEW YORK CITY MISSION SOCIETY
Mrs. A. F. Schauffer, First Directress

Prepares Young Women for Christian Leadership

The course of study includes: Bible Study, Church History, Christian Missions, Psychology and Pedagogy, Organization and Administration of Religious Education, The Art of Story Telling, Hygiene and Health, Practical Experience in Church and Mission Work.

Eight Months Course — October to June

For further information, address:

Miss Charlotte A. Porter, Dean
7 Gramercy Park, West New York City

NOW READY

a New Song Book

"RODEHEAVER'S GOSPEL SONGS" →

For Church, Sunday School, Revival, and all religious services.

Singly 45c cloth (Quant. 40c)
Post- 35c limp not 30c paid 30c manilla prep. 25c

Ask for returnable copy for examination.

We also publish Victory Songs, Songs for Service and Awakening Songs at the same prices.

Most of our songs are obtainable on
RAINBOW RECORDS, 75¢ each

Ask for our catalog of music and records

The Rodeheaver Company

668 McClure Bldg.
Chicago, Ill.

Dept. 12 814 Walnut St.
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Big Business of Being a Little Church

Perhaps yours is one—a little church that is bursting with activity. That has outgrown its home; clubs, societies, public meetings day and night, and never a chance for one of them to be held quietly and without interruption.

For nearly half a century we have helped thousands of churches in the big business of being little. Helped them with Wilson Section-fold or Rolling Partitions that turn one room into many; many into one. Big rooms into small ones, and when you want the big room again, they fold out of the way. They can be made to match any design or finish.

If yours is a big little church, one of us would like to talk with you. Or write us for details now.

Wilson Rolling Partition in the Second Baptist Church, Atlanta, Ga. Note how one room becomes many or only one.

J. G. WILSON CORPORATION

17 East 36th St., New York

Offices in Principal Cities

EUROPE — ORIENT AROUND THE WORLD

Popular Tours at Popular Prices. Comprehensive itineraries, experienced leaders, splendid accommodations, frequent sailings.

Send for Booklets

Bennett's Travel Bureau

500 Fifth Avenue
New York City

681 Market Street
San Francisco, Cal.

The Woodlawn Cemetery

Is readily accessible by Harlem trains from Grand Central Station and by subway. Small lots at reasonable prices. Write or telephone (4855 Gramercy Park) for Book of Views or representative. Office 20 E. 23d st., New York City

1922 PASSION PLAY beautifully illustrated by 58 colored slides, with lecture, for rent at $2.50, or for sale at $26.60. Also Wm. J. Bryan's "Back to God" and 400 other excellent illustrated lectures and sermons.

Write for information

VICTOR ANIMATOGRAF CO., Inc.

276 Victor Bldg.,

DAVENPORT, IOWA

whooping cough

and CROUP—those dreaded Childhood afflictions are quickly and safely relieved by Roche's Herbal Embrocation—the remedy that has served several generations of Mothers successfully—since 1802.

Equally effective for BRONCHITIS or COLDS on the chest.

Always keep a bottle handy

E. FOUGERA & CO., Inc.
90 - 92 Beekman Street, New York

ROCHE'S
HERBAL EMBROCATION

THE ORIGINAL VEST-POCKET HELP TORREY'S

Gist of the Lesson

FAMOUS "GIST" FEATURES

Lesson Text in Full. Changes in Revised Version Noted.
Emphasized Words and Phrases in Black Face. Dates Given as Accepted.
Type. Exposition of Lesson.
Condensation of Thought. Prayer Meeting Topics.
Flexible Binding, 35c postpaid

F. H. REVELL CO., 158 Fifth Ave., New York, 17 N. Wabash Ave., Chicago

COLLECTION ENVELOPES—8c per pack of 52, n Cartons (Also Storehouse Tithers' Envelopes) write iDufold Trifold Company, Asbury Park, N. J.

THE AMERICAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY

76 Wall Street, New York

(Incorporated April, 1833)

The only American undenominational, international and national Society aiding seamen.

Maintains a Sailors' Home and Institute at 507 West Street, New York City.

Places loan libraries ($25) on vessels sailing from New York.

Publishes the Sailors' Magazine, $1.00.

Supported by contributions and legacies.

JOHN B. CALVERT, D.D., President.
GEORGE SIDNEY WEBSTER, D.D., Sec'y.
Send contributions to CLARENCE C. PINNEO, Treasurer, 76 Wall Street, New York.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY

Its work is interdenominational evangelical and international in scope and is commended by all the churches. It has published the Gospel message in 178 languages dialects and characters. Its colporters meet the immigrants with Christian literature in many languages, and also visit the spiritually destitute. In the Spanish and Portuguese languages, chiefly for Latin America, there have been issued 16,012,088 copies of volumes, tracts and periodicals. Its literature in the native dialects has been the strong right arm of foreign missions. Its benevolent work is dependent upon donations and legacies.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS HALL, President.
REV. EDWIN NOAH HARDY, Ph.D., Gen. Sec.

Donations may be sent direct to American Tract Society, 101 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

New List

BACK TO THE LONG GRASS

My Link with Livingstone

Dan Crauford, Author of "Thinking Black."
Back over the long, weary, dangerous, fascinating trail of Livingstone we travel in company with the inimitable author of "Thinking Black." A vivid record of a thrilling accomplishment. Fully illustrated. 8vo. Net, $4.00

THE BEST I REMEMBER

Arthur Porritt, Editor of The Christian World
An astonishingly interesting book of reminiscences covering thirty-three years of London religious journalism. Full of good stories and intimate glimpses of notable leaders in English Non-Conformist circles. Net, $3.00

THE HEBREW PROPHET

AND THE MODERN

PREACHER The Hartley Lecture on Preaching for 1922

Rev. Henry J. Pickett, Ex-Principal and Principal Designate, Hartley College, Manchester
A call for the prophetic ideal in the ministry today. The author says: "This book has been written under the pressure of a deep conviction that our supreme need is a truly prophetic ministry." Net, $2.50

NIGHT SCENES OF SCRIPTURE

Rev. Norman Macleod Caie, B.D., Author of "The Seven Deadly Sins, etc."
"Mr. Caie has not sacrificed direct, eager power to literary ambition. One feels through the pages the glow that has made him so effective a preacher."—Rev. Prof. James Moffatt, D.D., Litt.D. Net, $1.25

THE SEVEN DEADLY SINS

Rev. Norman Macleod Caie, B.D., Author of "Night Scenes of Scripture, etc."
A series of brief sermons on the historic seven sins, notable for their literary allusiveness and simple power. Net, $1.00

OUR FAITH IN GOD THROUGH JESUS CHRIST

Its Reasonableness, Necessity, Effectiveness and Finality

J. Ernest Davey, M.A., B.D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History, General Assembly's College, Belfast
One of the recent issues of the Student Christian Movement which will be very acceptable in Christian Student circles in America. A vigorous defense of the Christian position in the light of difficulties raised by the modern man. Net, $1.75

ST. MARK'S LIFE OF JESUS

Theodore H. Robinson, M.A., D.D., University College, Cardiff. Foreword by Rev. Professor James Moffatt, D.D., Litt.D.

Referring to this practical Student Christian Movement handbook, Dr. Moffatt says: "Dr. Robinson makes the life of Jesus more real, and so more wonderful than ever." Suitable for study circle or private reading. Net, $1.75

THE MEANING OF THE OLD TESTAMENT: According to

Modern Scholarship

Hugh Martin, M.A., Literature Secretary, Student Christian Movement of Great Britain and Ireland

Of this recent publication of the Student Christian Movement the United Methodist says: "It presents a constructive interpretation of the Old Testament that solves many a problem for the Bible student." Net, $1.60

REGENERATION AND RECONSTRUCTION A Call to the Church

Rev. S. B. John. With a Foreword by Rev. John Clifford, D.D.

A powerful plea for Christian idealism and a clarion call to the Church to realize its mission in the present age. (Every preacher in the land should come under its influence.) Net, $1.25

LET'S PLAY. A Book of Games for Children

Edna Geister
Games and contests for little folks, at school or in the home: for large or small parties, indoor or out. A companion volume to Miss Geister's popular "Ice Breakers and the Ice Breaker Herself" ($1.35), and "It is to Laugh" ($1.25). Net, $1.25

At Your Religious Book Store
GEORGE H. DORAN COMPANY
244 Madison Avenue New York

Tusculum

President O. O. GRAY, D. D., Greenville, Tenn.

A thorough Christian-character-building College. Established 1794. Address

dred thousand feeble-minded in the United States ninety per cent are free to reproduce their kind and are usually prolific. The criminals, paupers and prostitutes are recruited from this army. Further, if parents cannot properly raise large families, they ought not to be encouraged to produce them. "There is nothing admirable in bringing forth children who are born to suffering and only destined to fill our hospitals and asylums, whose emaciated little bodies soon find rest in Potter's field." On the other side of the question, namely, the endeavor to increase the fertility of stocks above the average in racial value, he recommends a widespread knowledge of the laws of natural inheritance.

TREMENDOUS VALUE FOR 15c

The Pathfinder, Leading Weekly Magazine of Nation's Capital, Makes Remarkably Attractive Offer.

Washington, D. C., Jan. (Specials)—People everywhere are hurrying to take advantage of the Pathfinder's wonderful offer to send that splendid illustrated review of the whole world thirteen weeks for 15 cents. It costs the editor a lot of money to do this, but he says it pays to invest in new friends, and in spite of the high cost of his enlarged and greatly improved paper he makes this rare offer to bring his circulation up to 600,000 a week. You will like this paper; it is 30 years old and now better than ever; splendid stories and rare miscellany. Question Box answers all your questions. Only 15 cents in stamps or coin mailed at once to Pathfinder, 49 Langdon Sta., Washington, D. C., will keep your whole family informed, entertained, helped and inspired.

5,000 CHRISTIAN WORKERS WANTED

To sell Bibles, Testaments, good books and handsome velvet Scripture Mottoes. Good commission. Send for free catalogue and price list.

GEORGE W. NOBLE, Publisher
Dept. No. 10, Monon Bldg. CHICAGO, ILL.

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y.
AND
220 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY
BELLS

McSHANE BELL FOUNDRY CO. BALTIMORE MARYLAND
Church, Chime and Peal BELLS
Memorials a Specialty.

Revival CAMPAIGNS
Dr. T. M. Hofmeister
Greenfield, Ohio

Individual Cups

Every church should use. Clean and sanitary. Trial free.
Thomas Communion Service Co. Box 432 Lima, Ohio

Start an Adult Bible Class with SELL'S Bible Study Text-Books

A QUARTER OF A MILLION SOLD!

Just Out No. 10-Bible Studies in the Four Gospels
No. 9-Bible Studies in Vital Questions
1. Supplementary Bible Studies 5.B.S. in Life of Christ
2. Bible Studies by Books 6.B.S. in Life of St. Paul
3. B. S. by Periods 7.B.S. in Christian Life
4. B. S. by Doctrines 8.B.S. in Early Life

Send for circular showing how to use them.
Each, cloth, 75c.; paper, 50c.
F. H. REVELL CO., 158 5th Ave., N. Y.;
17 N. Wabash Ave., Chicago

FOR THE LENTEN SEASON

Devotional Literature for Spiritual Nurture

For All the People:

"The Fellowship of Prayer for 1923." 3c. each; $2.00 per 100 postpaid. Selected Bible Readings, Meditation and Prayer for each day of the Lenten Season.

For Pastors Only:

"Suggestions for Lenten Sermons." By Pres. Ozora S. Davis, D. D. (Free on Request.)

The Commission on Evangelism and Devotional Life
Room 518, 287 Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y.

VICTOR Portable STEREOPTICON

THE PERFECT LANTERN SLIDE PROJECTOR

SHIPPED ON APPROVAL
THOUSANDS OF SLIDES FOR RENT OR FOR SALE

VICTOR ANIMATOGRAPH COINC.
276 VICTOR BLDG. DAVENPORT IA.

ASK FOR CATALOGS AND TERMS

UNIVERSITY BIBLE EDUCATION
at home. Prepare for fall and winter study. Finest books. Best courses. Hundreds studying. Catalogue free. Lose no time from your regular work. Write Prof. C. J. Burton, Bible University, Eugene, Ore.

Says Doctor

Charles E. Jefferson

Minister, Broadway Tabernacle,
New York

"Wherever I go among men, east and west, I find they are reading The Christian Century."

EDITORIAL STAFF

Charles Clayton Morrison
Herbert L. Willett Orvis F. Jordan
Joseph Fort Newton John R. Ewers
Lynn Harold Hough Edward Shillito
Alva W. Taylor Thomas C. Clark

The Christian Century is distinguished by its candid discussion of living issues in the light of the mind of Christ

Mail Coupon to-day. Foreign postage extra

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Dear Sirs: Please enter my name (a new subscriber) for a year's subscription to The Christian Century at your regular rate of $4.00 (ministers $3.00). I will remit upon receipt of bill and you will please send me without extra charge a copy of ☐ "The Reconstruction of Religion," by Ellwood, or ☐ "The Crisis of the Churches," by Leighton Parks, or ☐ "The Mind in the Making," by Robinson, or ☐ "What Christianity Means to Me," by Lyman Abbott.

Name .....

Address .....

C. W.

IRRESISTIBLE

JOIN OUR DELIGHTFUL "CHRISTIAN WORK" PARTY

On the Great White Star Line "S. S. Baltic" Summer Cruise to the Holy Land, Egypt, Turkey, Greece, Spain, Italy, Etc.

61 Days      $600 and Up

Starting June 27, 1923

A Surpassing Summer Vacation Opportunity

For Ministers, College Professors, Teachers and Business Men

IDEAL SUMMER WEATHER ON SHIP BOARD

With the Average Temperature on Shore lower than Boston, New York or St. Louis, Nights Cool. Practically no Humidity

Clark's 20th Cruise
to the Orient

STOP-OVERS IN EUROPE

Return tickets first class
good on Adriatic, Baltic,
Cedric, Celtic, etc.

Until
January 1, 1924

S. S. BALTIC

Luxurious White Star
Transatlantic Liner

S. S. BALTIC

23,876 tons register.
Three great promenade
decks — Sumptuous
Public Rooms, 24 Suites
with Private Bath.

The Climax of Luxurious
Travel

A FASCINATING ITINERARY

Madeira, Cadiz, Seville (Cordova, Granada and the Alhambra), Gibraltar, Algiers, Athens (Corinth, Eleusis), Haifa, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Bethany (Nazareth, Sea of Galilee, Samaria, etc.), Alexandria, Cairo, Naples, Pompeii, Aome (Capri, Sorrento, Amalfi), Monte Carlo, Cherbourg (Paris and the Battlefields, London, etc.), Liverpool to New York.

D. E. LORENZ, Ph.D., Author of "The Mediterranean Traveler" and Managing Director of Clark's Orient Cruise of 1922, and "Round the World" Cruise of 1923, is organizing a party of CHRISTIAN WORK readers. Why not take advantage of this remarkable opportunity and spend your vacation months visiting the most fascinating countries in the world? No travel worries—just rest and enjoyment. Rates include regular shore trips, landings, drives, guides, hotels, railroads, fees, etc.—everything first class.

We Invite Our Readers to Join Our Party

ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET (70 pages) AND SHIP DIAGRAM SENT FREE POSTPAID.

NOTE.—A few vacant rooms are available on our Mediterranean Cruise, Feb. 3, 1923, and on our Round the World Cruise, Jan. 22, 1923.

Address: Cruise Department, CHRISTIAN WORK

70 Fifth Ave., New York City

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

A Religious Weekly Review

FEBRUARY 10, 1923

---

Dr. Grant and the Bishop

Frederick Lynch, D. D.

A Religion of Reality

Percy Stickney Grant, D. D.

Dr. Grant's Reply to Bishop Manning

Protestantism and the World's Necessities

S. Parkes Cadman, D. D.

Building up the Church

Charles E. Jefferson, D. D.

"If I Were a Country Minister"

James E. Boyle, Ph. D.

---

Three Dollars a Year

Ten Cents a Copy

THE MINISTER'S WIFE'S NEW BONNET—

The most popular entertainment for churches ever written. A riot of laughter, millinery and fun.

THE MINISTER'S WIFE COMES BACK—

(Just out.) The sequel to "Bonnet." All the old favorite characters are there awaiting her return from the convention. Full of good, rhythmic songs.

Everybody Wants To See It!

THE REV. DAYTON UP TO DATE—

"Progressive" is his motto, and this motto leads to a whirlwind of merriment.

"A RAINY AFTERNOON" (Female Characters only)

Do you think rain would keep ladies away from a sewing circle? This merry little farce will tell you.

We will loan you a copy of any of the above if you will enclose five cents to cover cost of mailing, or any three if you enclose ten cents, and will return promptly after examination if you do not desire to purchase.

ARTHUR RADCLIFFE PUB. CO., Box 98, Millville, N.J.

THE COMMUNITY CHURCHMAN

A Monthly Magazine for all churchmen who are community minded

A working tool for every pastor and layman, informing, inspiring and helping him to make his church of larger social and spiritual service to its community.

Annual subscription price, $2.00.

Rate to Ministers, $1.50

Single copies, 20 cents each.

HANDBOOK OF THE COMMUNITY CHURCH MOVEMENT

This Handbook (84 pages, paper-bound) contains concise information concerning the numbers, varieties, methods of organization and kinds of service of the community churches throughout the United States. Price 65 cents, postpaid.

Address, Dept. W

THE COMMUNITY CHURCHMAN
2822 Annette St., Indianapolis, Indiana

If you don't say, "I saw your advertisement in the CHRISTIAN WORK," how will our advertisers know that their advertisement is bringing returns? You want credit for everything you do. So do we. Make it a habit to say, "I saw your ad. in the CHRISTIAN WORK."

Auto-Suggestion or Faith in Mexico

In the afternoon we visited the chapel of the Virgin de la Piedad out on the border of the city of Jolapa, Mexico. In this chapel there is a picture concerning which there has grown up a legend of its healing power. It has been in the possession of a certain Mexican family for two generations, and the chapel in which it is contained has become the Mecca for many sick and infirm. The walls of the chapel were covered with pictures and inscriptions by those who had declared themselves to be miraculously healed after they besought the help of the Virgin. In front of the picture was a motley assortment of glass vases, candlesticks and bowls, which presented the appearance of a second-hand junk shop. Indians doffed their sombreros, as they entered, to kneel on the pavement before the picture and before this motley assortment of glass-ware; mothers brought their sick children, and prayed for their recovery. The owner of the picture, a frowsy, ill-kempt individual, stood and watched these supplicants as they came and went, leaving some financial payment for the service they so confidently expected to receive.

We were reminded of similar scenes enacted before the picture of the Black Christ, in a cathedral in Puebla. The picture had been festooned with white ribbons, placed there by those, who like these people of Jolapa, had come seeking the healing mercies which they thought could thus be gained.

—From a recent letter from Rev Reginald Wheeler.

"The Story of the Bible"

The National Non-Theatrical Motion Picture Company is now preparing a film for church use on "The Story of the Bible." The producers mean to turn out a forceful and interesting picture of actual Bible incidents.

Increase Sunday School Attendance

Your Sunday School can be larger, stronger and more active if you will use letters, announcements and programs printed on

ROTO SPEED
STENCIL DUPLICATOR

Hundreds of churches use this machine. It does all church printing easily, quickly and cheaply. Prints anything that can be hand written, type-written, drawn or ruled.

Only $3.50 Down

Write now for samples of church work that have helped other Sunday Schools to solve the problems now confronting you, complete description of Rotospeed, and details of easy-payment plan.

Or send $3.50 and we will ship complete Rotospeed Outfit for ten days' free trial. Balance in easy payments. Money back if you are not satisfied.

Just check and mail the coupon below.

The Rotospeed Co.
102 E. Third St., Dayton, Ohio

MAIL THIS TODAY

Check whether you want further information or Rotospeed Outfit.

THE ROTOSPEED CO.

102 E. Third Street Dayton, Ohio

Please send me samples of Rotospeed work, descriptive booklet and details of easy-payment plan.

I enclose $3.50. Please ship Rotospeed Outfit immediately.

Name. . . . .

Address. . . . .

MANY USES FOR CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING

1. To locate some old book you would like to get.
2. To secure employment in church work or with a Christian concern.
3. To advertise your services as a sexton.

Classified Ads Cost but 3c a Word—
Minimum Order $1.00

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

CONTINUING

THE EVANGELIST AND NEW YORK OBSERVER

Vol. 114.—No. 6

February 10, 1923

Whole No. 3009

CONTENTS

WORLD OF TODAY.....	163
EDITORIALS:
Dr. Grant and the Bishop: Rev. Frederick Lynch, D.D.	167
Protestantism and the World's Necessities: Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D.D.....	169
Building up the Church: Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, D.D. ....	169
OBSERVER'S LETTER:
The Class Dinner.....	171
THE WEEKLY SERMON:
A Religion of Reality: Rev. Percy Stickney Grant, D. D. ....	172
GENERAL:
Dr. Grant's Reply to Bishop Manning.....	179
A Private School Bulletin to the Parents of Boys: George E. Carmichael.....	184
COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT:
"If I Were a Country Minister": Prof. James E. Boyle, Ph.D. ....	185
ONE BOOK A WEEK:
The Problems of Christian Unity.....	186
INTERNATIONAL LESSON:
Jesus and Zacchaeus: Rev. H. Grant Person, D.D..	187

THE CHRISTIAN WORK; Published weekly; 10 cents a copy, $3.00 a year in the United States, $3.52 in Canada, and $4.04 in all other countries (postage included.)

Publication and circulation office, 75 Baker Street, Providence, R. I. Editorial and advertising office, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Subscriptions may be forwarded to either of the above offices.

Entered as second class matter November 18, 1922, at the U. S. post-office, Providence, R. I. under the act of March 3, 1879.

Printed in U. S. A.—Published by The Christian World, Inc., Frederick Lynch, President; Henry Strong Huntington, Vice-President; Benson Y. Landis, Secretary-Treasurer.

Printed by Norman C. Lynch Co., Incorporated, 75 Baker Street, Providence, R. I.; 70 Fifth Ave., New York.

The World of To-day

THE RUHR SITUATION

It has been interesting to note the impression France's going into Germany has made on America and Great Britain. The British press has been divided somewhat in feeling, but on the whole the outstanding journals, both daily and weekly, have felt that France had at least done an unwise thing. "Playing with fire" would sum up the general feeling of the British press. The leading journals of America have rather leaned to the same point of view, but have been inclined to think that the course of France may work out better than it promises. The labor groups in England have been outspoken in protest against the action of France. Lloyd George thinks it not only full of danger to the peace of Europe, but an act not consonant with justice. Senator Borah would have America protest against it. To understand this grave situation we must take into consideration the economic factors concerned. France faced the future at the time of the armistice with one sixteenth of all her country devastated by her neighbor Germany, who twice before in the memory of living men had crossed her border and brought the same destruction although never before on such a vast scale. According to the solemn promises made by her representatives at Versailles, Germany agreed to pay for reparation. Various conferences have been held in an attempt to adjust the amount and devise ways and means of inducing Germany to keep her pledge. The actual destruction on French soil amounted to one hundred and two billion francs. France herself has paid forty-four billion francs in reconstructing the homes of her people and their means of livelihood. Germany has paid only four billions. France faces bankruptcy and ruin unless Germany does what she has promised that she would do. France has been impatient, and there is no doubt but what her military party has sought excuses for bringing the whole Ruhr Valley under the French flag. But on the other hand, Germany's promises have so far proved worthless, and in the background is the failure of the United States to exert her moral influence in the crisis. Had America been a member of the League of Nations, France could have been restrained. France is playing the part of a gambler and is staking her last chance for reparations upon the possibility of gaining all. Driven by economic necessity she feels that even if she loses she is no worse off than she would be had she not made the venture into the Ruhr. It is an extremely difficult situation and one of which it is hard to form an accurate judgment. America of all the nations of the earth should be the last to criticize. The most disquieting fact in the whole situation is that this action on the part of France deepens and widens the chasm between Germany and France. It is clear to every thinking mind that peace in Europe is absolutely dependent upon a working friendship between these two nations. The expedition of France into the Ruhr and the causes which lies back of it must, therefore, be viewed by every lover of peace as most deplorable.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

FRANCE AND GERMANY

We have no sympathy whatever with those who would relieve Germany from making reparations for all the damage she did in France and Belgium. Germany deliberately and purposely destroyed factories, farms and orchards. This was not by bombing, but by cold-blooded use of axes and hammers by soldiers under orders. There is no justice in allowing these reparations to go unpaid. Germany promised to pay them and promised to pay them at certain times. Meantime, Germany has gone to pieces and the mark is worth practically nothing. She claimed she could not make the payments as promised and asked for extension. The general impression is that the British government believes Germany and is in favor of making the terms of payment easier. France has refused and has undertaken the collection of the debts without the aid of England. The British point of view shows thought for the welfare of all Europe, humaneness to a crushed people, a large part of whom were honestly struggling to get onto their feet, and it also shows wisdom. There could be much more chance of France ultimately getting her just reparations by showing a more sympathetic attitude toward the new Germany and helping it to recover industrially and economically. Everyday's cables show how the entrance into the Ruhr is solidifying all parties in Germany—royalists, republicans, and socialists. What is going to be the result? Europe is living over a powder magazine. What is the United States going to do about it? What can we do? If we were not so “splendidly isolated” we would have a voice and an influence now when the need is so great.

THE CONFERENCE ON LIFE AND WORK OF THE CHURCHES

In 1920, at Geneva, a group of sixty delegates from the various churches of the world organized themselves into an International Committee to call a great Conference of all Christian churches in 1925 to consider the life and work of the churches. (This Committee met again in Helsingborg, Sweden, last August.) The American section of this large Committee—composed of representatives officially appointed to it by the denominations—met for a day in New York last week. Dr. Arthur J. Brown is President, Bishop Luther B. Wilson is Chairman of the Executive Committee, and Dr. Henry A. Atkinson is Secretary. The Committee set up six commissions of fifty or sixty of the most eminent churchmen in the country to begin work on reports to be presented to the Conference in 1925, to be held at Stockholm. These commissions are to study such subjects as missions and evangelism and the relation of Christianity to the social order, economics, industry, the home, education and international relationships. The feeling was very strongly emphasized at the meeting that since the world in its chaotic and despondent plight was looking to the Church for leadership and healing and waiting for some word of light and faith the churches should take this conference very seriously and be willing to give much prayer, study, time and money to its success. “It should be to the life and work of the churches what Nicea and Constance were to the faith.”

THE INTERNATIONAL MIND OF THE CHURCHES

Our mail proves to us that the churches are constantly urging international co-operation upon our government. The members of the Detroit Council of Churches recently drew up a series of eleven statements, whose substance is:

“We believe that it is practicable to abolish wars between nations and peoples by the united action of substantially all of the nations, and not otherwise.

“We believe that the League of Nations now functioning between fifty-one nations, or some similar organization, is the practical way in which to abolish war, and that it may be made effective and vigorous by the co-operation of the United States."

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

The Council passed a resolution recommending that the United States Government provide for a nation-wide referendum, "free from all other questions and from individual candidacies, on substantially this question, namely: "Shall the United States join the League of Nations, or some similar organization, under such reservations or amendments as the United States Senate may agree upon." The Chicago Church Federation recently sent a letter to the Protestant ministers of Chicago, saying: "Perhaps the challenge to the Christian Church was never more urgent than it is today, to cultivate an intelligent program of information and education that would lead to a compelling public opinion that war must be outlawed among the nations and some other means be found for adjusting international differences." The letter then offers to help with speakers, literature and plans and suggests methods of keeping the members of the churches interested and informed on international questions. When John Franklin Burke, Republican Senator from Lorain County, introduced a resolution into the Ohio Senate the other day asking President Harding to call an economic conference of the world to lead in world rehabilitation, the Ohio ministers adopted this supporting resolution: "Reports from representatives of economic, commercial and political organizations make it plain that unless the United States comes to the aid of Europe the world is threatened with chaos." Such expressions of church opinion could probably be multiplied indefinitely.

AN ECHO FROM THE COPENHAGEN CONFERENCE

A letter written by Dr. Jowett concerning the Copenhagen Conference of the World Alliance where two hundred and fifty representatives of the European Churches met their American brethren has recently come to this office. One paragraph so finely sums up the real significance of the gathering that it ought to be printed: "I think," wrote Dr. Jowett, "that the proceedings of the Copenhagen Conference were of such outstanding importance as to deserve the close attention of all who seek the restoration of European harmony and peace. It was a gathering representative of the people who dwell behind the feverish frontier-line of governments and the subtle and wily movement of professional politicians. The members of the conference came from over twenty nations, and they expressed the Christian sentiment which is found in colleges and universities, and in the quiet every-day life of multitudes of men and women whose obscure loyalty to the moral ideals feeds the springs of civilized life. But the true value of the gathering lay in the fact that it sought to express the convictions and feelings of great masses of people who have been silent during the past few years. There are multitudes of people in Europe who, however partial and fragmentary may be their achievement, are trying to face the issues of life in the light of the Christian ideal. Their judgments about things are clear, but they have no adequate utterance. The energies of their convictions are not organized into effective witness. Their testimony is not heard. And it was the vital worth of the Copenhagen Conference that it endeavored to give some expression to these deep Christian sentiments which are seeking a voice in every nation in Europe. In reality the Conference represented a partial awaking of the Christian Church to the exercise of one of its gravest and most neglected functions. The Church in Europe offered itself as the organ of international conscience, and as the voice of moral sentiment and convictions."

MEN VS. MAMMON AT LAUSANNE

The Lausanne Conference is a strange commentary on a so-called Christian world. The man on whose teaching Christianity is supposed to be built asked, "Of how much more value is a man than a sheep," and assured us that God cared so much for every individual that the very hairs of our head were numbered. But when Great Britain at Lausanne was faced with the question, "Of how much more value is a man than oil?" answered "oil is more valuable—much more valuable. You Turks can destroy Armenia to your heart's desire. We shall hold up our hands in horror at it; but we shall do nothing. But if you try to take away our precious Mosul oil, we will fight." And the rest of the world stood by, assenting. Only Russia, where only a month ago the officials staged a parody on the Christmas story, only Russia offered practical help to these poor people. Tchicherin has offered land for the settlement of two hundred thousand Armenians in the rich Kuban region near the Black Sea. According to the despatches, the Russians, to be sure, do not propose to turn this district into an Armenian National Home. They would expect the Armenians to become Russian citizens. But this measure would provide the temporary home which the race needs. The Allies have agreed that Turkey may provide only the guarantees for minorities which are required of the Balkan and new states in Europe. They have actually agreed to the forcible exchange of the Greek population of Asia Minor for the Turkish population in Greece. The exchange involves about a million people, some six hundred thousand Greeks in Turkey and some four hundred and fifty thousand Turks in Macedonia and the rest of Greece. The Turks will allow the two hundred thousand Greeks of Constantinople to remain there and the Greeks will allow the three hundred thousand Turks in Western Thrace to remain there. Greeks have been in Asia Minor since the Trojan War. To be sure the modern Greeks have many strains of blood in them beside the old Ionian, but virtually all the ancestors of the present Greeks of Anatolia had lived in the land hundreds of years before the Turks came out of Central Asia. Ever since the establishment of Greece and the Balkan States a voluntary shifting of population has been going on—Bulgarians under non-Bulgarian governments gradually emigrating to Bulgaria, and so with Serbs, Greeks and Turks. A forced emigration is a quite different matter. The Allies also have agreed that the Greek Patriarch of Constantinople shall lose all his political functions and shall be henceforth purely a religious official. However much sympathy one might have for the political aspirations of the Greeks in Turkey he cannot wonder that the Turks should object to political activity under the cover of religious office. The relation of religion and politics in the Near East is a relation wholly unknown in America.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

A RACE RELATIONS SUNDAY

Race problems are religious problems and require the application of Christian ideals. The relations of the white and Negro people of America bring concretely to us today the problems of applying brotherly good-will, understanding, and Christian co-operation in race relations and abolishing the evils growing out of violence and exploitation. The Christian churches of America are the organized channels through which the greatest expression of the ideals of such interracial good-will can find practical application in the community life of the two races. It is fitting, therefore, that the Churches observe Race Relations Sunday, as they will do Sunday, February 11. The churches have great organized resources at their command for co-operative interracial service. In the first place, the Negro churches are by far the greatest agency we have in America for influencing the life of the Negro people. Today there are about forty thousand churches of the race with nearly five million members and owning property valued at more than $80,000,000. In 1918 there were over thirty-five thousand Negro ministers. More than eight-tenths of the Negro church members are enrolled in four distinctly Negro denominations. Two of those denominations are more than one hundred years old and two are about fifty years old. All of them are managed, supported, and controlled by Negroes. In addition there are more than six thousand Negro churches with over half a million members in denominations of both white and colored constituents. The Negro churches have developed many of the outstanding leaders of the race. Such men as Richard Allen, John Stewart, James Varick, Alexander Crummell, Henry M. Tanner, Isaac Lane, L. H. Holsey, J. C. Price, E. C. Morris and W. G. Parks are part of the vanguard of a great company of men of mark in the religious and social history of America yet to be written. The Negro church has been and is today the great socializing and elevating agency of the Negro people. Through it the Negroes are giving expression to a type of good-will and neighborliness that needs to be met half way to be fruitful of a brighter day between the races in America. In the second place, there is no brighter page in the history of the Christian Church than the record of some of the great denominations made up mainly of white churchmen of America. From the days when the Quakers of Pennsylvania held that no Christian could conscientiously keep his black brothers in bondage, from the time when the missionary societies of the several denominations began to spend millions for the education of the free men, to the present day, there have been thousands of white churchmen who have sacrificed, worked, and prayed that justice and good-will should obtain between the races. They have looked forward to the day when their darker brethren might be received upon terms of Christian fellowship. The millions in the membership and the scope of the activities of the various denominations are too familiar to be recited. In this situation before the churches, three tasks stand out: First, by precept and example the churches can lead their own members to believe that mutual respect, friendly co-operation, and positive good-will—the Christian way—really enable men and women to work out whatever problems confront them. Second, the churches should arouse the conscience not only of church members but of the citizens of the nation about their obligations and responsibilities for their neighbors, white and black. Third, the churches have a responsibility for putting down the evils that threaten Negro life and liberty and the peaceful relations between the races. Chief among such evils today is lynching. Mob murder mocks Christian ideals. The mobbing and lynching of men and women flouts the very principle of human brotherhood for which the churches stand. On Race Relations Sunday white and Negro churches will exchange visitors and speakers; they will be reminded of the things that all may share in doing. The churches have the opportunity to demonstrate that Christian good-will can and does solve the conflicts of interests between races.

EDITORIAL

EDITORIAL STAFF

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

Frederick Lynch

ASSOCIATE EDITOR

Henry Strong Huntington

MANAGING EDITOR

Benson Y. Landis

LITERARY EDITOR

Tertius Van Dyke

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Edmund de Schweinitz Brunner

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT

Violette Reynolds

CONTRIBUTING STAFF

Henry A. Atkinson

Peter Ainslie

Hugh Black

S. Parkes Cadman

Sidney L. Gulick

Rufus M. Jones

E. Guy Talbott

T. Rhondda Williams

EDITORIAL COUNCIL

Nehemiah Boynton

Williams Adams Brown

Howard Duffield

Sherwood Eddy

Irving Fisher

J. W. Johnson

George Foster Peabody

George A. Plimpton

Howard C. Robbins

Fred B. Smith

Cornelius Woelfkin

Shailer Mathews

Charles S. Macfarland

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS

Austria: Professor Carl Beth

Canada: Dr. J. Lovell Murray

Czechoslovakia: Professor Francis Zilka

France: Rev. Professor Wilfred Monod

Germany: Direktor A. Hinderer

Great Britain: Rev. Sidney M. Berry

Hungary: Dr. S. Szabo

Switzerland: Pastor Adolf Keller

Doctor Grant and the Bishop

DOCTOR GRANT has answered Bishop Manning's letter and at this writing everybody is anxiously awaiting the Bishop's action. The general impression is that the Bishop and the Episcopal Church in general will be satisfied with Dr. Grant's reply except at one point, that of miracles, for statements which, made in public speech, without elucidation, seemed to deny the divinity of Christ, when made by Dr. Grant in his letter with a full explanation, disclose no radically different point of view than that held by the average intelligent Christian. It is greatly to be hoped that Dr. Grant's reply will be satisfactory to the Bishop, or at least that it will become the basis of such conference as can lead to amicable adjustment, for nothing could be more deplorable than a prolonged heresy trial which would eventuate in nothing but transferring Dr. Grant from one pulpit to another, if he were found guilty or if found not guilty, would create hard feelings that would not die down for a generation.

Dr. Grant has replied to Bishop Manning in a long and irenic letter which touches upon the three points at issue: the Apostles' Creed, the Divinity of Christ and Miracles. As to the Apostles' Creed Dr. Grant asks only the liberty of interpreting it in the light of present-day knowledge and the right to deny one phrase which perhaps cannot be interpreted inasmuch as it is a statement of a physical fact or occurrence which was believed when the creed was written but is not believed today. Dr. Grant's claim to interpretation is one which thousands of clergy and laymen in the Anglican Church are either openly pressing or silently answering for themselves. And none of the points where wide interpretation is asked are fundamentals of the faith. All Christians repeat the first great assertion without difference of opinion—God, the Father Almighty—Jesus Christ the Son. When it comes to the second clause, which is not an affirmation of faith but a statement of the great events in the Lord's life, then wide latitude of interpretation is demanded. This latitude is given in many communions; taken in others. Thus there are many ministers who repeat "born of the Virgin Mary" as not a clause put in to emphasize the fact that Christ was born of a Virgin, but put in to declare the infinitely vaster and more fundamental truth, that God came into our humanity. That is, to thousands who repeat the creed this clause is the affirmation of the incarnation, above all things else. It is open to question, too, if the framers of the creed were not thinking of the incarnation much more than the fact that Christ was born without the aid of human father. For one the incarnation is a great fundamental of the faith—"God was in Christ, reconciling the world to Himself." The manner of the incarnation can never be a fundamental.

The same thing is true of other clauses of the creed. Thus there are thousands of people who repeat every Sunday: "I believe in the resurrection of the body." Now some believe in the resurrection of the present body; others believe that we come forth from the tomb in a new and glorified body, just as some Christians believe Christ rose with the old body, some that he appeared with a new and glorified body—all believing equally in the resurrection. There are many more who are not sure that after death we rise with any body as our temple, but that as pure spirit we approach the throne of God. But all repeat the creed, for, after all the great thing behind the phrase is the affirmation of survival after death and all Christians believe that. The framers of the creed probably put that truth in the thought or language that they knew, but the great thing in their mind was the assertion that the Christian rose from the dead as did the Lord and lives forevermore.

As we understand Dr. Grant's reply to Bishop Manning this is all the liberty he asks in interpretation. He does not deny any fundamental, eternal article of faith in the creed, only the liberty of thinking it in the language of to-day while repeating it in the language of two thousand years ago. One clause in the creed Dr. Grant asks more than interpretation. It is the passage, "He descended into Hell." The passage is based on one utterance, found in St. Peter's letters, to the effect that after his death Christ went to the realm of departed spirits and preached to them. If the framers of the creed did not have this in mind no one knows just what they did mean to convey. If, by any means they were so filled with the thought that all humanity, living and dead, part of it in both heaven and hell, belonged to Jesus Christ, that they were going in a great, poetic affirmation to link up Jesus Christ to it, then all glory to them. It is the most wonderful, most inspired clause in the creed, that most to be cherished. Who knows this was not their thought—hell, heaven, earth, all belong to Him and He to them? And if so who would not shout it. The writer says it week by week easily, for that is what he means when he says it, and where he says a creed he says it to express his belief not somebody else's—and is not this the proper use of a creed? "I believe in God, etc.," not "somebody else did once," is the very language of the Apostles' Creed. Now Dr. Grant evidently has never put this interpretation on this passage. We are rather surprised, for he is a poet of some reputation. He takes it as the description of a literal fact. This fact is not true. There he is right. Christ did not go down into any particular place of ghosts or shades, perhaps. We do not know, except on St. Peter's one testimony. Well, to relieve minds who sincerely hesitate at these words, some Churches have left them out of the creed. They really do not have any bearing on the character of Christ as they refer only to a fact of geography. Surely Bishop Manning is not going to make trouble over that one clause. What we would do if we were in the Bishop's place would be to ask Dr. Grant, who, as we said, is a poet and has imagination, if he cannot accept the meaning we gave above, and which was perhaps in the mind of the framers of the creed, namely, that it is simply a glorious affirmation of Christ's identity with all humanity—in the other worlds and this.

EDITORIAL

When it comes to the divinity of Jesus Christ, Dr. Grant asserts it in his reply to the Bishop in about the same terms the most orthodox would use. He calls Jesus Christ his Lord. He says that Jesus Christ is to him the portrait of the invisible God, the perfect revelation of his heavenly Father. He even goes further. He says, "When I ask myself 'What is God like?' I can only answer, 'He is like Jesus,' and hence I can make my own the words, 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father.'" He then says that he cannot for himself grasp the metaphysical relationships established by the creeds and theologies between God and Christ, but he can say with St. Paul that "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself." He can say wholeheartedly and take as his ideal the words of St. Paul: "I live, yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in flesh, I live in faith in the son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me." It is evident from all this that Dr. Grant believes in the divinity of our Lord in the sense that Christ is the full and perfect revelation of God. God is in Christ revealing Himself and reconciling the world to Himself. Anyone who believes Christ when he says: "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father," and who finds God in Christ, cannot be said to deny the divinity of Christ.

When Dr. Grant says that Jesus while in Palestine did not have the full power of God it all depends upon what he means. If he means that Jesus did not have authority to speak for God and represent God to the people, then he denies the whole Gospel record, the transfiguring effect Christ produced in the men who knew him, and the whole future course of humanity. But this cannot be his meaning, for this would deny what he says he does believe about the divinity of Jesus. If he means—and this is probably what he does mean—that the Christ of Galilee was not the eternal Creator localized for a while in the man Jesus so that God was nowhere else in the universe and was not still the omnipresent Spirit in all space and places, and was confined in His operations for thirty years to the mediumship of Jesus, and that Jesus, in Palestine, had all the power of the eternal God in his own being for those thirty years so that he could create worlds, or destroy suns, or change the stars in their orbits, or do anything the everlasting Creator of the universe could do, who really thinks of Jesus as God in that exclusive sense? Even the most orthodox would not say that the first person of the Trinity was not still on the throne of the universe caring for the worlds and His myriads of children in all places. Who really thinks that Jesus had the power of God in the sense that the eternal Creator and Father had it? Christ's own words, addressed continually to the Father, and spoken to the disciples continually about the Father, would have no meaning. One can only ask: Why does Dr. Grant utter such phrases and throw all the faithful into confusion and all the humble saints into fear? For, after all, such words mean nothing—they are only words, words, words. If Christ is the manifestation of the mind, will and heart of God in the flesh—preach Him and show Him to all men as the revelation of the Father. Why raise the question of metaphysical relationship if one does not understand it, and if no one asks one's opinion on it?

The one point where Dr. Grant does flatly and directly take issue with the Church is on the question of miracles. We are not quite sure whether the Protestant Episcopal Church does anywhere in its articles of faith demand a literal acceptance of every miracle recorded in the Scriptures. If it does require such a statement of faith, then there must be many who are in the same position as Dr. Grant; for surely not more than five out of ten of the Protestant Episcopal clergy accept every miracle of the Old Testament literally—the swimming axe, the sun standing still, the Egyptian plague, all the rest. If one is not bound to accept all the miracles of the Old Testament is there any article that commits him to the acceptance of every miracle in the New Testament? We do not think there is. It becomes a question then of majorities. If the majority of the Church say they must be accepted then Dr. Grant may have to bow to that majority. But the majority should move very cautiously here. There is a disposition all over the world, even among those who accept the miracles because the evidence seems good to them, to feel that the divinity of Jesus Christ in no wise rests upon them. His divinity is in His character and in the greater miracle of the redemption and transfiguration of the world. He is not divine because He changed water into wine but because He changed villains into saints; He is not divine because He fed five thousand with a few fish, but because He loved the five thousand so divinely. Let us be careful how we rest the divinity of Christ upon a few miracles—for they may go sometime—(we are not saying they will, but they may). Let us rest the divinity of Christ where it does rest, and rests unshakably and eternally, on His character and the visible presence of God within Him. It really does not greatly matter, when we have reached that point, whether we are troubled over the miracle of the water turned into wine or not.

EDITORIAL

F. L.

Protestantism and the World's Necessities

THE second measure of internal reform is the revival of Church consciousness and loyalty as differentiated from sectarian allegiance. The vine is more important than any single cluster of grapes that grows upon it. Unification, the opposite of separatism, is being carried onward by the swing of the pendulum. The rhythmic movements which govern everything, making day follow night, the tides ebb and flow, and even civilizations to have their day and cease to be, are plainly pushing Protestantism toward a new and unaccustomed oneness as the forerunner of Catholicity. Voluntary consent is advisable and gracious, but a glacier-like thrust cannot be withstood. Our fate is never in our own hands; a fortunate thing indeed, and one which has repeatedly baffled the foes of the Church and heartened her offspring. Whatever are the merits of denominationalism, and certainly I do not doubt them, it has seen its meridian. Revised and corrected histories have induced in formerly fierce sectarians the virtues of sympathetic understanding and forbearance. Many rancorous disputes that the theological courts aggravated are composed by the evolutions which history describes. Those who observe aright the unfolding scheme of the Divine Society throughout the ages gain the true perspective which is the best criterion of the past. Without it, men magnify the meaningless, slight the important, and inflame the antagonistic. Protestantism cannot lodge order in chaos, lawfulness in freedom, unity in multiplicity, unless it reduces sectarian fervors and belittlements. The disruption of the Church has not been, and never can be, absolute. Her disciples co-operate in philosophy and dogmatics, in Biblical criticism and exegesis. Literature and hymnology testify to the one life which pulsates in her different branches.

Again, denominational cleavages are bequeathed rather than acquired: artificial rather than real. Men and women are born into their various denominations, and carry there marked temperamental differences. Every great religious body, as Dean Inge comments, has individual members who are natively institutionalists, or moralists, or mystics. And yet again, the antiquated causes of Protestant separatism have been mainly political and not religious. Not a few have lost their justification and persist as melancholy tokens of the combative spirit. Their isolations sever the Church from a sufficient jurisdiction over the spiritualities which are her peculiar care. She cannot well offset that apotheosis of the State which was the source of our recent undoing. It is to the Church, and not the State, that the distracted world should turn for a model organization, consisting of the entire congregation of the faithful, gathered out of every nation, fused into a spiritual homogeneity, and securely founded upon righteousness, justice, mercy, and redemption. He is the benefactor of his age who thus conceives the Church, and esteems her capable of still higher unity, loyalty and efficiency. The second contribution of Protestantism to the world's sorest needs should be a first-class example of fraternal unification. That world which refuses to be either Protestant or Catholic does not desire Christians to make a transient truce, but to arrive at a just and settled peace within their ecclesiastical borders. Until they do so, what right have they to preach peace to separated and suspicious States?

S. P. C.

Building up the Church

PAUL says the Church is the body of Christ. If the Church is His body, it is essential for the doing of His work. Without a body no one can accomplish anything on the earth. Men without bodies are non-entities. It is only through his body that a person can express himself. Disembodied spirits count for nothing in human life as we know it. The spirit of Jesus is impotent unless it possesses a body to work through. Whatever strengthens the body of Jesus gives new power to the soul of Jesus. When we increase the vigor of the Church we extend the reach of His influence over human hearts and homes. Without the Church the Christian religion can do nothing. Without the Church Christianity is only a name. Christ accomplishes nothing except in those regions where His Church is at work. He is omnipresent, but He does nothing except where His organized followers are expressing His mind and heart. Savages remain savages until the Church reveals Jesus to them. Barbarians never rise out of their barbarism until the Church extends to them its hand. Without the Church there is no salvation. In Christian countries only those sections are Christian which have been under the hand of the Church. Localities in a Christian land remain pagan unless they are redeemed by the Church. The Power of Christ in a town is dependent on the vitality and devotion of the

EDITORIAL

Church. Christian morality languishes in all places in which the Church is weak. As soon as the Church in any community becomes earnest and industrious, the word of God in that community runs and is glorified. The only institution that saves our cities from rotting is the Church. It alone keeps our cities from being cast into the outer darkness. The Church is salt. It is the light of the world.

What our generation most needs is a strengthening of the Church. The spirit of Christ is the same yesterday, today and forever, but His Church varies in places and times. At the present hour we have widespread belief in the ideals of Jesus, but many are skeptical as to the divine mission of the Church. Multitudes outside its membership carp at it or ignore it, while many of its own adherents have lost faith in it. One of the common topics of conversation is the failure of the Church. Even Christian believers sometimes speak of the Church as though it were not an essential part of the Christian religion. It has become an axiom in certain circles that a man can be as good a Christian outside of the Church as in it. There are some who think he can be better.

The result is that Jesus Christ is not doing many mighty works. The cause of His weakness is our unbelief in the Church. It matters little what honors we give Him in our talk, if we do not show our loyalty to Him by our devotion to the Church. If Jesus Christ fails to do the things which the world needs to have done, the world will inevitably lose faith in His Divinity. The only Christ who can hold the devotion of the world's heart is a conquering Christ. A defeated Christ is no Christ at all. But Christ cannot conquer except through a triumphant Church. If the Church is feeble and inadequate the whole Christian enterprise falls into disrepute. If the Church cannot transform the temper and life of the town, then men will conclude that Jesus was not the one who was to come, and will begin to seek about for another. In the long run the world's faith in Christ will depend on the prosperity and achievements of the Church.

The way, then, to exalt Christ is to build up the Church. We honor him only when we honor his body. We are impractical theorists and dreamers when we give him high-sounding titles and refuse to throw ourselves into the organization through which His power is to be made manifest. The religion of Jesus would shine with a new glory in every community if only the members of the Church would redouble their efforts to make the Church what it ought to be. Public worship is in many places without influence on public life, because the worship is so meager and dull. How can the Church become a force in the life of the town unless Church members meeting for praise and prayer pour enough of their life into the worship to give it uplifting and vitalizing power? Desultory Church attendance is one of the most serious handicaps which the Son of God suffers in His efforts to redeem mankind. Christians are not good Christians when they absent themselves from public worship. A man cannot serve God so effectively on Sunday in his home as in the Church. A church member is crucifying Jesus Christ afresh who is negligent in the service he renders to mankind in the house of prayer. There would be a new tone in the social, and commercial, and political life of the city if only all the churches were filled. There is no more effective way of increasing the power of God in our modern civilization than by multiplying the numbers of those who on the Lord's day unite with their fellows in worshipping their Creator.

Here then is the most effective and the most needed form of Christian work which can be done in our generation. The Church must be built up. It must be made a glorious Church. We must cease talking about its decadence, and give ourselves in season and out of season to the work of making it strong. It is not large enough. It must be made larger. There are too many outsiders. They must be brought in. This work is the supreme work of those who are already members. It is absurd to expect those who are outside to come in of their own accord. They must be invited, persuaded, urged to come in. We Christians are in the world for the purpose of increasing the power of God in human life. We increase His power by increasing the vitality and reach of the Church. He works through instruments. The Church is His chosen instrument. He speaks through organs. The Church is His supreme organ. He operates through a human body. The Church is His body. It is only the incarnate God who can heal the world's diseases, and deliver the world from its distresses. When we neglect the Church we make it harder for Christ to save mankind. When we disparage the Church, we scorn the means which God Himself has chosen to carry out His far-reaching plans. The duty of a church member is to work constantly for the Church. How to increase its membership is a problem he should ponder day and night. How to win one, and then another, and then still another, is a question he should carry with him through the years. To many a Church member this question has never occurred. They are not interested in the building up of the Church. They are interested in various minor matters, but not in this supreme matter. Because of their neglect the Church fails to reach its appointed stature and is unable to accomplish its ends. The Christian religion will enter on a new era when Christians awake to the Divine mission and immeasurable possibilities of the Church. It is a great privilege to be a member of the Church for which the Son of God died. It is a great honor to be permitted to work for the Church which the Son of God loves. It is the medium of revelation. Through it, there is made manifest to men and to angels the manifold wisdom of God.

C. E. J.

THE OBSERVER

The Class Dinner

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

MY college class held its dinner in New York a few nights ago and about fifty of us sat down together to renew the acquaintances began thirty-three years ago. I have led such a busy life that I have been somewhat unconscious of the lapse of years. As I looked around the festive board I suddenly became conscious of them—boys who came up to college with fresh, smooth faces and great shocks of hair had become men with creases in their brows, lines in their faces, and many of the shocks of luxuriant hair had gone. Indeed some of the heads had become veritable mirrors so did they shine. Carefree faces had become faces bearing the marks of care, thought and hard work.

The most fascinating thing about these gatherings is to see what these boys of thirty years ago have become, to learn what they have done in the world. In the first place there have been some great surprises and some contradictions. I think it can be said that generally the boys who worked hard in college, who had high stands in their studies, have been successes in after life. Hardly a man in my class who was recognized as a diligent student in college has failed to find some honorable place in the world and to do some good work. In the law, medicine, the ministry and in education they have been successful men. On the other hand some of the men who had no reputation as students have risen to very high positions in the world. The three men who have become international figures were not high-stand men nor very hard workers during the college years. I meditated over this a little and asked myself the reasons. Perhaps it was because nothing in college awakened them. They were not scholars by nature but they had that little touch of genius which nothing in the college curriculum or in the college life quickened. After college some personality or some book, or some task thrust upon them awakened the slumbering talent and they suddenly began to do big things.

Several of the men about the table who were not high-stand men have been very successful in their professions. Here I think it was a case of finding some big interest in life. In college they did the prescribed work, enjoyed the many contacts with boys from all over the land, made good friends, found college pleasant, helpful and good, and imbibed more or less culture. But no enthusiasm came to them. Then came the time of decision. Some went into the law school, some into the medical school, some to the divinity school and some into the graduate school to prepare for teaching. Then came the new-born enthusiasm. The special subject aroused their latent interests. They became eager students and have risen to hold high places in their profession. I could not help reflecting, too, that some of these boys chose just the professions I should never have expected them to choose. Yet something seemed to have guided them to right decisions.

It seemed to me as I looked over the group that the boys who had been great readers had become the most successful men. I may be mistaken here; but as I looked about the table I recalled that some of the most eminent men there were the ones I remembered seeing often sitting in the alcoves of the old Linonia Library reading many books. My whole experience since college makes me feel I am not mistaken. I meet many men, especially ministers, and almost without exception the big men, the men who are saying big things and doing conspicuous, far-reaching work, are omnivorous readers of books both old and new. Big thoughts make big men.

I was greatly interested in noting that most of the men at the table were teaching life in fine, uplifting ways besides doing their own special tasks. More than two-thirds of the men present were connected with some form of public work—on committees, boards of directors, foundations, large Church activities, large tasks of all sorts. It was encouraging to note the many interests each man had outside of his own office or study. It showed how the men had risen to the responsibility of leadership which college education lays upon a man.

One other thing I noticed, too: most of these boys had turned out to be men of fine, high character, of nobility and what one is glad to say, men of real Christian character and interested in religious things. Boys who had taken life lightly when they came to college were now taking it seriously.

Shall I say one thing in closing this letter of random reflections and run the risk of calling down fire on my head? The athletes do not show up very well. I read much of the wonderful training athletics give the college boy for his life work—but, somehow, when the alumni of thirty years' standing get together it is the boys who used their brains and not the boys who used their legs who are in the high places. Take this for what it is worth.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

A Religion of Reality

By Rev. Percy Stickney Grant, D. D.

Rector of the Church of the Ascension, New York City

[Our readers will want to see for themselves the sermon preached by Dr. Grant on January 21, after Bishop Manning had written to him urging him either to alter his statement concerning the power of Jesus, made in his sermon of January 14, or to consider severing his connection with the Episcopal Church. Dr. Grant in his sermon has made clear his religious position and the background of ideas by which he reached it. Although the sermon is long, we have printed it practically in full, because it seemed scarcely fair either to our readers or to Dr. Grant to do otherwise. The crowd fairly stormed the Church of the Ascension to hear this sermon.]

OUR text is from the fifty-fourth chapter of the Book of Isaiah, the fourth verse:

"Behold, I have given Him for a witness to the people, a leader and commander to the people."

Professor Leighton of the Ohio University, who has the Department of Philosophy, and is also a clergyman of our church, says that ideas are "checks drawn on the bank of experience. If they are returned marked 'no funds' they are false."

William James, the psychologist, says: "True ideas are those that we can assimilate, validate, corroborate and verify." It is worth having those four words in our minds, so I will repeat them—"True ideas are those we can assimilate," those we can get assistance from, get light from; "that we can validate," prove the truth of; "corroborate," by contact in some way that satisfies yourself; and "verify." Those last three words represent different conditions, but they sound something like the same thing. In other words, if you cannot assimilate a thought and cannot validate and corroborate and verify it, then it is false.

History is a record of living ideas that supplant dead ones, a record of progressiveness. What a lot of ideas you used to have that you have now given up! And no matter how handsome a dead idea is, even if as handsome as a Pharaoh in a tomb, we should rather have a living idea that can be a part of us today than a gold-covered idea of the dead.

Dr. Briggs, who was tried for heresy and put out of the Presbyterian Church, told me one day fifteen years later, as we sat at luncheon, that at the time of our conversation his judges had changed their ideas, and then held those so-called heresies for which he had been put out of the Church. They could not stomach now the ideas that had made them persecute him. They could not assimilate them, or corroborate them, or validate them, or verify them.

If ideas are so important, it is clear that nothing must stand in the way of our having them presented to us—ideas in politics, economics, sociology and religion. We must ask that the very widest presentation of ideas be made to us so that we can select and experiment with them and see whether it is good food or not; whether they may be assimilated, validated, corroborated and verified. We must have the fullest freedom of speech in order to hear the greatest number of ideas that we are to test or assimilate, validate, corroborate and verify.

That is your method of growing and my method of growing. You don't value yourself physically so highly when you grow older; people after the thirties are rather passe physically, but as you grow older you pride yourself on having juster ideas about things, ideas that conform more to the facts of life; a man has got a lot of phantasies out of him and dreams and things that are not so, and he relies upon things he can put his finger on, and a man feels the ground under his feet as he grows older to the extent that he substitutes ideas that he cannot assimilate or verify by ideas that he can assimilate and verify.

Then that is our mental growth—getting rid of ideas that are not good. Any one who stops that process is hindering civilization, I might say is blackjacking his soul.

What do you want? What do you require of a religion? What do you want it to do for you? Perhaps something like this is the answer: You wish your religion to give you courage, comfort, inspiration for effort. I never had a more pleasant confirmation of that than from a young man in this church, who told me that he went out from church so filled with energy he wanted to fight the lamp-post and he did not mean fighting the lamp-post in the way we may have seen some inebriates doing.

So you wish your religion to give you courage and you want it to give you comfort. Heaven knows we are constantly at the sad side of life. We want it to inspire us to effort, because we don't want to go slipping down, we don't want to go soldiering on the job. Well, then, that is a little indication in us sometimes that we do not want to be quite as lazy as we are. We want something that will inspire us, and make it worth while to be up and doing.

And we want encouragement to have good will toward our fellow men. Lots of things occur that are not just pleasant, and turn our minds to the sad side of life. Well, we want to have a religion that will help us out of that as a permanent state of mind.

We also want our religion to give us hope when confronted by the brutal facts of death.

In short, your religion fills the world with power that is on your side; you are not alone in this world with this religion; you are not weak with your religion. You have the central powers of God on your side and with you.

Now to secure such great helps to living under the circumstances of man's various phases of development through his million or so years of evolution, he has fashioned for himself certain beliefs and practices, which he has a perfect right to do. He has worshipped fetiches, wonderworking relics, and there is plenty of evidence that the results were favorable to the needs of man.

He has worshipped spirits, mostly evil spirits, and has created formulas and tricks to thwart these evil spirits. He has put faith in magic as practiced by rainmaking priests, and sought to add to his powers some of the powers of nature. He has personified these powers of nature and worshipped them—the sky, Zeus the god came from the sky; he has worshipped the thunder, Jove; and the stars, and the productive forces of earth and of humanity.

This magic the students of today say was the earliest form of science, the trying to get out of nature the power which man saw in his ignorance was of value, and by magic formulas procure the benefit of it for himself.

From all this he has secured encouragement and comfort and inspiration, and fellowship and the sense of God's presence. It stands to reason that the religion that gives these desirable things in the largest degree, with the smallest overhead charge in terms of things that are not true, is the best religion.

We don't want a religion that has too large an overhead charge. If out of three hundred sixty-five days in the year a man's religion demands that he give two hundred to religious ceremonials, etc., absence from work, etc., that would be too expensive an overhead charge for religion. If out of his limited mental life (thought of in terms of conquest over nature) man had to lumber his mind with quite opposite fantasies, beliefs and customs—which in fact hold him back in his mental task of understanding and conquering nature, then that would be a very expensive overhead. You want religion to give you all it can and not waste your time or reduce the intellectual productiveness of your days. In fact, you want all that enhanced by religion—that is what religion is for, to enhance your powers.

Now, the Christian religion undertook to do some of these things in the most attractive way—by teaching mankind how wonderfully made they were; that they were all brethren, and the temples of God, holy, sacred, wonderful things, and that at the heart of the universe was something that cares—was in fact love. Every one you meet becomes an instrument in revelation, who either enlightens you or gives you a soul-growing note. Jesus showed the happiness of discovering spiritual beauties in every one and in helping every one. So every one you meet becomes an instrument of revelation. You cannot meet any one, that you try at all to know, without finding some gold in them, and precious stones, and loveliness; something to trust; to build upon.

And so Jesus, this teacher of God, who called God "love," and even on the Cross asked His heavenly Father to forgive His enemies, because they were ignorant,—that was the matter with them, and they did not know what they were doing—you do not think of Jesus as being bored; you do not think of Him as having any of the unpleasant temperamental conditions which make some of us grouchy or unpleasant companions.

Now, the Christian religion, viewed from that point of view, needs only the testimony of the soul. It does not need transactions in the miraculous, outside of the field of natural activities and contrary to what we understand of the laws of nature. It is the miracle in the essence of the revealed wonder-working laws of the human life, the transforming power of love, and of the new perceptions of life which Jesus taught.

Accordingly many clergymen refuse to have all the splendor of Christianity made dark and difficult by stories which do not accord with our scientific knowledge. The famous Dean Inge of St. Paul's, London, said something like this recently: "The authorities of the Church of England must understand how many clergymen there are who can get along without the miraculous."

Religion ought to be the easiest thing in the world. We have heard in the fifty-fifth chapter of Isaiah this morning, that everything broke forth into singing. That is what religion ought to do. Religion ought to be an easy thing instead of a difficult thing. That is what Jesus was trying to make it. Didn't he tell the religious leaders of his time that they must be born again? That was absolutely the challenge of his ministry; that was the burden of his belief; and the burdens of expensive sacrifice were to be taken away. All these people had to do was to act as brethren toward each other, to treat each other right.

If religion is an instinct for personal and world improvement, it should be something that mankind goes about with singing, with a free mind and heart, and no burden on his shoulders. When all manner of things that affront reason, that perplex decision, and seem to have nothing to do with the betterment of mankind are made the very gateway of religion, then something is certainly wrong. When fellowship with a religious reformer and leader, who claimed that he was "the way, the truth and the light," and whose words and deeds bore out the statement, when such an association can only be secured in official church organization by belief in facts and theories, which no college faculty in this country could honestly O. K., then religion is made a distressing controversy, a confused mental combat, a clinging to outworn forms, which takes the heart out of what should be perpetual inspiration.

The history of the nineteenth century records individuals spiritually shipwrecked, because they supposed that religion depended upon the miraculous, those things which a man could not adjust himself to or accept. In the middle of that century Amiel said that what we wanted was a new psychology. Charcot, Wundt, Freud, Jung, William James have given us this psychology. We understand in a large measure how human consciousness came into being. The religious question today is not of physical evolution—that was settled sixty years ago.

William James said we could not get away from religion, because our nature was made in such a way with these two sides, one idealistic and the other trying all the time to catch up with it; that religion was born in us by the way we are constructed. So this new psychology is very religious from the point of view that it gives you a basis of religion that nobody can take away from you.

The attacks upon liberalism are covert attacks upon the evolution of consciousness, which is the commanding scientific fact, so far as religious people are concerned; for it gives them the laws of their own being, its weaknesses, its strength, its degeneration, its development; and their co-operation with these laws and love of this possibility of development are the tests of religion.

A great many of the attacks on liberalism today are a continuation of these old attacks upon such men as Darwin. I had to write an article upon Darwin years and years ago and I was astonished to find how soon after his book came out the ecclesiastical people got after him. The Bishop of Oxford attacked Darwin and his ideas of physical evolution. Then they attacked Romanes and his idea of mental evolution. Now clergymen are attacked who read psychology and believe in the evolution of consciousness.

Some people got accustomed to the physical side of evolution but could not stand for the mental evolution. They said that reduces everything to dirt and mud; it is nonsense. Then come along psychologists and say that science itself is an evolutionary product, but so far as you and I are concerned psychology is of enormous value to all of us, for it tells us with plainness what the laws of this science are.

So that a man can say to himself today—what does the God of this universe want of me? And by the light of psychology he can say—Why, so far as I can see the God of the Universe wants me to be a perfected personality; He wants me to be obedient to all the laws of inner growth, and not to behave in such a way as to destroy the loveliness and beauty of the human spirit inside of the human body.

Then God wants you to turn around and, in contact with the things that make environment, study the growth of personality. Those are the needs of today. We want to be scientifically organized ourselves, as a driver who holds the reins of four or eight horses in one hand, and then we want to make our environment meet the needs of our natures. When we hear that the working people don't like to live in houses where there is no plumbing, or in towns where there is no hall or meeting place, we will say that it is perfectly all right that they should kick at that; they want their environment to assist in the development of their personality.

I was a clergyman for seven years in a town where the only recreation of the population was riding to the cemetery. That was so much recognized by the undertakers that they did not go straight to the cemetery by the shortest route, but they would drive down to the city hall and around the side of the hall and then into what we might call the Fifth Avenue of the place and up Fifth Avenue by all the fine houses and finally arrive at the cemetery. These hackmen knew that they were paid a dollar for that ride and they must take the avenues in order that the people might enjoy it. Well, today we don't want such environments, even when the undertakers are personal friends. We wish them well, but we do not wish an environment that gives them too much to do.

Today we have more reason for loving the God of life than ever in the past they had for loving the God of death. We know today that there are powers of nature on man's side of incredible richness and potency. In the past death seemed to have been more in the mind of man than life. They were afraid of life and tried to make terms all the time with death. There is wrapped up in every human being undeveloped powers of startling magnitude. Try to remember that.

We don't have to grope through life on some milk train of energy. What we want to do is to get on an express train and get along. We don't want to be satisfied with just poking along through life, satisfied if we don't get run over when crossing Fifth Avenue. That is one of the things these gentlemen called psychologists found out for us, that there is incredible power in us and we can use it and it is worth doing for ourselves and for mankind.

I don't ask you to fight lamp-posts, I ask you to fight the indifference or laziness or ignorance that prevents your taking hold of yourself and making yourself very much more than you are. We have more reason today for seeing that the needs of all mankind are the same—that is to say, we need health, and the normal development of personality, with the protection of an environment suited to sustain, aid and develop it.

As to the future life—well, religion cannot help having an opinion about it. No one can have a profounder hope or belief than the man who thinks the highest of this life here. The more we think of life here the more we believe in the life hereafter. I have constantly used this illustration: Suppose a Chinaman whose father had been a manufacturer of porcelain, and whose grandfather had been a manufacturer of porcelain, suppose this Chinaman, in whose family for centuries this great art had been practiced, tries to carry out some of the ideas and ideals of his ancestors, particularly as to color in his porcelain, and finally after many experiments and after hundreds of years have passed unsuccessfully, this man finally accomplishes the idea he has so often striven for. You saw in the Morgan collection the Black Hawthorne, valued at $25,000, and the Peachblow, valued at $15,000, and this man, who finally got this miraculous color that he had struggled for so long and his ancestors had worked for—what would you say if that man should take that beautiful vase and smash it in the very moment of his triumph?

After all, this world that seems such a mad world is not such a mad world after all. We know the sun is going to rise and is going to set, the marvelous universe is whirling around without very much motion, and this certain temperature which we are able to live in is going to proceed for a long time. I say the whole course of life leads us to believe that it is leading to something beyond.

I am interested, as I have said, to have a religion that will not waste so much time as mine has done. A great deal of my mature life has been spent in getting rid of what I was taught in my youth. Often people have said that it is the same with them. I have always had the hope that things said in the Church of the Ascension could really be built into life in a substantial way and not thrown out, but become a real foundation for any one to build upon.

It seems to me that religious instruction ought to be like that. Now the religion of perfect consciousness can be like that, because if you learn how you are organized, the lights of the inner nature that are to be obeyed, while there may be some shifting and changing of emphasis or clarification by future explanation, on the whole you have something that will not be thrown out and will not make you so discouraged that you will want to sit down and do nothing, or give up.

Religious belief in the past was too often like pebbles in the shoes, very unpleasant and you have to go very slow. The only thing to do is to take the shoe off and get out the pebbles.

People are all the time saying, "Why are not the liberals constructive? They pull down but they do not build up. They tell you what they don't like, but they do not tell you what they do like, and when they try to be constructive they are singularly incompetent, weak and unsatisfactory." It is easier for a man to tear down a building than to put up the building. Very often the despairing cry of the liberal is the cry of pain. After all, as some one has said, pain is the cry of growth, the cry of the nerve for pure blood. And if the liberal cries in pain it is the cry of somebody for fresh and pure truth.

Across the street perhaps you have noticed they are pulling down several houses. The one in the corner was the first mansard-roofed house built in New York, a house of large rooms, great comfort, which has dispensed splendid hospitalities. The houses next to it, too, were desirable dwellings. The house across the street from the rectory, which will also come down, was a delightful home. These four fine dwellings, with stables and sheds, are being levelled to the ground because they wish to build on the site a fifteen-story apartment house which will probably hold one hundred times more people than the land has ever before taken care of for a permanent residence.

Very few people will complain that such an important location as the corner of Fifth Avenue and Tenth Street is made a pleasant home for a larger number of families who have to live and work in New York. But leaving that out of consideration, evidently these houses have to be torn down before anything can be built up. There always has to be some clearing of the ground if new things, new institutions, new ideas, new customs are to be given room.

A liberal is not a man who delights in destruction; that is nonsense. He sees more vividly, that the thing that is torn down is to be replaced by something that is going to do a lot of good. We have to remember that we live under institutions that seem to have certain hard and fast lines of law, but are really plastic, because all the time they are under the interpretation of the mind.

We have the Constitution of the United States, but very shortly it had to be interpreted. One interpretation is a local one and another a Federal interpretation. And there are a great many things in the Constitution that sound to you and me in a certain direction, yet the courts have interpreted them as demanded by the needs of the country, saying such needs are superior to the little text of the Constitution. We have to live in some sort of a framework, some organization, but within that there stands the movement of the mental life, a constant change is going on, which eventuates in time in outer changes as well, but meanwhile the spirit of the inner is on the whole dominating the materialism of the outer.

La Follette, Borah and Johnson are members of the same party as Henry Cabot Lodge. Their interpretation is different from his, but who can say that that party, or any other party, is not encouraged by those who go far along the interpretative side, the living side, the side that tries to meet the requirements of the facts of life today rather than the letter which may have been handed down from a remote past.

An alienist told me that in his hospital, in a room shrouded in mysterious darkness, penetrated occasionally by flashes of electricity, he could so force emotion of individuals there that they would say and do almost anything. A great deal of the older religion was of this kind—fear forced emotions to a lamentable and distressed extent, mental and physical.

And some of the nervous diseases of America are the result today of that kind of religion. When men and women, coming out of Puritan meeting houses, had hysterics, and shook like leaves with uncontrollable nervous tremors, so that in the churchyard they had stakes planted for them to hold on to until the hysterical tremors passed, that is a religion that probably you and I am very glad we don't have. One does not wish to return to it. Today all of that is considered little short of criminal. Far from being thought a religion, it is an insult to any idea of Deity and an outrage upon human nature.

The same distinguished physician, who is so important a member of the church as to be on its great committees, said to me, without my having said anything to him of

(Continued on page 178)

---

---

---

Bolsheviki Warring on Religion

Patriarch and Metropolitan of Petrograd Held as Traitors—Archbishop of Moscow and Other Anti-Soviet Prelates Seized—Priests and Laymen Executed for Opposing the Pillage of Churches by Red Soldiers

---

By Courtesy of the "New York Herald"

---

In all the Government press organs there is now a cry about the newborn religious movement, the new religious conscience, the dissensions within the Church. "In fact," says a high orthodox ecclesiastic, "there exists nothing of the kind. In order to create a wide religious movement there must be sincere feeling and self-sacrifice. How can a worthless band, acting with violence and filled with deceit, talk of sincerity? This band is strong only in the support of the civil power which recognizes no guarantee to persons."

In the Donskoi Monastery Patriarch Tikhon occupies three small rooms with an exit on to the wall of the monastery whereon he is allowed to walk. Nobody is admitted to see him. From time to time during his daily walk he is able to exchange a few words with friends whom he sees below. From him broken words it is clear he is living in complete ignorance of what has happened since his fall from power. Evidently the position of the church causes him the most anxiety. He asks sadly whether Agafangel or Innocent has yet arrived. He is not permitted to say mass. When his trial will take place is unknown.

Most of the information given in this article has been obtained from Russia's greatest religious authorities—but it is not without some bias. To sum up my own observations, extending over a series of years, the Russian church has failed in its mission. The obscurantism encouraged by the Imperial Government was all against its development as a religious force. The priests were generally ignorant. The educated classes were generally irreligious. The masses were fed upon superstition rather than upon a reasoning belief. The revolution did not remedy this state of affairs. The widespread distress and misery which it provoked drove people in thousands to the churches, but did not bring inspiration to the priesthood. The spirit of martyrdom is confined to few; it is certainly not abroad in the land.

The feeling that the church should become a living force was widely spread, but the priesthood was too incompetent to take advantage of that feeling, and the people were too apathetic, depressed and ignorant to take the lead themselves. Then the Soviet Government stepped in. With a brutality which effectively crushed the sporadic attempts at resistance, it set itself to destroy the church hierarchy. With an ingenuity which would be admirable in a better cause, it has profited by the situation arising out of the famine to discredit the old church administration, and it has seized an opportune moment to direct in channels useful to itself the perfectly natural and healthy desire of the people for a church more in harmony with present needs.

In Russia, unlike Europe of the seventeenth century, there has been no reformation and no secularization of Christian morality, nor was Christianity ever converted into a method and discipline of everyday life, into a bourgeois morality. In Russia there was religion and a religious sense, but into everyday life as a principle of discipline religion did not penetrate.

Joseph de Maistre, from the absence of religious education in the Russian people, deduced over one hundred years ago the possibility in Russia of the most destructive revolution in which "quelque Pougatcheff d'universite" literally "smashes up" the State. Alongside this astonishing prophecy I might place another that was made by the same thinker. It is to the effect that the Russian church is a mummy long kept wrapped in bandages by the State, but, certain to crumble into dust once these bandages of ignorance and obscurantism are removed and the light of modern knowledge let into the coffin. As a matter of fact this is exactly what is happening to the Russian church. It is crumbling to pieces before our eyes; and judging by all appearances the people will go straight from Christian medievalism to Communist agnosticism.

The great danger which Europe has to fear from Bolshevism is still to come. As an economic theory Bolshevism has been a failure; but now it may conquer as a religious theory; and, as it has already got complete control of the church organization there is no reason to believe that it will fail to capture the great bulk of the submissive and ignorant peasantry. The orthodox priests and bishops who have kept aloof from the reform movement underestimate the enormous success which that movement is having. There have been contemptuous remarks by these orthodox hierarchs about the propaganda efforts of Antonine and Krasnitsky, but I must add that these orthodox hierarchs are too biased and too optimistic.

Antonine, Leonide and Krasnitsky should carry all Russia with them. They may be debauches, police spies and everything that is foul, but religious revolutions always throw up objects as charred and unrepresentable as those ejected from the blazing craters of political revolutions.

What we have to take into account is the fact that the great Church of Russia has fallen into the hands of its enemies just as the great empire of Russia has got into the hands of the Bolsheviki. In outward appearance that Church is the same. Its decrees are couched in the old style. Its services are little altered. The whole of the vast machinery moves as before. But in complete charge of that machinery are renegade archbishops and priests who, judging by their written declarations, are themselves Bolsheviks or, at all events, willing instruments of the Soviet Government. The Bolsheviks might make some fatal error like murdering the patriarch, though, so far, their policy toward the Church has been marked by craft as well as by brutality. They seemed to know exactly how far they could safely go, and they went just to the danger line when, during the trial of the fifty-four, they showed a disposition to declare illegal all forms of Church Government in Russia. Had they done so they would have come into collision with Rome, Canterbury, the Lutheran Church, the Jews and the Mohammedans; but somebody, perhaps Lenin, averted this disaster by suddenly changing the course.

---

---

---

Much can be said in favor of some resolutions adopted by the Reformed Russian Church, though the spirit of vindictiveness which animates the reformers and the guiding hand of the Soviet Government is always visible.

Funds collected from all sources in the church are to be handed over to the new Supreme Church Administration, which will in any case be assured of a large and steady income, as all the wonder working ikons, places of pilgrimages and other money making devices of the old church will continue to bring money into the coffers of the new, for the muzhik will be far too ignorant to see that any change will have taken place. His village church will remain where it was. In ninety cases out of one hundred the parish priest will remain in it under the new regime.

Not one country priest in a thousand knows the truth of what has happened; they get all their information about Tikhon and the new church from the Government newspapers. I even find that the average well educated man and woman in Moscow does not know one hundredth part as much about the trouble between church and State which has been going on here for the last six months as the American reader of this article will know. I talked yesterday about the Patriarch's difficulties to the member of a very religious and highly cultured family here in Moscow and was amazed to learn that they knew hardly anything at all of that subject. "We only know," they said, "what appears in the Bolshevik newspapers."

Thus we have the extraordinary spectacle of an ancient Christian priesthood which has had the torch of the faith handed on to them by the fathers of the Byzantine Church, and which is admitted by all other Christian churches to possess all the plenitude of priestly power—we have the extraordinary spectacle of such a priesthood becoming a puppet moved at the will of a most anti-Christian and atheistical Government which has never lost an opportunity of harrying religion. We have this Government in the incongruous position of protecting and dominating "the Living Church," which they have set up as the established church of Russia.

The new church congress, of which I have spoken about, removed the ban on Tolstoy and passed resolutions appealing to the clergy of all grades to join the banner of the new administration of the Living Church.

Time alone will show to what extent the masses of the people will assimilate the reforms of the new party. Undoubtedly a good many of the priests and the laity will remain firm, so that Russian Christians will be divided into three parts—the Reformed Russian Church, the Orthodox Russian Church and the old believers. The former will have, I think, in a year or so far more members than the other two combined. Despite all that orthodox theologians and pious orthodox laymen may say, it is evident that the Soviet Government is victorious.

I shall end this article by again quoting Joseph de Maistre and when we remember that this prophecy was made more than a hundred years ago, we cannot but be amazed at the almost supernatural prescience it shows.

Speaking of the Russian serfs, De Maistre says, "These serfs, in proportion as they receive their liberty, will find themselves placed between teachers more than dubious and priests without strength or consideration. Thus exposed, without preparation, they will pass rapidly and infallibly from superstition to atheism, from passive obedience to unbridled activity. Liberty will have on all these temperaments the effect which a strong wine has on a man unaccustomed to it. The sight alone of this liberty will intoxicate those who have not yet taken part in it. If, with this general disposition of the popular mind, there should appear some University Pugachev (for such a one can easily be formed in Russia where all the necessary conditions exist) . . . then, according to all the rules of probability the State will be literally smashed to pieces."

Pugachev, I should explain, was the Jack Cade of Russia, a robber chief who stirred up a great revolt of the peasants in the reign of Catherine the Great; and a better description of Lenine than a "University Pugachev" it would be hard to imagine. But my reason for giving this quotation is not because it mentions Lenine but because it speaks of the peasant passing "rapidly and infallibly from superstition to atheism."

If I were writing an article about Lenine, and searching Russian literature for prophecies of that Red Messiah's advent, I would certainly quote a remarkable poem written by the great Russian poet Lermontov in 1831. It has been translated as follows in the Slavonic Review for June, 1922:

A year shall come, our blackest year of all,
In which the Crown of Russia's Tzars shall fall:
The mob shall change its old confiding mood,
And death and blood shall be our daily food.
Law, overthrown, no more shall guard the lives
Of tender children and of guiltless wives;
Then stinking corpses shall send forth disease
To stalk throughout our wretched villages;
Men waving kerchiefs as they call you out,
Our country shall lie starving in the drought;
Red flames shall glow upon our streams that hour;
And then shall stand revealed the Man of Power;
And thou shalt know him and shall understand
For what he holds the dagger in his hand.
And this is woe for thee! Thy tears, thy plaint
For him that day shall make but merriment;
And all in him is ghastly, all is gloom
Even as his sable cloak and lofty plume.

my thought, that the great object of man's life today was this development of personality and the improvement of environment. I never was so surprised in my life as when the doctor whispered this formula in my ears at his own table.

I have always preferred to picture Christ from his associates. I would rather hear about Napoleon from his Generals than from Lord Roseberry. I would rather learn about Christ from Matthew, Mark and Luke, than from St. Augustine. The friends of Jesus deal in facts, the later theologians in metaphysical theories.

I said last Sunday that when Christ was on earth He did not possess the power of God. This is certainly the teaching of the first three Gospels—Matthew, Mark and Luke. Those are what the theologians call the synoptic Gospels.

Bishop Gore, the most eminent voice in the Church of England, says that the Virgin Birth was not a part of the teaching of the early Church.

Jesus said, "Call not Me good. There is none good but one; that is God." There is only one person good, and that is God. And He said: "My Father is greater than I." Is this not what St. Paul also affirmed when he said "Christ emptieth himself?" As the great author of the Collossians put it: "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself." So Jesus is called a revelation of God. Jesus was perfectly human. Whatever else we choose metaphysically to say about Him must be brought into accord with His humanity.

My view of Jesus is rather that of the companions of Jesus than of the later theologians. By and by, under the influence of Plato, and later, in Rome, of Aristotle, the idea of Jesus turned into the picture of a stern judge, whose decrees were so severe that men and women prayed to His mother to ask her son to relent. Instead of the loving shepherd, they had the stern judge, and mankind did not know what to do with this judge of severe castigation. So they humbly went to the mother of Jesus to ask her to plead with her son.

Then came the worship of the Virgin Mary. Now, the vital laws of the soul should not mean authority, outward authority. There is a line of Milton that is something like this: "These laws are laws that can enforce themselves." Now, those are laws of the soul. They can enforce themselves. If you disobey the laws of the soul you do not have to wait to get to Heaven to be punished for that, but the punishment fits the crime immediately.

These laws that are in our consciousness are laws that can enforce themselves. So that the religion of greatest freedom joined to the religion of greatest intelligence is going to get along very well indeed without outer authority. We must advance, therefore, into the future of greater knowledge, greater study, greater success in solving the problems of this complicated human mind.

We do not want to waste so much time on things that are nonsense. Think of the problems of Europe, England and the United States—and the brains of the world seem absolutely paralyzed before these problems. Why is it? The soul-consciousness of the world has got to get at those things. There must be different studies in the schools and colleges to assist in the solution, and we must get rid of all that attitude of the mind that takes up too much room in our rather small personality.

After all has been said we must remember that Jesus asked not of His followers metaphysical exaltation or devotion, but he asked a very simple thing. He asked them to love Him.

I used that text from the lesson prescribed to be read today because it seemed to meet that particular point very nicely. "Behold I have given him for a witness to the people, a leader and commander to the people." You cannot be a witness and a leader and commander to the people if you have any complicated problems. You remember how Abraham Lincoln said we could not have two governments here, one of freedom and one of slavery. Jesus was a commander and leader because He said we have got to have this wonderful good-will with each other.

Listen to some of the things He said:

Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth;

But I say unto you, that ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite you on the right cheek turn to him the other also.

And if any man will sue thee at the law and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also.

And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain.

Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away.

Ye have heard that it hath been said: Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thy enemy.

But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you;

That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.

For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? Do not even the publicans the same?

And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? Do not even the publicans so?

Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.

Now that is the spirit of Jesus Christ. That is Christianity. It is not a belief, it is a scientific emotion and relation.

Now, after all, all such matters are your affair. Do you want an American Church which believes in freedom rather than in authority? Then have it. Do you want an unshackled clergyman so that when he gets up in a place like this he says, so far as he knows, the truth, and is not held by strings pulling this way and that? If you want an unshackled clergy have it. Do you want to know all they can find out for you, or do you want them to conceal these facts?

One of the prerequisites of being a minister is that a minister has a good deal of time and cause for reading. He has got to read a great many books. He must find out something. Do you want your clergyman to pass on all this or to keep it to himself if these facts do not chime with something taught forty years ago? Do you want the Church to be ruled and silenced by sinister financial powers? You know this church is empty and dark every Sunday night. It used often to be as full as it is today on Sunday nights, with a very happy and wonderful lot of people. Do you want more churches shut up or do you want to keep the element from the universities out of the ministry, out of the Church congregation?

When your son comes back from college, and you say to him: "Come to church this morning," do you want him to reply: "Father, no; don't ask me to listen to such bunk as that."?

Now, I was thrilled by reading the stanza of the hymn that we sang just before the service—Bishop Briggs used to like to read the hymn before anybody sang it; that seemed like wasting time, yet really when we sing a hymn, we are listening to and thinking of the music. I will read this:

Spirit of truth and love,
Life-giving, holy Dove,
Speed up Thy flight!
Move on the waters' face,
Bearing the lamp of grace,
And, in earth's darkest place,
Let there be light!

In Jesus' commands, He said "Love God with all your heart and soul and mind,"—with your emotions, with your spirit and with your brain. Then He said: "Love your neighbor as yourself."

That is my sentiment.

Dr. Grant's Reply to Bishop Manning

[Last week in the World of Today we told the facts of the situation which developed in regard to Dr. Percy Stickney Grant, rector of the Episcopal Church of the Ascension, New York. We there printed Bishop Manning's letter, to which the following is the answer. Dr. Grant's letter calls for open-minded consideration.]

The Right Reverend William T. Manning, D.D., Bishop of New York.

My Dear Bishop Manning:

I shall endeavor to answer your letter of January 19 as clearly and unambiguously as possible.

First, as to the "miraculous elements of the Gospel." I cannot love God with my mind and at the same time believe that the laws of nature were ever violated; for the simple reason that God Himself has taught me, as He is teaching all our sons and daughters in every modern university of the Western world today, that those laws are immutable throughout eternity. It is not in the remotest degree that I question His power. It is simply a matter of evidence. Every science which His Spirit is revealing to us today combines to affirm that "the unfailing order of immortal nature" has behind it His own will and purpose. If you reply that in the Gospel miracles, laws of which we have no knowledge, were set in operation, I must answer that in such case the alleged events cease to be miracles. Should your hypothetical contention turn out to be true in fact, with all lovers of truth I would rejoice in such fresh revelations. But of this there is as yet not a scintilla of evidence. In the "miracles" of healing, many of the laws employed by Christ have today been made known to us, but we thereby realize clearly that such works are not contrary to but in accordance with law. To another category belong such stories, for instance, as that of Christ walking for perhaps half a mile upon the surface of the water. All books of the New Testament tell us that He had a true human body and lived a real human life. That human body weighed, let me say, 150 pounds. Am I helped either in my own inner life or in my preaching to others by affirming that such a body, in utter defiance of the law of gravitation, walked upon water as upon a solid floor? Were I to state that this is a literal fact, might I not justly be charged with denying the true humanity of our Lord? And I am very sure that Jesus of Nazareth did nothing in His life for the purpose of creating wonder. Indeed he definitely refused the request for a sign of this character, affirming such seeking to be the mark of a degraded generation.

My position in the matter is that of the Rev. Dr. Inge, Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, one of the most brilliant minds of the American communion, who says ("Outspoken Essays," first series, page 33): "Miracles must, I am convinced, be relegated to the sphere of pious opinion. It is not likely, perhaps, that the progress of science will increase the difficulty of believing them; but it can never again be possible to make the truths of religion depend upon physical portents having taken place as recorded. The Christian revelation can stand without them, and the rulers of the Church will soon have to realize that in very many minds it does stand without them."

The writers of the gospels were men steeped in the ideas of the Old Testament, according to the documents, of which miracle was almost an every-day occurrence. Yet the historicity of those Hebrew stories, as you know well, is today rejected by the majority of even the conservative scholars of the Anglican communion. But is it possible for those who love truth above all things to draw a line between the Old and the New Testament?

Our earliest gospel was written by a man who had not been a follower of Christ during his life on earth, and the author was therefore dependent for his information upon others. Quite apart from this fact, was it not inevitable that in an age in which evidence, sequence, causation were almost wholly unknown terms that every remarkable event should be explained as "miracle?" I need only remind you, as illustrative of this fact, of the evangelist's explanation of mental disorder by the hypothesis of devil possession. I do not suppose that you, any more than other educated Christian teachers, imagine that in the physical body of the Gergesene "demoniac" were really dwelling some five thousand devils, who at the word of Christ transferred themselves to the bodies of swine. But St. Mark, by his use of the word, "legion," the name of the Roman regiment, clearly implies that this was the case. On the other hand, again, of course with you, I truly believe that our Lord healed this unfortunate man. St. Mark explains the fact by the aid of first century science, and I by the help of twentieth century science. Is this disloyalty, either to Christ or the Church?

Another factor of which I would remind you and which has a profound bearing upon the question of miracles, is the manner in which later evangelists heighten the miraculous element in the stories of the earliest Gospel. It is a commonplace of scholarship that "the unknown Palestinian disciple," to use the phrase of Bishop Gore, who compiled the Gospel according to St. Matthew, incorporated into his document most of the Gospel according to St. Mark. But I ask you to note that in almost every case of "miracle" he has added further miraculous elements to the former's stories. Would you say that I must also believe these? Even Bishop Gore, who is so insistent upon belief in miracle, affirms of at least one which is recorded in St. Matthew's Gospel, that "it is difficult to believe it to be historical." We both know that fifty years ago Bishop Gore would have been tried and deposed for that statement; and that Bishop Colenso was degraded for saying far less than what the former Bishop of Oxford has affirmed in his "Belief in God." Yet today Bishop Colenso's belief is held by every conservative Anglican who reads. But, you will reply, "There must be a limit somewhere: a line must be drawn beyond which it is disloyal to go." Most heartily do I concur in this. The limit is Truth; and he who is disloyal to Truth has no place in the ministry of the Church. But Truth is not something of which one can have different brands. There can be no such things as "Episcopalian Truth," or "Presbyterian Truth," or "Catholic Truth." Truth is what is. And as the centuries roll on the Holy Spirit of God is ever guiding men into fresh vistas of Truth. You would not, I know, attempt to silence this search for Truth by authority. Bishop Gore may be in error in his statements; so may I. That is a relatively small matter. What is of supreme importance, if we would follow the example of Christ, whose position in regard to current beliefs was above all things that of critic, is our attitude toward Truth. His quarrel with the orthodoxy of His day was not at all because of the inaccuracy or inadequacy of its beliefs. His flaming indignation, so graphically portrayed in the Gospels, was aroused by an attitude of mind, which, closed to New Truth, vehemently affirmed it already possessed all Truth. Must the Church of today continue to perpetuate this tragic error? As Canon Streeter admirably expresses it:

While the world—or rather its best men—have been seeking truth, the Church has been interested in defending tradition, with the result that the intellectual leadership, which in the Middle Ages belonged to the Church, has passed to the scientist. And the scientist, once outside the boundaries of his own subject and in the sphere of philosophy and ethics, has not infrequently led men wrong, to their no small hurt. Yet for this hurt, too, the Church is more than half responsible, for it has been the attitude of the Church toward the search for truth that has, quite unnecessarily, made science the traditional enemy and thereby prejudiced its devotees against an impartial consideration of the truth for which religion stands. * * * Apologists often point out that when a conflict has arisen between traditional views and modern hypotheses, whether of science or criticism or history, it has not infrequently happened that the traditionalist has ultimately been found in point of fact to be nearer to the truth. This may be so, but it is irrelevant. The Church's attitude to truth has been a moral, not an intellectual failure. To be mistaken about a matter of fact, or to entertain for a time a false hypothesis, is to be guilty of an error which time and further inquiry will correct. Absolute devotion to truth and making mistakes about the truth are quite compatible. Science makes mistakes. But not to be interested in discovering truth, to make a virtue of the fact under the name of "faith"; worst of all, deliberately to suppress one interest under the name of "the sacrifice of the reason" or "the asceticism of the intellect," is (for those who have the requisite mental capacity and training) openly to renounce obedience to the commandment, "Thou shalt love the Lord, thy God, with all thy mind." Nothing is nobler than the impulse which moves man to offer up his best and dearest to his God, nothing more pathetic than the delusion that he must first slay the thing he offers—whether it be his first-born in the flames of Moloch or his reason at the altar of Christ.

Now as to my belief in the Apostles' Creed. You say in your letter that while there is rightly allowed liberty of interpretation, "to call that interpretation which is in fact denial, is a misuse of language." May I venture to apply this sentence to an article of the Creed which we both recite? "I believe . . . He descended into Hell." "Hell" is of course the old English equivalent of the word "Infernos" or "Inferna," "the lower parts," which the Latin Creed employs here. "Lower parts of what?" You are as well aware as I what the words meant to the framers of the Creed. The Church inherited a Rabbinic Eschatology, based upon a geocentric conception of the universe, according to which the spirit of man at death went down at a right angle to the plane of the disk on which men lived, to a cavern in the middle of the earth. It was universally believed by the early Christians that at death Christ went to this locality. It is sufficient to remind you of St. Paul's words to the Ephesians: "He that ascended, what is it but that he also descended into the lower parts of the earth?" Now I plead guilty, not only of an interpretation of this statement, but to one which involves denial of the fact therein stated. I am sure as that I am writing these words, that there is no such place at a given depth below the surface of the earth, to which the spirits of men go after death. Christ did not go there, for the place does not exist. Would I be in error if I assumed that you heartily endorsed me in this particular matter? Perhaps, however, you will reply that the Protestant Episcopal Church, by her permission to use as an alternative for "hell" "the place of departed spirits," thereby defines this place to be other than a locality under the earth. If this contention be true in fact, then I must answer that our Church by such interpretation has in reality denied the fact which the Creed affirms to be true. From your point of view, could a single portion of the Church lawfully do this? And how would this harmonize with your statement that "to call that interpretation which is in fact denial, is a misuse of language?"

Can I be rightly said to disbelieve the Creed because I have come to see that its language here is wholly symbolic? I venture to think I can not. That clause was inserted, perhaps to attest the reality of Christ's death, and to affirm that He had a true human spirit. It would be superfluous to say that I believe this. I differ from the framers of the Creed in this particular only in their Eschatology, which was an inheritance from Rabbinic Judaism, and which the Spirit of God has shown us to be erroneous. If I am right in thinking you agree with me in this particular, do we not both, not simply interpret, but in our interpretation deny a fact which the Creed affirms to have occurred? And do we think that we are thereby disloyal to the Creed? Do we not rightly feel that we are endeavoring to affirm the essential idea which the framers of the Creed, with less perfect knowledge, were endeavoring to set forth? And we both will continue to affirm that Christ at His death passed into the world of spirit, and not into a locality below the surface of the earth, and this even though the Creed avers the latter, and though the Bishops a few years ago solemnly stated that "fixity of interpretation is of the essence of the Creeds."

With this quotation I should like to compare the formal verdict of the Bishop of Oxford last year in the case of the Rev. Mr. Major, a clergyman of the Church of England. But before reciting this may I recall the fact that a doctrinal judgment in the Church of England is applicable to our own communion, inasmuch as our Book of Common Prayer states that "this church is far from intending to depart from the Church of England in any essential point of doctrine, discipline, or worship?" Mr. Major was "cited" before the Bishop of Oxford on the charge that he denied the resurrection of the body. Replying to the charge at the demand of his Bishop, the accused, in a lengthy written statement, expounded historically, first, the meaning of the clause as held by Christians at the time it was inserted into the Creed, and as believed by the church until the middle of the nineteenth century. There was no possible ambiguity about the Church's belief. The original language of the Creed read, not "body" but "flesh," sometimes "this flesh"; and with the exception of some Alexandrian theologians, practically all Christians through the centuries believed that at the final judgment the actual fleshy body of the individual would be resuscitated. This teaching Mr. Major formally, and in language admitting of no ambiguity whatever, repudiated. That is, in interpreting this article of the Creed, he definitely denied the fact which the Creed affirmed. In so doing he claimed the right to retain and exercise his ministry in the Church of England. As you are aware, the three Professors of Divinity in the University of Oxford to whom as "Inquisitors" the Bishop submitted his reply, severally supported his contention, and with this the Bishop, in his formal judgment concurred. You are further aware that the appeal of the plaintiff to the Archbishop of Canterbury entirely failed.

I submit that in this case we have the judgment of the highest authority of the Anglican Communion that "fixity of interpretation is not of the essence of the Creed," and that interpretation, if in the light of the ever-growing truth, may even, without disloyalty to the essential ideas underlying the words of the Creed, involve denial of a creedal statement. Surely there is no disloyalty here. The framers of the creed were setting forth the most fundamental of all beliefs involved in the very acceptance of the idea of God: namely, that the personality of man survives the dissolution of his physical organism. In the absence of all biological knowledge, and with the inheritance of an Apocalyptic Eschatology, how else could they declare this tremendous truth than by affirming the literal resurrection and reassembling of the particles of which our bodies are composed? Should we demand of them a knowledge of cell chemistry which was not made known to man until modern times! You and I know that among the trillions of cells which compose our organism, are particles of germinal matter once forming portions of thousands of human bodies of the past. Shall we criticise Christians of a former day because they were unaware of this fact? On the other hand, loyalty to Him who is the Author of Truth demands that with the phraseology of venerable formularies we correlate the vast stores of new truth which God is ever revealing; and that, when necessary, we explain their phraseology in the light of such new knowledge.

It is in this sense, then, that I would look at the early Roman baptismal symbol which we call the Apostles' Creed. I desire ever to probe beneath its words to its ideas; to interpret the unchanging truths of religion which its framers endeavored to set forth, in the light of the accumulating stores of knowledge given by that Spirit who Christ promised would continually guide the Church into all the truth. Must I abandon my ministry and be ejected from the Church I love in order to do this?

I pass now to my belief in Jesus Christ, Our Lord. From my heart I believe that Jesus is the Portrait of the Invisible God, the perfect revelation of my Heavenly Father. When I ask myself "What is God like?" I can only answer, "He is like Jesus," and hence I can make my own the words "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father." But I cannot make my own either Platonist or Aristotelian explanations of the metaphysical relation between our Lord and the Father. I do not know what that metaphysical relationship may be, and I know that no one else on earth knows. For that revelation we must all alike await for the clear light of the other world, and be content while here to say with St. Paul, "Now I know in part"; "I count not myself yet to have apprehended." The Church in every age of its checkered career has endeavored to express anew, with the best thought and philosophy of its day, this relationship. But from the nature of the case it is impossible precisely to define the undefinable. It is easy to say, "Jesus is God"—alas! too easy. Such an affirmation, when we try to think through its meaning, brings us at once into the arid region of discarded metaphysical thought; in which, during the endeavor to keep clear the subtle meaning of such terms as Ousia, Hypostasis and Persona, it is well nigh impossible to avoid the Scylla of "dividing the Substance" without making shipwreck upon the Charybdis of "confounding the persons." It is so remote, either from the teaching of Christ, or from the hunger of the world for God to-day. It is much more in accordance with the Gospel to realize with St. Paul that "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself," and to have as the ideal of one's life the mystical thought of the same great Apostle: "I live, yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in flesh, I live in faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself for me." I would endorse the words of the Reverend C. E. Raven, a clergyman of the Church of England, and until recently Dean of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, who in a sermon before the University of Cambridge a year ago spoke as follows:

"We search the writings (of the orthodox traditionalists of to-day) to find the bread of life, for which the world is hungering. And we find, alas, that it should be so,—only the stones of ancient formularies, the scorpions of ancient superstitions. Take one instance. Nothing is more obviously vital than the restatement of the doctrine of the incarnation. Biology and psychology have profoundly modified the whole content of the words God and man. Critical science has recovered for us a fresh portrait of Jesus, and yet the heirs of Catholicism have hitherto only given us treatises based upon the historical accuracy of the Fourth Gospel and couched in terms of the question-begging formula of Chalcedon."

And I gladly make my own the weighty words of another Anglican clergyman, the late Henry Barclay Swete, D. D., Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge. In his preface to "The Cambridge Theological Essays" he says, p. 8ff.:

There is room in theology for the new as well as for the old, and each age, as it passes, must contribute to the store and not merely preserve and pass it on. * * * The times have moved on, bringing new workers, new facts, new ideas, glimpses even of whole fields of thought unknown to us then; and room must be found for these in our theology as well as in other departments of study. It is no disloyalty to the past to endeavor to keep pace with the present, or prepare for a future which is already coming into sight. Theologians above other men are tempted to regard what is novel as suspect or even self-condemned; does not the Queen of Sciences teach eternal and unchangeable truth? Was not the faith, it will be asked, once for all delivered to the saints? But those who urge this plea forget that there is another point of view which is not to be overlooked. If there are things new, as well as things old in the store of the spiritual householder, it is his duty to give prominence to each of these aspects of truth in its own place. The New Covenant, no longer new in point of time, possesses what the Old Covenant lacked, an inherent power of presenting itself in fresh lights, and of developing points of contact with the latest revelations of human knowledge. The Logos, as an early Christian writer has finely said, though He was of old, even from the beginning, manifested Himself anew at the Incarnation, and is evermore being born into a fresh, young life in the hearts of the saints; through her progressive realization of the Christ, the Church is enabled continually to renew the vitality of her early days, while there are epochs in her long history when the eternal truth appears with the startling freshness of a great spiritual discovery. Such an epoch, answering to an age or rapid progress in other branches of knowledge, may be dawning upon us now, and it is not for us to follow the example of the Scribes of our Lord's time by overlooking or misreading the signs of the time. The disciples of the Word dare not turn away any of the teachings of God in nature or in history because they may be thought to involve a reconstruction of some of their cherished beliefs.

As I read the scathing denunciations of many of my clerical brethren, who have rushed into print ere I have had opportunity even to frame my reply to you, I am reminded of some sober words of Bishop Gore in a book which last Lent you commended to the diocese:

"It is pitiful to see how many there are among the professed ministers of Christ, who, in an hour of popular discussion of some vital truth, are proved by their perplexity of dismay or by their uninstructed denunciations, never to have thought at all seriously or deeply about the most momentous questions."

The newspapers, by their headlines and editorials, have in many cases already judged me and pronounced me guilty, because I said in my sermon two Sundays ago, in speaking of Christ in His earthly life, "Very few clergymen to-day, who have been educated in the large universities—by which I mean places where science as well as classics and mathematics are taught—accept the idea that Jesus had the power of God." But surely this is only what our Lord Himself, in well attested sayings from our earliest sources of His life, clearly affirms; and it is also what His earliest Evangelist affirms. Thus, St. Mark says, with reference to a visit to Nazareth, that "He could do there no mighty work (elsewhere this term is usually translated 'miracle') * * * and He marvelled because of their unbelief." Here it is clearly stated that Jesus was unable to do a particular thing, and that he expressed surprise over a condition which he had not anticipated. If St. Mark, writing about 68 A. D., had thought that Jesus then possessed the power of God, do you seriously think that he could possibly have written this of Him? Or, if he had thought of Him in terms of the faith in the fifth century, let us say, the Chalcedonian definition of the Faith in the Fifth Century, could he possibly have written it of him?

A later evangelist, "The unknown Palestinian Disciple," who compiled the Gospel according to St. Matthew, evidently from the same fear, so freely expressed recently by a portion of the public in our newspapers, could not write it of Him. For he rewrote the passage, completely deleting the ideas of inability of surprise. "He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief." And this later evangelist follows the same procedure throughout his document, either by rewriting or omitting a given section in his source. There is no better attested passage in the Gospels than that in St. Mark x., 17. A man asks Jesus, "Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" And He answers: "Why callest thou me good? None is good, save one, God." What does St. Matthew do with this passage? In his desire to avoid the disclaimer, he rewrites it, so that the question becomes, "Master, what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life?" And the answer is: "Why asketh thou me concerning that which is good? One there is who is good." Now every scholar in the world knows which of these two forms is the original. Every professor in your seminary on Chelsea Square will tell you that it is St. Mark's. Am I to be asked either to withdraw my statement above or else leave the Church I love, because I believe St. Mark's Gospel here and in many another instance, rather than what, in company with even such conservative scholars as Bishop Gore, I know to be a secondary source? There can be no doubt, in the light of modern scholarly research, that in the above particulars St. Matthew's Gospel represents the beginning of that process of dehumanizing our Lord, which reaches its full fruition in the Middle Ages.

With such understanding as I have I am sure that in some sense there was in Jesus an incarnation of Deity: My entire spiritual experience makes clear to me that his revelation of God is absolutely unique; that He is, as I said above, the very portrait of the Father. But how this was accomplished is to me, from the nature of the case, a wholly speculative question, as to which I know nothing. It may have been as with the assistance of Greek philosophy the author of the Fourth Gospel expresses it, by the overshadowing "Word," or "Reason" of God; or it may have been in one of the hundred other ways that later Christians have tried to picture it. But I am also sure, because the historic records of His life tell me plainly, that He was also perfectly human, with apparently the limitations of other human beings. If this be not true, and if while on earth He possessed the power of God, could He—to mention but a single illustration—have prayed to God, as so often He is pictured in the Gospel as doing? Is it not unthinkable that God can pray to God? Would it not be truer to say, with the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, that "He learned obedience by the things which He suffered?"

But in thinking of what is called the Deity of Christ, mere intellectual assent or attempted abstract accuracy seems to me to have little value in comparison with ethical allegiance to His teaching. I cannot forget that according to St. John the devils have a most accurate intellectual belief as to the nature of God; a belief, however, which in His estimation, in no wise adds to their moral growth. Nearer the ideal and teaching of our Lord, it seems to me, as His ideal and teaching are expressed in our earliest sources, is the thought of the Rev. C. F. Russell, Hulsean lecturer in the Anglican Communion, who, following the ethical conception of the incarnation so nobly expressed by Athanasius, says:

"Who is it that believes to-day in the Divinity of Christ? Is it not the man whose whole soul goes out in unreserving acceptance of the supremacy of love? Such a definition would include many who do not assume the name of Christian; many who, because they stumble at the Creeds, would feel, and might even be told, that they had no place at a Christian eucharist; many who within the last few years have fought and died for an ideal, for the love of country, for the love of comrades, and yet have stood resolutely outside the churches. Can we doubt that such men acknowledge the Divinity of Christ in the only way in which He would Himself wish such acknowledgment to be made the test of discipleship? The majesty of love has them in thrall.

"There is a negative side to our conclusion as well. However loudly and clearly a man may recite the creed, he does not really believe this great doctrine of the faith if he does not consciously accept the supremacy of love, whether as revealing the nature of God or as constituting the ideal and principle of true human life. The man who honestly thinks that in the last resort force is mightier than love, whether it be in the affairs of individual men or of nations, does not believe in the Divinity of Christ. The man who deliberately values wealth above opportunity of service, whether for himself or for his friends, does not believe in the Divinity of Christ. In a word, we deny that He is Divine whenever we set anything save love on the throne of the universe or of the individual heart."

I trust, dear Bishop Manning, that I have clearly answered your letter and that you will believe my words to be without conscious equivocation or mental reservation of any kind whatever. What I have written is taught publicly by great numbers of clergymen in the Anglican Communion, including not a few Bishops, and probably the majority of her most illustrious scholars. It would have been a simple matter to multiply quotations from representative Anglican teachers. But perhaps sufficient for our purpose have been cited. If at any time I may have seemed to have expressed myself crudely I sincerely regret it.

In conclusion I would say ex animo with St. Paul that "the Lord (i. e., the Christ of experience) is the Spirit." Might I venture to add the conclusion of his sentence, "Where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty?"

Very faithfully yours,

PERCY STICKNEY GRANT.

P. S.—In accordance with the example set by you, I am giving copies of this letter to the press.

A Private School Bulletin to Parents of Boys

[Note: The following letter is very personal and in a sense private. It was sent to the parents of the boys in one of the best-known New England private schools, but it is so interesting and raises so many questions concerning the welfare of our boys that we have decided to share it with the parents who read The Christian Work. After some persuasion we secured the consent of the head master, and the letter follows.]

The Bulletin of the Brunswick School
Greenwich, Conn.

Friday, December 8, 1922

To the Patrons of Brunswick School:

I AM going to write this Bulletin in the first person and sign it, because I want to talk straight from the shoulder about some very important things.

Throughout this country, schools are complaining of a serious let-down in school work. The influences pulling boys and girls away from the responsibilities of school life are almost innumerable. Day schools and boarding schools suffer alike. Simply blaming the youth will do no good. The spirit of work, for the time being at least, has gone out of modern life, and youth merely reflects what it sees.

Builders, manufacturers, transportation men, house-keepers—all executives with the exception of a few fortunate ones—complain bitterly of the refusal of men to work at all, or of their rewarding eight hours' pay with five hours' work, or of their lack of interest or of their inefficiency. Where the complaint is so general the fault must be proportionate. Small wonder if the spirit extends to the schools.

A quotation from Edmund Burke applies with startling fitness: "The question is not whether the situation deserves praise or blame, but what, in the name of God, shall we do with it?" Every boy is a problem for his own father and mother to struggle over and pray over and work out. The problem cannot be passed along to somebody else for the solution, except in part. That part, however, in the case of every boy who attends Brunswick School, is our responsibility. I want to tell you that in accepting it we fully realize the seriousness of it, and I want you to know what we are doing to meet it.

We have definitely placed first among our responsibilities the development of the character of the boys entrusted to our care. We say this in no trite, school catalogue way. The little things of daily school life are treated with this responsibility first in mind. We realize that we are moulding men. We have provided as teachers men and women of experience, ability and character. They have been selected with great care. The purposes of the school are sound, and the men and women employed to further them are competent, interested and loyal. You may be sure that it is to any one of them a matter for regret and increased endeavor if any boy under his care fails to "make good." A teacher's work is always measured by the results obtained by his pupils. If he is a real teacher he measures himself by that standard.

I can assure you that every teacher in this school puts in hours of patient, loyal effort—in addition to his regular school day—to help your boys to success. When we have done all that we can do, however, the fact still remains that many boys are unsuccessful. An honest investigation shows that in almost every case of failure, the boy simply has not worked enough.

The school day is limited. School time is too valuable to be spent largely in study. We must use it for teaching, for exchange of ideas, for all useful points of contact between boy and teacher. Studying can be done when the boy is alone. The logical place for most of it is the boy's own home. We do not expect or desire that he shall receive help at home. If he is attentive in school he will not need help. In 95% of the cases, the only thing needed is work.

We need your help. We suggest that each boy be assigned a definite room for study—even a definite chair and desk or table. Such things are not of small importance. They are good habit breeders. We suggest further that each boy be required to be at his work at 5:15 P. M. for an hour's study before dinner; and that he attack his work within half an hour of the close of dinner and stay with it until it is well done. We suggest finally that each boy be required to be at home and at work on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings, and on a stated one of the remaining three. The greater part of a boy's study must be done at home or it will not be done at all. There is no time for it in school. Scores of parents who have made an earnest effort to follow the suggestions given above have been rewarded by seeing their sons establish habits of regular, persistent work.

We have given you our suggestions. We shall welcome yours. Let us help each other. If we co-operate heartily and wisely, the boys will be the gainers.

A final thought, in the form of a question. Do you think a boy who persistently neglects his responsibilities, makes no real effort and does not mind failure, should be rewarded with undiminished allowances and privileges?

Yours sincerely,

GEORGE E. CARMICHAEL

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Conducted by Rev. Edmund De S. Brunner, Ph. D.

"If I Were a Country Minister"

By Prof. James E. Boyle of Cornell University

IF I were a country preacher I am sure that my parish would have before very long at least two institutions—a library and a gymnasium. Every human mind and body needs the use, to some extent at least, of these two neglected institutions. I say neglected because two thousand years ago the Greek village always had its gymnasium. But in America the village gymnasium is rare. We are now setting the pace for the world in library building. But, we need both—and need them close at hand, not several miles away in the village or city. I would start a library in the basement of the church or some place convenient for the majority. And the proper way to start a library is on the magazine-club basis. The appetite for good magazines is a good appetite to cultivate. Recently in Nebraska a teacher in a country school of 18 pupils took to school a copy of one of our high grade, illustrated magazines and circulated it among the pupils. The teacher was surprised at the interest shown, and still more to learn that with most of these country children this was the first real magazine they had ever had their hands on or that had ever entered their home. If I couldn't do any better, I would get the country banker to donate subscriptions to the Youths Companion and St. Nicholas, in order that the children could actually see what a clean, wholesome, interesting periodical is like. And I would add to this beginning a few good dignified magazines, in order that a taste for such literature be developed before the readers get a perverted appetite for the jazz literature now on sale at the news stand. And in the same manner a few good books should be added from time to time. Every normal person does like to read a good story once in awhile. I say that a library like that, humble though it be—if it only reaches one or two boys or girls in a year so as to influence their thought and ideas for life, is a magnificent success. Suppose it only reached one boy in a year—and that was your boy—what would you say about it being worth while?

About a year ago I was visiting a Quaker preacher at a country church in Cayuga County, this State, and found that he had already started just such a library as I have been talking about. Perhaps I ought to add that this country preacher was so efficient that his church called him away and put him in general charge of a large number of country churches in a neighboring State.

A gymnasium in each neighborhood, with the indoor athletics and physical training that should go with it should do more to train boys in pure and clean living than all the tracts ever published on that subject. The boy wants to excel in physical prowess; he wants a clean body. A gymnasium is in the place to foster this wholesome desire.

I believe our ideal country preacher should do his part in various forms of outdoor athletics and sports, track meets, field meets, and so on. It is good to get people to play together. It is just as important as having them work together or worship together. While life is dignified, yet the play side must find expression somehow—either in proper or improper ways.

Mention has been made of the library, and how it may open the windows of the soul to the enjoyment of literature. We may now speak of music in the same way. Surely our country preacher will use not only home talent but outside talent in bringing music to his people. He may indeed discover some hidden talent among his own young people, for was not Jenny Lind herself the daughter of humble, obscure school teachers.

If I would ask you to name the three places in the United States most famous for their music, the third place you would name would be a tiny village in Kansas—Lindborg, where a group of Swedish farmers settled in the open prairies. But the Swedish pastor saw the music-problem as the music opportunity of his church, and to-day thousands of people annually make a pilgrimage to this village to attend the music festival.

It is not necessary to elaborate the ways and means of securing the enjoyment of music for the people about the country church. The preacher with imagination will be able to reap a rich reward for all his labors in this field. But it may be emphasized here that it is necessary to interest the young people of the church. They must have "some place to go" and to them it is not very important where that place is—to the movies in the near-by village, or to some "doings" in the church. But I believe the creative instinct is strong enough in most people so that given the chance to go to a poor movie show put on by somebody else, or to a "singing" in which they themselves perform, they will choose that one in which they take part. There is also the added reason that they have some sense of ownership, of proprietorship in it. Shakespeare expresses this philosophy of human life when he makes Touchstone say about Audrey, "an ill-favored thing, Sir, but mine own."

(Continued on page 191)

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

The Problems of Christian Unity*

SOME years ago an endowment was created at Upsala University, Sweden, under the name of The Olaus Petri Foundation. Olaus Petri was one of the saints of the Swedish Church and had been greatly interested in Christian Unity. The Foundation named after him is devoted especially to Christian Unity, although it arranges for lectures on other subjects. In 1921 Dr. Lynch received an invitation from Upsala to deliver the lectures for 1922. Inasmuch as the Bishop of Durham, Dr. Henson, who gave the lectures in 1921 had made a survey of the progress toward unity in Great Britain, it was suggested to Dr. Lynch that he make the subject of his lectures the progress of the movement in America. The lectures were delivered in May 1922 and repeated at Copenhagen University by invitation of the Divinity Faculty and also repeated in Christiania, Norway. These Olaus Petri lectures are always printed in Swedish by the University. James Clarke & Company brought them out in London in June and now they have been published by The Pilgrim Press in America.

As Dr. Lynch says in his preface, the lectures were written for foreign audiences and, therefore, contain some material which nearly all American Christians will find familiar. For this reason, they are also quite direct and intimate in style. This all adds to their value for Americans instead of detracting from it. Sometimes the best summaries of American institutions and movements to put into the hand of an American are those written for foreign audiences. Dr. Lynch first dwells upon the various conditions and convictions that lay back of the unity movement in the American churches—the dissatisfaction that created interest in it. He mentions the following, dwelling upon each at some length: The conviction that the vision and hope of the Founder and Lord of the Church is destroyed by his separated followers; the consciousness that the mission and work of the church was being considerably impaired by our divisions; the wastefulness of denominationalism; the consciousness that no one denomination is big enough to minister the fullness of Christ's message to the world; the feeling that denominationalism produces types of Christian characters who are less than full-bred Christians; the growing habit of working together as individuals and denominations has turned the mind from denominationalism to the Christian community; the consciousness that we are already one in the things that really matter.

After having thus shown the causes of the interest in unity, Dr. Lynch traces, in chapter VI, the growth of this movement as manifested in the co-operative work of the churches, dwelling upon the Evangelical Alliance; The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America; The Inter-Church World Movement; the various councils and conferences of the Mission Boards; the Y. M. C. A., and other young people's movements; The Laymen's Missionary Movement; the Men and Religion Forward Movement, closing with a sketch of the origin and work of The Church Peace Union and The World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches. Anyone who wants a brief, succinct, and lucid sketch of these various movements will find it here.

In the third chapter, the author traces the various approaches toward organic union. Here, after a cursory survey of early beginnings and accomplishments such as where different branches of the same communion have come together, as in the Baptist and Lutheran groups, Dr. Lynch tells at some length the story of the rise and progress of the World Conference on Faith and Order; The American Council on Organic Union, and the widely discussed Concordat, signed by members of the Episcopal and Congregational Churches. Dr. Lynch thinks the Concordat the most hopeful sign because it is an attempt to do something instead of talk; but he does not look for much to come from it because the High Churchmen in the Episcopal Church do not like it, and there are no Congregational ministers who will submit to Episcopalian ordination. Events at Portland show Dr. Lynch's fears to have been justified.

The last chapters of the book are devoted to the obstacles to be overcome. The first obstacle the author mentioned is that those who want unity have perhaps not been able to give it such clear definition that the people have a real vision of what we are after or what unity will be when it comes. The next obstacle one meets is satisfaction with things as they are. There is another group, however, who want things to remain as they are because they really believe the present denominational order is best. Another obstacle is the danger of not winning the support of the people because we present small and inferior motives for unity. "People are to be won," says Dr. Lynch, "to a cause only by presenting great, divine and holy motives." The author also intimates that one obstacle to unity is perhaps the fear on the part of many ecclesiastics and administrative officers of losing their positions. There are

*The Christian Unity Movement in America, by Frederick Lynch, D. D. The Pilgrim Press, Boston.

INTERNATIONAL LESSON

FOR FEBRUARY 18, 1923

Jesus and Zacchaeus

LUKE 19: 1-10

"The Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost."—Luke 19:1-10.

THESE ten verses in Luke furnish all that we know of Zacchaeus. While Matthew and Mark both give the account of the same visit of Jesus to Jericho and the giving of sight to the blind man, Luke alone tells the story of the rich publican. There are traditions which connect him with the history of the early church but they are hardly trustworthy. The curtain falls as suddenly as it rises, giving only this brief glimpse.

But we are glad that we have the story, for it is a graphic picture of making the most of an occasion. There are circumstances here that make Zacchaeus stand out as a shining example, for all time, of the value of grasping the opportunity.

Jesus is coming up from Galilee with a company of pilgrims on his way to the feast of the Passover at Jerusalem. So far as we know, this was the only time that he was ever in Jericho. At least, it was the last opportunity there was for Zacchaeus to see him. Only a few days later he was lifted upon the cross outside the city wall. If Zacchaeus had not taken the trouble to see him at this time he would have missed him forever.

There were circumstances that might have caused Zacchaeus to hesitate to subject himself to the public gaze. He was in an unpopular position and greatly hated by his fellow countrymen. The Roman Government sold the privilege of tax-gathering for a stated price and the purchaser was free to make what he could out of the position. Often the one who bought the privilege would farm it out to subordinates who would pay him part of their gains. Extortion became very common. The position was so hateful to the Jews that they excommunicated from the Hebrew synagogue anyone who thus allied himself with the Roman Government. The publicans were usually drawn from the lower ranks of society and were classed with harlots and sinners in general.

Zacchaeus was not only a publican, but he was the chief of the publicans of this district. He was the one who had secured the position from Rome and had a small army of subordinates who were turning over to him part of their ill-gotten gains.

The Jericho post was one of the most important and rewarding of the revenue system of Palestine. The city was the center of a rich area of the country. Balm abounded in this section, from which balm was shipped far and wide. It was also a port of entry. Traders from the East crossed from Perea at this point and here the highway from Egypt entered Palestine. The man who held this lucrative position would be rich and would be correspondingly hated. For one thus unpopular in the community to submit himself to the public gaze required courage.

But Zacchaeus was dead in earnest. It was surely more than curiosity, it must have been real heart-hunger. Probably he knew Jesus' friendly feeling toward members of his calling and how he had been severely censured on several occasions for eating with publicans. Perhaps he knew that one of Jesus' chosen disciples was a publican. He was willing to make the venture in order that he might see the wonder-worker who had been moving the whole countryside and had come into conflict with the rulers of the Jews.

Jesus never let an opportunity pass to bring his message home to a receptive soul. Whether it was an influential member of the Sanhedrin who had come to him by night, or an outcast woman, a member of an alien race, or a rich publican who had climbed into a tree to get a sight of Him as He passed by, Jesus always took advantage of the opportunity to win a disciple.

Zacchaeus not only saw Jesus, but what was more important for him and us, Jesus saw him. Perhaps the Master's attention was attracted to him by some of the crowd. Perhaps he knew his name because he heard it spoken by those who hated him as they pointed up at the despised tax-gatherer and hissed "Zacchaeus the publican." He was abundantly rewarded for his zeal in seizing the opportunity, as in glad surprise he came down from the tree to take Jesus home as his guest. No matter if the Jews were offended that Jesus had gone to lodge in the home of a sinner. No matter if they did consider any one who was a part of the Roman domination an unworthy companion for him who was to be Israel's king. Zacchaeus had made the effort to see Jesus and now Jesus was to spend the night in his home. He had grasped the fleeting opportunity and was happy in the result.

Much of the ministry of Jesus is left in barest outline. Only in exceptional cases is the detail filled in. For the most part it is just a charcoal sketch. How glad we would be if we could draw the curtain aside and see the companionship of those hours in that home of wealth! How eagerly would we listen if we might catch snatches of the conversation that passed between the rich host and his great guest! We can gain some insight into what took place by the change that was wrought in the life of Zacchaeus. Jesus did for him what he had done for many another one like him: he gave him a new vision of life and awakened in his soul hopes and aspirations that had scarcely dared spring to life.

The new purpose of his life is revealed in his declaration of restitution. Here is one of the most severe tests of true repentance: Is the course of one's life changed in those ways that affect his wealth? We see this new disciple standing out before the curious crowd the next morning, just as Jesus was leaving his home to resume his journey, and saying, "The half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have wrongfully exacted aught of any man, I restore fourfold." This was more than the Jewish law required. The Mosaic law demanded that a thief who was caught and convicted should restore fourfold; but if a man made voluntary confession of his wrong, he had only to add one-fifth to the value of what he had wrongfully taken—as we would say in modern terms, he must return the principal and twenty per cent interest. For this new convert to subject himself to the extreme penalty would reveal the sincerity of his repentance and would restore him to the rightful use of his name, Zacchaeus, "the just," which had been forfeited by his unjust conduct.

We are forcibly reminded, by contrast, of that other rich young man who came to Jesus just a few days before this, seeking the way of life, and who, because he could not stand the test made upon his wealth, went away sorrowful.

That Zacchaeus had made the most of the opportunity may be inferred from the words of the Master, "Today is salvation come to this house, forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham." His salvation is not conditioned on his declaration of restitution. The new course of his life is an evidence of a change of heart. His salvation is conditioned upon an inward change which is equivalent to spiritual sonship with Abraham. He was, of course, a literal son of Abraham, as the name would indicate. But on other occasions the claim of inheritance from Abraham had been thrown aside by the Master when the spirit of Abraham was not manifest. On more than one occasion, when the Jews had boasted that they had Abraham for their father, Jesus retorted, "If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham." Paul puts it very plainly when he says, "Know ye that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham." "For he is not a Jew which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh: but he is a Jew, who is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart." Zacchaeus had entered into the inheritance of Abraham because with a commendable courage he had made a venture which had resulted in a new purpose of life.

The closing word of Jesus in this incident is that oft repeated statement that "The Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost." This is the heart of the gospel. He often said it. It shines forth in his life as he went to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. It is reiterated in his parables. The shepherd cares more for the one lost sheep than for the ninety and nine that were safe in the fold, as he wraps his cloak about him and goes out into the night and the storm to find the lost; there was pathos in the poor woman's agitation over the one lost coin; the father's heart went out in yearning love for the boy who had gone away from home. There was exceeding great joy when the lost was found. "Likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentance." "For I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." There is no life so outcast from society that it is beyond reach. There is no case so helpless that it cannot be saved. Jesus' joy was in seeking and saving the most unlikely. He went out into the byways and hedges and compelled them to come in.

Zacchaeus will forever be a challenge and an inspiration to us to meet each opportunity that is presented to us in such a way as will bring the greatest satisfaction to ourselves and yield the largest results for the kingdom of God. Shakespeare has sung:

"There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
Omitted, all the voyage of their life
Is bound in shallows and in miseries."

Lowell, in a better known stanza, voices the same truth:

"Once to every man and nation
Comes the moment to decide,
In the strife of Truth with Falsehood,
For the good or evil side;

* * * *

And the choice goes by forever
'Twixt that darkness and that light."

There are times when Jesus is passing by; when he is consciously very near to us; when a little effort on our part will bring him as a guest in our hearts and homes with his transforming grace. May this simple story of Zacchaeus give us inspiration to open the doors of our lives to every opportunity of divine grace.

REV. H. GRANT PERSON, D.D.,
Minister of the Eliot Congregational Church, Newton, Mass.

One Book a Week

Continued from page 186

also great vested interests at stake. These are the lesser obstacles Dr. Lynch thinks and then he goes on to mention the more serious ones.

First of all there are traditions. Every communion has its traditions, just as every nation has, and they are hard to give up. There is a kind of denominational patriotism. Another real problem would be the satisfying of the utterly divergent temperaments which we have in our population in

THE PILGRIM PRESS ANNOUNCES:

WHEN YOU ENLIST Margaret Slattery

Pastors who are planning for communion of church membership classes should not fail to have at hand this marvelously succinct, inspirational and non-sectarian history of the Christian Church. It is intended primarily for young people, especially those who are looking forward to church membership. Would be an ideal gift to any young person on the occasion of his joining the church. Castilian paper. Price, 75 cents. Postage, 5 cents.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE COUNTRY COMMUNITY (Revised Edition)

Warren H. Wilson

Long considered a standard on the relation of the church to the rural community, this book has been thoroughly revised and gives the author's matured and ripened conclusions.

Price, $2.25. Postage 10 cents.

THE STORY OF JOHN FREDERICK OBERLIN (New Edition)

Augustus Field Beard

This great classic of Christian biography is also one of the most valuable and suggestive books on rural church work. "It contains inspiration to good citizenship, to truer living, to better teaching, to more devoted ministry."—The Presbyterian.

Price, Cloth, $1.25; Paper, 75 cents. Postage, 10 cents.

OUR AMBIGUOUS LIFE

Rev. John A. Hutton, D.D.

Alike into the stories of the early chapters of Genesis, and into great sayings of Christ, Dr. Hutton reads new and illuminating meanings. To him the Christian life is always a great and inspiring adventure.

Price, $2.25. Postage, 10 cents.

ORACLES OF GOD Studies in the Minor

Prophets Rev. W. E. Orchard, D.D.

Pastor of King's Weigh House Church, London

Dr. Orchard's fame as a preacher is world-wide. In this book we find him a clear and vivid expositor. He sets in relief the personalities of the Hebrew prophets, and shows what light they throw on modern social problems.

Price, $2.25. Postage, 10 cents.

THE USE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT In the Light of Modern Knowledge

Prof. John E. McFadyen, D.D.

Professor McFadyen restores the Old Testament to those who have neglected or lost it, and reassures those who are disconcerted by criticism, or who have not acquainted themselves with its processes and results.

Price, $2.25. Postage, 10 cents.

ALTARS OF EARTH Studies in Old Testament

Humanism Rev. Hubert L. Simpson, M.A.

Author of "The Intention of His Soul"

"These studies, which deal with the first eleven chapters of Genesis and with the book of Ecclesiastes, are new as the morning and bright as the day. It is difficult to speak too highly of them."—Demo-critus, in the Methodist Times, London.

Price, $2.25. Postage, 10 cents.

THE PILGRIM PRESS

14 Beacon St. 19 W. Jackson St.
BOSTON, MASS. CHICAGO, ILL.

At Your Service

FOR ALL CHURCH-GOERS A LENTEN RESOLUTION

"I Will Read a Chapter a Day from a Book with a Strong Religious Appeal."

The World's Great Religious Poetry.

Compiled by Caroline Miles Hill
Cloth 12 mo. 876 pages

Religion "finds" great numbers of people best when it comes to them in the form of poetry. They will like to own a copy of this splendid collection and keep it handy for daily use. $5.00

Extend and intensify the dominion of immortality over your consciousness by Lenten half hours of communion with

Matter and Spirit.

By Prof. James B. Pratt.

Author of "The Religious Consciousness"

"I wish that it could be put into the hands of all ministers and laymen who have been disturbed by the modern psychological endeavor to dispose of the human soul. It is most enheartening to every one seeking rational foundations for a religious faith."—Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick. $1.50

For a Lenten course in the Central Problems of your religion, obtain

Religious Foundations.

Edited by Rufus M. Jones

How shall we think of God; of Man; of Nature; of Human Relationships; of the Bible; of the Kingdom of God; of Evil; of Progress; of the Life Beyond?

Authors: Francis G. Peabody, Willard L. Sperry, Eugene Lyman, Rufus M. Jones, Elihu Grant, L. P. Jacks (Hibbert), Seebohm Rowntree, Clutton-Brock. $1.00

If your Lenten choice is a course in how to use the Bible, select

He Opened to us the Scriptures.

By Professor Benj. W. Bacon

Yale Divinity School, Author of "Jesus and Paul"

The contrast between Jesus' use of the Scriptures gives not a rule but a principle. It describes not a method but a spirit. $1.00

If you want to see more in religion but your practical bent of mind blocks the way, plan some Lenten conferences with

Common Sense Religion.

By Rev. Frank E. Willson

$1.50

If you are interested in psychology, make your Lenten choice

An Introduction to the Psychology of Religion.

By Robert H. Thouless

Lecturer in Psychology at the University of Manchester

Prepared as an elementary course for those without any great knowledge of psychology who wish to understand better the psychological problems of religion. $2.50

Or, your Lenten thoughts may well be guided by

The Return of Christendom.

By Various Writers

With Introduction by Bishop Gore and Bishop Brent

Here are men who dare hope that the Church may again become a world brotherhood as in its early days with the war between Capital and Labor ended for good. $1.75

Your mind will have to come back but let it strengthen its courage by feasts of

The History of Utopian Thought.

By Prof. Joyce O. Hertzer (Wisconsin)

The plans for a better world of the prophets, Jesus, St. Augustine, Savonarola, Plato, More, Owen, Fourier, etc., from the point of view of sociology. $2.25

If you are interested to discover an applied psychology of the emotions which will seize their undeniably great energy and capitalize it for human good instead of harm, read

Anger: Its Religious and Moral Significance.

By Prof. G. M. Stratton (University of California)

$1.75

It may be you will want to freshen up during Lent on Ethics in its good gray homespun.

Freedom and Christian Conduct.

By John A. W. Haas

President of Muhlenberg College

$2.00

Items for Your Next Order.

Machen: The Origin of Paul's Religion. $1.75
Barton: Jesus of Nazareth. 2.00
Influence of the Church on Modern Problems. 1.50
Brown: The Art of Preaching. 1.75
Middleton: Unity and Rome. 1.75
Merrill: The Freedom of the Preacher. 1.25

64-66 Fifth Avenue

The Macmillan Company

New York City

any one form of church service. Another obstacle will be the comprehending in the same church of those who believe in creeds and those who do not.

The greatest obstacles of all Dr. Lynch says, are those real and deep-rooted convictions which it would seem impossible to ever uproot. There is going to be another difficulty also when we come to the actual establishing of the united church in the fact that in the non-Episcopal denominations there are great numbers who do not believe in central authority of any kind, whether of bishops, presbyteries, communions, assemblies or coun-

EUROPE — ORIENT AROUND THE WORLD

Popular Tours at Popular Prices. Comprehensive itineraries, experienced leaders, splendid accommodations, frequent sailings.

Send for Booklets

Bennett's Travel Bureau

500 Fifth Avenue
New York City

681 Market Street
San Francisco, Cal.

Pulpit Gowns and Choir Vestment

Custom Tailoring
FOR CLERGYMEN

Pulpit Hangings and Bookmarkers

Cox Sons & Mining

131-133 East 23rd. New York City

MENEELY BELL CO.

TROY, N.Y. AND
220 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.

BELLS

The Shepherd-Prince

Translated from the work of the famous Hebrew author Abraham Mapu by B. A. M. Schapiro Introduction by Prof. Robert Dick Wilson, Ph.D., D.D., LL.D.

Bringing the first fruits and the sacrifices to the Temple
A Specimen of one of the 29 tail pieces

BIBLE lovers should read this historical romance of the times of the prophet Isaiah. It will make the reader, through its thrilling pages, live in the time and conditions that surround the Bible Stories

Robert Dick Wilson, Ph.D., D.D., LL.D.,
Professor of Semitic Languages, Princeton, N. J.:

"Within the limits of a Foreword it is impossible adequately to do justice to the scholarship and intrinsic worth of such a work as this; but, without flattery, it can safely be asserted that Mr. Schapiro has presented in a singularly fascinating way, in its English dress, the greatest novel that has ever been produced in the Hebrew language. To say more would be like painting the lily or refining pure gold."

Edgar Whitaker Work, D.D.,
Pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church,
New York City:

"A mind jaded with the reading of 'Main Street,' 'Brass,' 'The Sheikh' and such like novels of our time may well turn to Mapu's novel for a renewal of faith in God and in life. It is strong in plot. We seem to hear the very tones of the Prophet Isaiah, and to feel the presence of the Assyrian host at the gates of Jerusalem."

The Living Church:

A strong romance in which the Old Testament life becomes real and the scenes and beliefs of the Hebrews of the days of Isaiah live again. A remarkable work.

The Sunday School Times:

With monumental scholarship, Mr. Schapiro has mastered the spirit of one of the greatest uninspired books of its kind ever written in Hebrew, translated it from the native tongue of its characters in English, without losing the tempo or grip of the original author, and thrown open a window of clear vision into the days of ancient Israel.

The thread of a great love binds together a description of events which will illumine the age of Isaiah as "Ben Hur" did the days of Christ. This book is not a "religious novel," merely. It is more than that—it is a masterpiece.

William T. Manning, D.D.,

Bishop of the Diocese of New York:

"In translating this work, Mr. Schapiro has rendered a service to literature, to religion, and especially to those who, being Christians, hold with the great Apostle that 'there is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bondman nor freeman, there is no male and female; for ye are all one—one man—in Christ Jesus.'"

Ernest M. Stiles, D.D.,

Rector of St. Thomas' Church, New York City:

"It is no small accomplishment that this novel, the work of the brilliant Mapu, who introduced the novel into Hebrew Literature, has been translated with such rare felicity that it retains the spirit of the 'Old Testament,' of the Temple, and even reveals some of the most moving passages of the 'Old Testament Scriptures.' It is evident that you have fully preserved the poetic imagination and the majestic strength of the original."

Every Bible Teacher, Student, Lover, should own this book

De Luxe Edition Beautifully bound, and containing 400 pages besides the 29 tail pieces 12 full page pen and ink illustrations. Postpaid, $5.25 Popular Edition, cloth bound. Postpaid, $2.50

Address B. A. M. SCHAPIRO

Dept. C. W. 83 Bible House, Astor Place NEW YORK CITY

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY

Its work is interdenominational evangelical and international in scope and is commended by all the churches. It has published the Gospel message in 178 languages dialects and characters. Its colporters meet the immigrants with Christian literature in many languages, and also visit the spiritually destitute. In the Spanish and Portuguese languages, chiefly for Latin America, there have been issued 16,012,088 copies of volumes, tracts and periodicals. Its literature in the native dialects has been the strong right arm of foreign missions. Its benevolent work is dependent upon donations and legacies.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS HALL, President.
REV. EDWIN NOAH HARDY, Ph.D.,
Gen. Sec.

Donations may be sent direct to American Tract Society, 101 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

COLLECTION ENVELOPES—8c per pack of 52, in Cartons (Also Storehouse Tithers' Envelopes) write Duford Trifold Company, Asbury Park, N. J.

THE AMERICAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY

76 Wall Street, New York
(Incorporated April, 1833)

The only American undenominational, international and national Society aiding seamen. Maintains a Sailors' Home and Institute at 507 West Street, New York City. Places loan libraries ($25) on vessels sailing from New York.

Publishes the Sailors' Magazine, $1.00. Supported by contributions and legacies. JOHN B. CALVERT, D.D., President.
GEORGE SIDNEY WEBSTER, D.D., Sec'y.
Send contributions to CLARENCE C. PINNEO, Treasurer, 76 Wall Street, New York.

THE TRAINING SCHOOL FOR CHRISTIAN WORKERS

(Interdenominational)

Prepares Young Women for Christian Leadership

The course of study includes: Bible Study, Church History, Christian Missions, Psychology and Pedagogy, Organization and Administration of Religious Education, The Art of Story Telling, Hygiene and Health, Practical Experience in Church and Mission Work.

Eight Months Course — October to June

Under the auspices of the Woman's Branch
NEW YORK CITY MISSION SOCIETY
Mrs. A. F. Schaffler, First Directress

For further information, address:

Miss Charlotte A. Porter, Dean
7 Gramercy Park, West New York City

FOR THE LENTEN SEASON

Devotional Literature for Spiritual Nurture

For All the People:

"The Fellowship of Prayer for 1923." 3c. each; $2.00 per 100 postpaid. Selected Bible Readings, Meditation and Prayer for each day of the Lenten Season.

For Pastors Only:

"Suggestions for Lenten Sermons." By Pres. Ozora S. Davis, D. D. (Free on Request.)

The Commission on Evangelism and Devotional Life
Room 518, 287 Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y.

UNIVERSITY BIBLE COURSES at home. Use spare time. Enroll now. Finest books. Best courses. Hundreds studying. Lose no time from your regular work. Catalogue free. Write Prof. C. J. Burton, Bible University Eugene, Ore.

Says President

W. H. P. Faunce

of Brown University

"I read every paragraph in the Christian Century every week with constantly growing satisfaction. Here is a journal that puts first things first and leaves the petty things far out on the circumference."

EDITORIAL STAFF

Charles Clayton Morrison
Herbert L. Willett Orvis F. Jordan
Joseph Fort Newton John R. Ewers
Lynn Harold Hough Edward Shillito
Alva W. Taylor Thomas C. Clark

The Christian Century is distinguished by its candid discussion of living issues in the light of the mind of Christ

Mail Coupon to-day. Foreign postage extra

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Dear Sirs: Please enter my name (a new subscriber) for a year's subscription to The Christian Century at your regular rate of $4.00 (ministers $3.00). I will remit upon receipt of bill and you will please send me without extra charge a copy of ☐ "The Reconstruction of Religion," by Ellwood, or ☐ "The Crisis of the Churches," by Leighton Parks, or ☐ "The Mind in the Making," by Robinson, or ☐ "What Christianity Means to Me," by Lyman Abbott.

Name .....

Address .....

C. W.

When answering advertisements please mention the Christian Work

One Book a Week

(Continued)

s. Another, perhaps next to the greatest obstacle is the question of orders. "But," says Dr. Lynch, when all else is done, we come to the final great obstacle to the reunion of Christendom which is the bridge that separates the evangelical and the sacramental groups within the church." Dr. Lynch dwells upon this most and greatest obstacle to be overcome at some length. We wonder if perhaps he does not make too much of that obstacle and whether it may not be possible to find some modus operandi by which the two groups, the evangelical and the sacramental, can find some common meeting ground without either group sacrificing any of its real convictions and aiding faiths.

Country Church Department

(Continued from page 185)

These are no substitutes for real church work. They do lead people into the church, if the preacher so uses them. They help sweeten the life of the rural community, and make people forget their petty bickerings and ugly little personalities of the neighborhood. But the people need a spiritual message more than they need any of these other things. These things do prepare the way for the spiritual message. They prepare the soil for the seed. And if the preacher is big enough for his job, he will sow the good seed and it will not fall by the wayside, or on stony ground, or amongst thistles. And the harvest will come in due season.

Note—Here speaks an earnest layman. This article is taken by permission from a paper read by the author at a recent rural conference.

Lorenz's Easter Music

Easter Services (New 1923)

"Easter Bells" by Ira B. Wilson.

"Joyful Eastertide," for graded Sunday Schools.

8 cents per copy, $6.00 per hundred, postpaid.

Samples sent free upon request.

Easter Sunday School Cantatas

"The Glory of the Cross," by Lorenz.

"The Lighted Cross," by Ira B. Wilson.

"Easter" by Ira B. Wilson.

20 cents per copy, net in any quantity. Send 20 cents for sample each of the three.

Easter Recitations and Exercises

"Easter Treasury No. 28" (New 1923)

25 cents per copy, postpaid.

Easter Choir Cantatas (New 1923)

"Joy after Sorrow," Wilson. 60 cents.

"The Resurrection Story," Adams. 60 cents.

Sent on approval upon request.

Easter Anthems

Our ten most popular out of over 300 we publish sent on approval upon request.

Easter Solos and Duets

Our ten most popular out of 100 we publish sent on approval if you advance 10 cents for postage and packing. If you state voice desired, we will so limit selection.

Send for free catalog

Sample and approval offers good only if the "Christian Work" is mentioned.

Lorenz Publishing Co.

216 W. 5th St., Dayton, Ohio

1711 Grand Central Terminal, New York

218 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago

THE MONDAY CLUB SERMONS

FOR 1923

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons, by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of The Christian Work says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the executions."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in the Christian Work, beginning with the January 27th issue. But many Sunday school teachers, pastors and superintendents will wish to own the whole series, so as to have it at all times conveniently at hand. Get a copy today, from your regular book store, or from

The Pilgrim Press

14 Beacon St., Boston
19 W. Jackson St., Chicago
156 Fifth Ave., New York

The Woodlawn Cemetery

Is readily accessible by Harlem trains from Grand Central Station and by subway. Small lots at reasonable prices. Write or telephone (4855 Gramercy Park) for Book of Views or representative. Office 20 E. 23d st., New York City

Tusculum

A thorough Christian-character-building College. Established 1794. Address

President O. O. GRAY, D. D., Greenville, Tenn.

ADVERTISING must pay the advertiser or else he cannot pay for space. Many readers of The Christian Work now answer advertisements seen in our paper and do not mention that fact. As a loyal subscriber to The Christian Work we are counting on you to help us by saying, "I saw your advertisement in The Christian Work," every time you answer one of our advertisements.

Caesar or the Christ—A Parable

Viewing the welter of mangling and of slaughter wrought by battle, stood two figures—the one, a Pagan; the other, a Christian. The Pagan, not of the ancient time to which he might justly have belonged, but of the modern day in which he has no rightful place; the Christian, not a devotee of the lay figure to which the Christ is so often degraded, but a lover of Him who was the greatest of the Prophets of the Spirit. Aghast at the horror, the Pagan cried, "I did not will it so! It was necessary for the defence and the expansion of the Empire!" The Christian, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died!"

A. W. LITTLEFIELD.

The Foreign Policy of the Churches

EDITOR, THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

Permit me to thank you for your sterling editorial, entitled "The Foreign Policy of the Churches," in your issue of November 25th. I wish that every member of the Christian churches in America could have the privilege of reading, marking and inwardly digesting it. It could not fail to make for wider sympathy and mutual respect on the part of all the churches. To me it seems filled with the very spirit of Christ.

JOHN D. WING,

Rector Christ Church,
Savannah, Ga.

EASTER FREE

A postal from Supt., Pastor or Committee will bring a set of sample services. FREE.

* EASTER HELPER, NO. 9, 20c
Book of Songs, Recitations, Drills, etc.

FLAVIA, or THE MARTYRS, 25c.
A Song Story of early Christian Era. This and others sent for examination on request.

* PAGEANTRY

Two Easter Pageants and a Play—25c.

* These are not sent for examination.

SPECIAL—30c.

3 Services, regular edition, value . . . . . 21c

Pageant . . . . . 25c

Helper No. 9 . . . . . 20c

All for 30c in stamps. 66c

HALL-MACK CO., } 21st & Arch Street
ADAM GEISEL MUSIC CO. } Philadelphia, Pa.

Do You Believe in The Christian Work?

In what it is trying to accomplish? If you do then you will want to help. One good way is to patronize our advertisers, and always say, "I saw your advertisement in The Christian Work."

IRRESISTIBLE

Join Our Delightful "Christian Work" Party

ON THE GREAT WHITE STAR LINE "S. S. BALTIC" SUMMER CRUISE TO THE HOLY LAND, EGYPT, TURKEY, GREECE, SPAIN ITALY, ETC.

61 Days, $600 and up, Starting June 27, 1923

A SURPASSING SUMMER VACATION OPPORTUNITY

For Ministers, College Professors, Teachers and Business Men

IDEAL SUMMER WEATHER ON SHIP BOARD

With the Average Temperature on Shore lower than Boston, New York or St. Louis, Nights Cool. Practically no Humidity

Clark's 20th Cruise
to the Orient

STOP-OVERS IN EUROPE

Return tickets first class
good on Adriatic, Baltic,
Cedric, Celtic, etc.

Until
January 1, 1924

S. S. BALTIC

A FASCINATING ITINERARY

Madeira, Cadiz, Seville (Cordova, Granada and the Alhambra), Gibraltar, Algiers, Athens (Corinth, Eleusis), Haifa, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Bethany (Nazareth, Sea of Galilee, Samaria, etc.), Alexandria, Cairo Naples, Pompeii, Aome (Capri, Sorrento, Amalfi), Monte Carlo, Cherbourg (Paris and the Battlefields, London, etc.), Liverpool to New York.

D. E. Lorenz, Ph.D., Author of "The Mediterranean Traveler" and Managing Director of Clark's Orient Cruise of 1922, and "Round the World" Cruise of 1923, is organizing a party of Christian Work readers. Why not take advantage of this remarkable opportunity and spend your vacation months visiting the most fascinating countries in the world? No travel worries—just rest and enjoyment. Rates include regular shore trips, landings, drives, guides, hotels, railroad fees, etc.—everything first class.

WE INVITE OUR READERS TO JOIN OUR PARTY

ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET (70 pages) AND SHIP DIAGRAM SENT FREE POSTPAID.

Note.—A few vacant rooms are available on our Mediterranean Cruise, Feb. 3, 1923, and on our Round the World Cruise, Jan. 22, 1923.

Address: Cruise Department, CHRISTIAN WORK

70 Fifth Ave., New York City

When answering advertisements please mention the Christian Work

Luxurious White Star
Transatlantic Liner

S. S. BALTIC

23,876 tons register.
Three great promenade
decks — Sumptuous
Public Rooms, 24 Suites
with Private Bath.

The Climax of
Luxurious
Travel

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

A Religious Weekly Review

FEBRUARY 17, 1923

Which Will Cost the Most?

Frederick Lynch, D.D.

Unseen and Intangible Realities

Professor Rufus M. Jones

Heresy Trials

Observer's Letter

Is There Hope in the Factory?

Professor H. A. Overstreet

Christianity in the Factory

S. R. Rectanus

Community Chests and Merger Campaigns

Ward W. Adair and W. R. Hopkins

Three Dollars a Year

Ten Cents a Copy

Lorenz's Easter Music

EASTER SERVICES (New 1923)
"Easter Bells," by Ira B. Wilson
"Joyful Eastertide," for graded Sunday Schools
8 cents per copy, $6 per hundred, postpaid.
Samples sent free upon request.

EASTER SUNDAY SCHOOL CANTATAS
"The Glory of the Cross," by Lorenz.
"The Lighted Cross," by Ira B. Wilson.
"Easter," by Ira B. Wilson.
20 cents per copy, net in any quantity.
Send 20 cents for sample each of the three.

EASTER RECITATIONS AND EXERCISES
"Easter Treasury No. 28" (New 1923)
25 cents per copy, postpaid.

EASTER CHOIR CANTATAS (New 1923)
"Joy After Sorrow," Wilson. 60 cents.
"The Resurrection Story," Adams. 60 cents.
Sent on approval upon request.

Easter Anthems
Our ten most popular out of over 300 we publish sent on approval upon request.

Easter Solos and Duets
Our ten most popular out of 100 we publish sent on approval if you advance 10 cents for postage and packing. If you state voice desired, we will so limit selection.

Send for free catalog.
Sample and approval offers good only if The Christian Work is mentioned.

Lorenz Publishing Co.
216 W. 5th St., Dayton, Ohio
1711 Grand Central Terminal, New York.
218 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY

Its work is interdenominational evangelical and international in scope and is commended by all the churches. It has published the Gospel message in 178 languages dialects and characters. Its colporters meet the immigrants with Christian literature in many languages, and also visit the spiritually destitute. In the Spanish and Portuguese languages, chiefly for Latin America, there have been issued 16,012,088 copies of volumes, tracts and periodicals. Its literature in the native dialects has been the strong right arm of foreign missions. Its benevolent work is dependent upon donations and legacies.

REV. EDWIN NOAH HARDY, Ph.D., Gen. Sec.
WILLIAM PHILLIPS HALL, President.
Donations may be sent direct to American Tract Society, 101 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Says Bishop Francis J. McConnell

of the Methodist Church

"I regard The Christian Century as the greatest journalistic force working for social and international righteousness coming from any press of the Christian Church."

EDITORIAL STAFF

Charles Clayton Morrison	Orvis F. Jordan
Herbert L. Willett	Joseph Fort Newton
Lynn Harold Hough	John R. Ewers
Alva W. Taylor	Edward Shillito
	Thomas C. Clark

The Christian Century is distinguished by its candid discussion of living issues in the light of the mind of Christ.

Mail Coupon to-day. Foreign postage extra.

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Dear Sirs: Please enter my name (a new subscriber) for a year's subscription to The Christian Century at your regular rate of $4.00 (ministers $3.00). I will remit upon receipt of bill and you will please send me without extra charge a copy of [ ] "The Reconstruction of Religion," by Ellwood, or [ ] "The Crisis of the Churches," by Leighon Parks, or [ ] "The Mind in the Making," by Robinson, or [ ] "What Christianity Means to Me," by Lyman Abbott.

Name _____
Address _____
C.W.

BISHOP MANNING'S SECOND LETTER TO DR. GRANT

In order to make our record of the Grant case complete we print herewith Bishop Manning's second letter to him. We comment on this letter on page 197.

February 1, 1923.

The Rev. Percy S. Grant, D.D., Rector
Church of the Ascension, New York City.

My Dear Dr. Grant: I have received your letter of January 25, and have read it with great care. In my former letter I called your attention to the fact that in your recent sermons you gave the impression to the church, and to the public generally, that you denied the miraculous elements of the Gospel, and that you no longer believed in the power and Godhead of our Lord Jesus Christ.

In view of the wide concern and scandal to the church, caused by your utterances, I called upon you to correct in clear and unmistakable language the impression of your unbelief which you had given, reminding you at the same time that if you could not conscientiously declare your belief in the Christian faith as contained in the Apostles' Creed, as to which my conference with you had not reassured me, your only honorable course would be to withdraw from the ministry of this church, whose commission you hold as one of her authorized official teachers.

Your letter in reply is a modification of your former utterances, but I am sorry to say that it does not remove the doubt which you yourself created as to your belief in Jesus Christ as God and Saviour. Your letter is written in terms which are vague and of doubtful meaning, and not in terms which are clear and direct.

I note what you write as to the miracles of the New Testament, and also your claim that you have the right to interpret the articles of the Creed in a sense which in reality denies the facts which the words declare. There is much that I should like to say upon these points. Important as they are, however, these points do not constitute the main issue.

The real issue which you have raised by your own utterances is whether you believe that Jesus Christ is Lord and God, for if you do not so believe, it is plain that you cannot with self-respect or with freedom to express your real convictions continue to hold your place as a minister of a Church whose whole life and teaching is founded on this belief.

It is this faith in the Lord Jesus Christ which you refrain from clearly expressing in your letter. You rather confirm the impression that you do not so believe, but you do not say so plainly and definitely. The terms in which you express your faith in Christ are all of them terms which may be used, and are in fact used, by teachers who definitely deny His deity. There is no statement in your letter which indicates any belief on your part in Jesus Christ, the Eternal Son of God, the Second Person of the Holy Trinity.

Your assertion that there are others in the Church who believe as you do is not to the point. Some of those whom you quote are far from doing so. Your attempt to claim Bishop Gore and Dr. Swete as supporting your position is surprising indeed to those who know their writings. Both of these great scholars stand unqualifiedly for belief in the Deity of Christ, and if you have read Dean Inge's "Confessio Fidei" in his latest published volume of "Outspoken Essays," you must know that he repudiates the idea that Christianity can exist without this belief. In this essay (pages 51-53) Dean Inge declares emphatically his faith in Jesus Christ as "the Incarate Word or Logos of God," and says: "If I felt that I had lost it (I should not think it honest to call myself any longer a Christian, or to remain in the Christian ministry."

The suggestion that young men of intellect and vigor will be repelled from the ministry if they are required to believe the Faith of the Church is irrelevant. No one can, with honesty, enter the ministry of this Church unless he believes in Jesus Christ as God. Full belief in the Gospel of Christ does not repel young men if they are Christians. What may well repel young men of high character and sound mind is any doubt as to the sincerity with which the ministers of the Church believe and teach the gospel

(Continued on page 223.)

The Training School for Christian Workers

(Interdenominational)

Under the auspices of the Woman's Branch
NEW YORK CITY MISSION SOCIETY
Mrs. A. F. Schauffler, First Directress

Prepares Young Women for Christian Leadership

The course of study includes: Bible Study, Church History, Christian Missions, Psychology and Pedagogy, Organization and Administration of Religious Education, The Art of Story Telling, Hygiene and Health, Practical Experience in Church and Mission Work.

Eight Months Course—October to June

For further information, address:

MISS CHARLOTTE A. PORTER, Dean
7 Gramercy Park, West New York City

THE AMERICAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY

76 Wall Street, New York
(Incorporated April, 1833)

The only American undenominational, international and national Society aiding seamen.

Maintains a Sailors' Home and Institute at 507 West Street, New York City.

Places loan libraries ($25) on vessels sailing from New York.

Publishes the "Sailors' Magazine," $1.00. Supported by contributions and legacies.

JOHN B. CALVERT, D.D., President.
GEORGE SIDNEY WEBSTER, D.D., Sec'y.
Send contributions to CLARENCE C. PINNEO, Treasurer, 76 Wall Street, New York.

The Woodlawn Cemetery

Is readily accessible by Harlem trains from Grand Central Station and by subway. Small lots at reasonable prices. Write or telephone (4855 Gramercy Park) for Book of Views or representative. Office 20 E. 23d Street, New York City.

McSHANE BELL FOUNDRY CO. BALTIMORE MARYLAND

Church, Chime and Peel BELLS

Memorials a Specialty

Tusculum

A thorough Christian-character-building College. Established 1794. Address

President O. O. GRAY, D.D., Greenville, Tenn.

CALLING ATTENTION TO fine country residence in Norwalk, six rooms, new, improvements, good road, chicken houses, garage, 1½ acres. $6,500, cash $2,500. Owner going South. The Lawrence Agency, S. Norwalk, Conn.

UNIVERSITY BIBLE EDUCATION at home. Prepare for fall and winter study. Finest books. Best courses. Hundreds studying. Catalogue free. Lose no time from your regular work. Write Prof. C. J. Burton, Bible University, Eugene, Ore.

COLLECTION ENVELOPES—8c per pack of 52, in Cartons (Also Storehouse Tithers Envelopes) write Duford Trifold Company, Asbury Park, N.J.

TEACHERS WANTED—Schools and Colleges now engaging September teachers. We have great demand to supply all departments of Schools and Colleges at attractive salaries. Write to-day for information. The Westminster Teachers' Bureau, Henry H. Sweets, Manager, 410 Urban Building, Louisville, Ky.

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

CONTINUING

THE EVANGELIST AND NEW YORK OBSERVER

Vol. 114.—No 7.

New York, February 17, 1923.

Whole No. 3010.

CONTENTS

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY.....	195
EDITORIALS:
Which Will Cost the Most? Rev. Frederick Lynch, D.D.....	199
Morality and Happiness: Rev. T. Rhondda Williams.....	200
Unseen and Intangible Realities: Professor Rufus M. Jones....	201
EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE:
The Home Missions Council .....	202
THE OBSERVER'S LETTER:
Heresy Trials .....	204
THE WEEKLY SERMON:
The Place and Function of the Church To-day: Rev. J. R. Cohn.....	205
GENERAL ARTICLES:
Is There Hope in the Factory? Professor H. A. Overstreet.....	210
Christianity in the Factory: S. R. Rectanus.....	212
Community Chests and Merger Campaigns: Ward W. Adair and W. R. Hopkins .....	215
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE:
Conference of the Canadian Student Christian Movement: Rev. J. Lovell Murray, D.D. ....	219
ONE BOOK A WEEK:
The Best I Remember .....	221

The Christian Work; Published weekly; 10 cents a copy, $3.00 a year in the United States, $3.52 in Canada, and $4.04 in all other countries (postage included.)

Application made for entry as second class matter February 17, 1923, at the Post-office at New York, N. Y., under act of March 3, 1879.

Printed in U. S. A.—Published by The Christian World, Inc., Frederick Lynch, President; Henry Strong Huntington, Vice-President; Benson Y. Landis, Secretary-Treasurer.

All communications and remittances should be sent to "The Christian Work," 70 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Printed by Birkle & Glaser, 103 Park Place, New York City.

The World of To-day

CHURCHES IN COUNCIL ON INTERNATIONAL QUESTIONS

Those of us who are Christians are perfectly sure that the only real solution of the international questions that stump the world to-day lies in the practical application of such principles as loving your neighbor as yourself and readiness to be the servant of all—in other words, actual Christianity. When, therefore, a good proportion of the leaders of the Church in America sit down together to reason on these international knots, their conclusions ought to be significant. They ought to have in them elements of large statesmanship. The Federal Council's Commission on International Friendship and Goodwill last week called a conference to discuss the attitude of the American churches to the European and Near East situations and toward Latin America. Among those present at the conference were Dr. Francis E. Clark, of the World Christian Endeavor Society; Bishop Wilson, of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Bishop Cannon, of the Southern Methodist Church; Dr. Warnshuis, of the International Missionary Council; Stanley White, of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions; Carlisle Hibbard, in charge of the European work of the Y. M. C. A.; James G. McDonald, head of the Foreign Policy Association of New York (the Foreign Policy Association has greatly helped to spread the truth in regard to international questions); the editors of "The Christian Advocate" and "The Continent," and some seventy or eighty other men and women of similar standing. In regard to the European situation, Dr. James H. Franklin, secretary of the Baptist Foreign Mission Society, voiced what probably represented the general sentiment of the group: that the Americans desire that Germany pay every dollar that she can; that they believe that some way should be devised to find how much she can pay; that Christian Americans generally want America to take its part in international life, ready to become a member of international conferences; that we approve the agreement on the British debt. "We should follow it," said Dr. Franklin, "with an even more generous course with other debts." "Our own people must be more sacrificial," he went on. "if we are to demand a more sacrificial attitude at Washington." Bishop McDowell, of Washington, followed Dr. Franklin with the suggestion of a letter to the Churches of Europe urging that they bring to bear their influence upon their governments to secure their assent to meeting in international conference. But the conferees were disposed to believe that the Church in America needed to get our own government into a more international spirit before we can urge such a policy on our sister churches. As Bishop Cannon put it, "We should expect our nation to take the initiative. Unless our country takes the stand that the time is come for us to take our responsibility and call a great conference, we cannot expect much from other nations." The thought that we ought to be generous in regard to the debts owed us by Europe continually cropped up. No sentiment touching Europe called forth heartier applause than ex-Ambassador Morgenthau's remark: "This country has not shown the world that we are ready to back up our words with practical deeds. We want to do our share to preserve civilization, and do it like men."

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

DR. BARTON ON LAUSANNE

Dr. James L. Barton attended the Near East Conference at Lausanne as a representative of the benevolent interests of America in the Near East and as an unofficial adviser to our delegation of observers there. We trust that we may publish his account of the conference in full. The more we know about Lausanne the better. The real members of the conference were Turkey, Greece, Italy, France and Great Britain, with Japan and the United States on the side lines. The United States was there only because of the flood of mail demanding our presence which reached our Government after the Smyrna horror. The letters poured in upon Washington as they did not even before our entry into the World War. So our three delegates sat at the side lines at Lausanne. That was the conclusion of the whole matter. One of the best newspaper men at Lausanne commented that we should never have been tolerated there at all if it had not been for the debts owed us by Great Britain, France and Italy. We were there to tell the other powers what they ought to do, and then take all that the others got, with the distinct preliminary announcement that we would not lift a finger to enforce the demands! It was a contemptible position. Our Secretary of State should have sat along with the other foreign secretaries at Lausanne, an actual member of the Conference. Under the circumstances our men did remarkably well. Unfortunately Ambassador Child feels that he has to write out what he wants to say. He cannot rise and speak on his feet. More than once, notably when the Turks challenged our presence at the Conference, Lord Curzon had to come to the rescue and defend our position, when Child should have done so. According to Ambassador Child our observers won most of what they contended for. They stood for the "freedom of the Straits," and won it, contrary to Russia's contention. They insisted that the Greeks should not be driven from Constantinople, and won, thanks to the Greek permission to the Turks to stay in western Thrace. They favored an Armenian National Home, the only project in which they lost completely.

WHAT THE TURKS WON AT LAUSANNE

The Turks came to Lausanne feeling their way. On the initial question concerning boundaries they found that France and Italy would do nothing in the way of backing up their demands by force. The Turkish delegates quickly sensed the situation. Then Nansen, of the League of Nations, came with his proposition for the exchange of minorities populations between Greece and Turkey. As a practical matter it meant only that Turkey had a right to expel Christians. The Turks thereupon ordered the Christians out in thirty days. When the civilized world protested she changed the order so as to give them "liberty" to get out within thirty days, adding, "If you fail to get out, we shall not be responsible for you thereafter." That meant a threat of transportation into the interior. The Armenians left Turkey, except Constantinople, and the Turks mean to eliminate them there also. The Turks, then, at the conference won Constantinople, the right to expel non-Moslems (i.e., to get rid of any population unsatisfactory to the dominant race), the right to abrogate treaties (Turkey coolly announced that the capitulations, which vouchsafed special rights to foreigners, were abrogated, without so much as an, If you please. The Conference accepted the Turkish claim that everything before 1918 had been wiped off the slate), the absolute elimination of the Armenian question, and a clean bill of health morally—there is not a single indictment of them in the final treaty, they are treated as brothers and made one with us. There are certainly two great moral wrongs in the Treaty of Lausanne. One is the new principle on which we have commented above—the right of a nation to eject any portion of its people who are displeasing to the majority. That is a new principle in international life—one calculated to rise up and plague civilization. Hereafter what can civilization say if Czechoslovakia proposes to exile the Germans from its borders, or Rumania the Jews, or Germany the Poles, or the United States the Irish, or Japan the Anglo-Saxons? That right is established for one nation, therefore for all. The moral sentiment of the United States can never assent to such a proposition. It is one thing to exclude certain classes of newcomers; it is quite another thing to uproot from their homes people whose ancestors have lived there for centuries and millenniums. The other great moral wrong of the Treaty of Lausanne is the failure to make any provision for the Armenians. The Armenians have as much right to a home of their own as have Greeks or Bulgarians or Serbs or Poles or Czechs. They have more right to it than have the Jews, for they have lived continuously in large numbers in definite regions, constituting in places a majority of the total population. The nations have officially promised them a home time after time. Let the United States refuse to sign any treaty with Turkey in which these two wrongs are incorporated. Let us as a nation forego trade and concessions if need be and stand for humanity. Such wrongs are not for the permanent health either of Turkey or the world. It is as true to-day as it was in the days before slavery that nothing is settled until it is settled right. Let the Administration at Washington hear from the Christian people of this country a mighty protest against our putting our signature to any wrong against human rights. Let the Administration know that we want no treaty with Turkey until we have a treaty that is not only negatively, but positively right. It is still incumbent on Christians—and on Christian nations—to love their neighbors as themselves. And refugee Greeks and Armenians are our neighbors just as truly as are Turks. It is worth the note of our President and State Department and Senate that this is God's world, and that it is well assured that God believes in men treating each other as brothers.

THE BRITISH DEBT SETTLEMENT

The House has promptly ratified the agreement on the British debt to this country submitted by the British and American debt commissions after their recent meeting in Washington. The agreement provides that the British government shall pay three per cent. on the debt for the first ten years and thereafter three and one-half per cent. until the debt is extinguished sixty-two years from now. In addition to the interest, the British will regularly pay an installment on the $4,600,000,000 principal of the debt, so that after the first ten years their annual payments of interest and principal will altogether amount to some $180,000,000. This debt adjustment is more generous to Great Britain than the earlier terms laid down by Congress for the guidance of our American debt commission. It sets a standard for our financial adjustments with other countries also. But we may conclude that we can give even more generous terms to countries less prosperous than Great Britain. We might well aid the process of disarmament by offering special terms to nations which reduce their expenditures on armaments to a certain minimum.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

BISHOP MANNING'S RETREAT

In his first letter to Dr. Grant, Bishop Manning suggested that he might feel called upon to try the rector of the Church of the Ascension for heresy. But Bishop Manning soon discovered himself in an awkward position. The mass of the Episcopal clergy had no stomach for a heresy trial. A good number of the strongest of the Episcopal ministers in New York stood manfully for liberty of thought in the Church. Probably Bishop Manning himself, although vexed by Dr. Grant personally, would be sorry to have the young men and women of to-day driven to the conclusion that people could not accept what God seemed to teach them as true and still remain in the Church. At any rate, in a somewhat awkward letter replying to Dr. Grant's communication, the Bishop withdrew his threat of a heresy trial. The letter fails to face the essence of Dr. Grant's proposition, that with the advance of knowledge, parts of such a creed as that called "The Apostles" may lose their original significance and the Church generally may cease to believe them in the old sense. Instead the Bishop descended at one point to a personal attack on Dr. Grant, averring that "for years past" his words and actions had given "grave concern to the Bishops of this Diocese, and to the Church." The fact is that Bishop Potter and Bishop Greer were intimate friends and cordial admirers of Dr. Grant. Bishop Burch was somewhat put out with him over the Church of the Ascension Forum and its freedom of speech, but personally Bishop Burch and Dr. Grant were on good terms. Bishop Manning says he does not propose to try Dr. Grant because the latter has not unequivocally denied the deity of Jesus. Has not the time come when we can turn back to the first three Gospels and take the view of Jesus which he took of Himself, as He is revealed in His own words and deeds? What we need is not theology. That will not bring the Kingdom of God. What we need is the adoption of the practical teaching of Jesus in every day life, and so advance toward the Kingdom of God. Can the Church ever be one through a creed? Is not the great source of unity a purpose? We print Bishop Manning's letter on page 194.

THE POPE AND THE RUSSIAN CHURCH

On January 29, under the heading, "Russian Church Ready to Recognize Supremacy of the Pope," the Jewish "Morning Journal" of New York published the following dispatch from its Berlin correspondent: "From very reliable sources we are informed that negotiations are being concluded between the Russian Church and the Vatican concerning the union of the Orthodox Church with the Roman Catholic. It is said that the Pope has made it the object of his life to bring the Russian Church under the wing of Rome. In order to accomplish his purpose the Pope is studying the Russian language. The Russian ecclesiastic who is favoring this union is the Metropolitan Tikhon. Tikhon, who is now under arrest, has been given permission to leave Russia, and is expected to depart very soon for a visit to Rome. It is said that the Russian Church is willing to recognize the Pope, but wants to secure some special rights. The Pope, on his side, is willing to grant such privileges, as special ritual ceremonies, and so on." On the eighth of this month the same paper printed another dispatch from Berlin, headed, "Soviet Government Will Guarantee Full Liberty to the Catholic Churches in Russia." The dispatch runs: "We are informed from Moscow that the Soviet and the Pope are about to agree that the [Roman] Catholic Church will have full liberty in Russia. This means that [Roman] Catholic priests will have the right to propagate their faith among the Russians and to build Roman Catholic churches wherever they wish. Some of the priests of the Russian Church are displeased with such an agreement between the Soviet and the Pope of Rome, and are attempting to influence the Soviet not to grant such freedom to Rome. However, it is well assured that the Soviet will grant full liberty to the Roman Catholic Church, since the Pope of Rome has promised to recognize the Soviet government. A great fight is expected between the Roman Catholic and Orthodox Churches in Russia." The first of these dispatches probably cannot be taken very seriously. The Soviet government wants to stir up all the trouble that it can for the Orthodox Church. So far as the promise of a great struggle between the Latin and Greek Churches go, the dispatch represents what the Soviets would like to have the case. It is worth nothing that the Soviet representatives in Berlin from whom this material must have come are Jews. The Jewish "Morning Journal's" correspondent probably has pretty direct access to them. As we have said before, one of the cardinal objects of the Soviet is to break the power of the Orthodox Church. It has already fostered a split in the Church. It feels sure that only a portion of the Russia clergy would ever accept any connection with Rome, and therefore it would aid Roman pretensions and secure another split. On the same basis, it will be ready, no doubt, to welcome American denominations. May the American Churches have a higher aim than that of Rome. May they, instead of desiring additional power and numbers, sounding statistics, be interested only in the development of real, practising Christianity in Russia. In short, may they be Christians enough to forget themselves as they approach Russia.

THE METHODISTS AND RUSSIA

We have just commented on the attempts of the Soviet Government to weaken the power of the Church in Russia by promoting the Roman Church over against the Orthodox. The Soviet Government is approaching the American Methodist Episcopal Church with a similar purpose, we may suppose. According to the Methodist authorities, the Russian Church, with the approval of the Soviet Government, has appealed for "assistance in re-establishing the standard of Christ in Russia." The Methodists have appointed Bishop Edgar Blake of Paris, Bishop John Q. Nielson of Zurich, Bishop Anton Bast of Copenhagen, and Rev.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

W. B. Beauchamp, Secretary of Foreign Work, to confer with representatives of the Russian Church on this appeal. Here is a great opportunity for the Methodists to deal with the situation as Christians, their first interest the Kingdom of God, completely forgetting any supposed advantage to the Methodist Church. It is unfortunate that Dr. Joseph B. Hingeley, secretary-emeritus of the Methodist General Conference, in his announcement of the appointment of delegates, apparently fell into the Soviet trap by suggesting the possibility of the establishment of a separate Methodist Church in Russia:

"The Soviet Government," he said, "is not friendly to the Russian Church, but it is well to remember that the Church was tied up with the Imperial Government and, though having great wealth and a clergy of education and intelligence, had never been the friend of the people or sympathized with their struggles against autocracy. A mental reaction is one of surprise that the Russian Church and its property have not been interfered with more, in view of the revolutionary situation, the evidently non-Christian character of the political leaders and the abuses of hostile propaganda.

"And now comes an invitation from a section of the great Church, pleading for assistance in re-establishing the standard of Christ in Russia and asking us to prove the genuineness of our brotherhood in Christ by standing by and with them in their efforts to bring spiritual order out of the almost helpless national chaos. Those who invite us may not be officers of the old established order, but the invitation may be all the more important for that very reason. The new wine of American Methodism might be lost if poured into the old bottles of the State Church. The time-worn ceremonial garments might be torn if patched by the new cloth of a young church.

"It might be that were Methodist work attempted in Russia there would be a change of attitude as in France, where French Protestants seem to look upon us as interlopers and to think that our work should be limited to extending financial assistance to their Reformed Church.

"But whatever the future may hold, the way into Russia is apparently open. At Petrograd, by its service to the community, Methodism has already found a place in the hearts and thoughts of the common people. Certain elements of the Russian Church bid us welcome, and the Government declares that there will be no official interference.

"Making all allowances for hostile propaganda, willful misrepresentations, ignorant assumption of knowledge, and the worship of strange gods, it is evident that the situation in Russia, from any point of view, is awful. But out of it has come a government differing from any hitherto known, which has established itself and is seeking recognition in the family of the governments of the world. Let us not bind our prejudices to words.

"Recently the latest born, the Soviet has been dropped on the world's doorstep. It is an unwelcome child, an 'ugly duckling,' but it is here."

THE CHURCHES' PLEA AGAINST WAR AND THE WAR SYSTEM

One hundred and fifty-five of the leading churchmen of this country have united in signing a statement expressing their stand on war. The signers very nearly commit themselves to the position taken by William Austin Smith, the late editor of "The Churchman," toward the close of his life, that "War is sin." The manifesto describes war as "the most ruinous organized sin which mankind now faces." The statement is significant on account of its signers. We publish it in full. The statement, we might add, was drafted by Harry Emerson Fosdick:

The present situation in international affairs, involving as it does the imminent peril of war, must give concern to every thoughtful Christian. After a devastating conflict which has cost millions of lives, created immeasurable hatred and piled up a debt of fifty dollars for every minute of time since Christ was born, the nations of the earth, apparently having learned nothing and forgotten nothing, are once more planning the old game of competitive imperialism and competitive armament. The Church of Christ was severely blamed for the occurrence of the last war. That the Gospel should have been so long on earth and yet should have not prevented the great catastrophe with all its hideous cruelty and suffering was a charge against the Church so serious that all thoughtful ministers felt its force and were driven defensively to meet it. Even more will another war bring down upon the Church of Christ the charge of moral cowardice and fatal inefficiency.

Yet another war is being prepared in the vindictive hatreds, the nationalistic ambitions, the scheme of racial and imperial self-aggrandizement, which mark the world's international relationships. The spirit of goodwill and sincere co-operation for the welfare of mankind as a whole is so lamentably weak, is so openly scoffed at in influential quarters, and expectations of war are so freely voiced and preparations for it so frankly pushed, that another war is inevitable unless a better mind can speedily prevail.

There are some among us, of whom the signatories of this appeal form a small group, who regard war as the most ruinous organized sin which mankind now faces; who are sure that the war system and the Christian Gospel cannot permanently abide together on the same earth; who see clearly that the spirit of war and the spirit of the Gospel are antithetical, the one representing what the other hates and would destroy; who recognize that war is futile as a means of furthering Christ's Kingdom, even where the end sought is righteous and where the spirit of the combatants is sacrificial.

Our position in this appeal does not involve theoretical pacifism; we are not concerned to deny the necessity of using force, it may be in an emergency, nor of a moderate military organization for defensive purposes. But the war system is not an appeal to force in an emergency—it is a long drawn out and deliberate preparation for the use of every known means of cruel and collective destruction. It rests upon the assumption that the welfare of one people involves the ruin of another and it plans far ahead of the event to be able to compass that ruin. It represents the deliberate organization of the world into isolated and armed peoples, suspicious of each other, hating each other, waiting to fall upon each other, instead of sanely co-operating peoples finding the best interests of all fulfilled in a decent, peaceable and reasonable fellowship.

We will not believe that mankind is so deficient in character and intelligence as to make the rational solution of our international problems impossible and to commit us to the continued rule of insane fear, hatred and collective destruction. And we are certain that unless the Church of Christ takes now a clear and consistent stand on this matter of life and death to our civilization and to the world, she will merit the contempt of men and the judgment of God.

We therefore urge all the people of the churches, and all ministers in particular, to an outspoken declaration that the war system and the Gospel of Christ are diametrically and irreconcilably opposed. We urge that without delay this crisis of decision between war and Christ be unmistakably recognized and stated. We would have every Christian Church the center of a frank and courageous antagonism to war and everything that makes war, until in our own country and in all lands we succeed in reinstating Christian loyalty to Christ where it belongs—far above all local prejudice, racial hatred, and

(Continued on page 207)

EDITORIAL

EDITORIAL STAFF

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF
Frederick Lynch

ASSOCIATE EDITOR
Henry Strong Huntington

MANAGING EDITOR
Benson Y. Landis

LITERARY EDITOR
Tertius Van Dyke

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT
Edmund de Schweinitz Brunner

CONTRIBUTING STAFF

Henry A. Atkinson
Peter Ainslie
Hugh Black
S. Parkes Cadman

Sidney L. Gulick
Rufus M. Jones
E. Guy Talbott
T. Rhondda Williams

EDITORIAL COUNCIL

Nehemiah Boynton
William Adams Brown
Howard Duffield
Sherwood Eddy
Irving Fisher
J. W. Johnson

Shailer Mathews
George Foster Peabody
George A. Plimpton
Howard C. Robbins
Fred B. Smith
Cornelius Woelfkin

Charles S. Macfarland

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS

Austria: Professor Carl Beth
Canada: Dr. J. Lovell Murray
Czechoslovakia: Professor Francis Zilka
France: Rev. Professor Wilfred Monod
Germany: Direktor A. Hinderer
Great Britain: Rev. Sidney M. Berry
Hungary: Dr. S. Szabo
Switzerland: Pastor Adolph Keller

becomes more and more stubborn and France more and more aggressive in the invasion. We should not be surprised to hear the newsboys crying under our windows at any moment, "War between France and Germany begun!" This would mean that Russia would join forces with Germany at the first moment; that Poland and other nations would soon be drawn in. Turkey would leap to arms at once, for she is only waiting for the slightest rift between Great Britain and France to begin her invasion of Europe. In a week all the Balkans would be in the war—then Great Britain and Italy. This is not idle dreaming. This is what every statesman in Great Britain and on the Continent is saying. It is what all the far-seeing statesmen of America are seeing and saying. It is what is on the front page of every journal whose editor knows anything of the conditions in Europe. Everybody in Europe is living over a powder magazine, and France, whether justifiably, necessarily, or not, is playing with fire.

The question that every thoughtful American is asking at just this moment is, What will happen to America? It is not necessary to hazard any guesses or suppositions to answer this question. The logic of events answers. Exactly that will happen which happened in 1918—only we imagine it will happen sooner: we will be in the war. There is no way on earth to keep out of it. All our rights will be jeopardized; American property will be destroyed; American citizens will be killed; and as Japan and China enter it, as they surely will, things will happen in the Pacific, and soon it will be all the world again as in 1914-1920. It may be put down as a Euclidean axiom, that all wars of the future will be world wars. We are all one family, living in one house. Space has been swept away. Two nations cannot fight each other without dragging in all the rest of the world any more than two individuals can carry on a pistol fight at the family table without involving the whole family. If war breaks out in Europe, all the world will be in it, including the United State.

At the same time that all the statesmen of Great Britain, Italy, Sweden, Switzerland and Holland (and many Frenchmen who are not quite in sympathy with their government) are saying that war seems imminent, or at least may come, they are saying that the United States could prevent it would she only be willing to call the nations together, or offer to mediate between the perplexed and embittered nations, or, best of all, join the League of Nations and insist that all these problems—Germany and France, Turkey and the Allies, all of them—be sent there for consideration and possible solution. Many of the most far-sighted men in our own nation are seeing and saying the same thing—Mr. Morgenthau, Justice Clarke, General Wickersham, President Lowell, Dr. Finlay, Dr. Holt, President Faunce—hundreds of them. Even Senator Borah, once the most outstanding isolationist we had, is demanding our intervention. We believe these leading statesmen of Europe and our own American students of foreign affairs are right—in fact, we know they are. We are as sure as we are sure of to-morrow's coming, that had America been in Geneva during the last three years that the Turkish fiasco would never have happened; the whole question of German reparations would have been settled without France moving a soldier; that many other problems pregnant with war-seeds would have been solved; and that the economic recovery of all Europe would have been well on its way. We have refused to go; we have refused to attend

Which Will Cost the Most?

REGARDLESS of the rights of France in entering the Ruhr valley, everybody admits that it is fraught with the imminent possibilities of another European war. It may have been the only course for France to have taken under the circumstances; it may have been that had she not taken it she would never have got her reparations; it may be true that Germany was trying to escape her obligations and France was forced to this act—however this may all be, one thing is certain, that it may be fraught with most terrible circumstances for the future. It has widened the breach between Germany and France a hundred-fold. There was no outlook for permanent peace, stability of civilization and economic recovery of Europe except Germany and France could learn to live together in good-will and mutual trust. Some successful steps had been undertaken toward the establishing of this good-will, especially through the kindly agency of the Churches and labor groups of other nations. This has all come to naught. The action of France has solidified both the German people and caused the fire of hatred to burn as it hardly burned during the war, and will solidify the French people as one act after another against the French surely follows, so that they will hate Germany as never before. Already this is being accomplished before our eyes.

Everybody dreads the future, for the war may break out again at any moment as this hatred grows, and as Germany

EDITORIAL

even special conferences where American rights, property and citizens were endangered; we have refused to help stay the hand of the murderous Turk; we have refused to lift a finger to stop the headlong rush of Europe to the verge of another war.

It is not too late now, and it is time for the American people immediately to decide which will ultimately cost the most—co-operation with the European powers, either by conference or entry into the League, or participation in a world war. Even should America not be dragged into the war, should it come, it is worth raising the question, "Which will cost the most?"—participation in European affairs now, or permitting the war to come. For should the war come, America will suffer immeasurable losses by losing her European markets. A Europe plunged into war will have no money to buy American goods. Even with the present chaos in Europe, America is feeling the loss of markets so considerably that Senator Borah is calling for a conference (in his case moved by the fact that the farmers are feeling the loss more and more). Again we ask, "Which will cost the most?"

F. L.

Morality and Happiness

AS to whether we can be happy with moral laws, depends upon our attitude towards them. There is no doubt that in order to be happy, life must be spontaneous; to kill spontaneity is to kill joy. And yet it is equally true that if we are to retain happiness life must be regulated by moral principles. The indiscriminate working out of all spontaneous impulse will very soon bring disaster. To demand self-expression without great care as to what kind of self is to be expressed, and without observing the relation of this self to other selves, will not only not secure happiness, but will very soon make happiness impossible. One sees extreme cases in the newspaper every day, cases of man and women who are determined to do what they call "live their own lives." That is, have what they call "a good time" by living on the plane of desire without moral scruples, without reference to any high principles, and ending in a pact of suicide or a murder. But quite apart from such extreme cases, life is full of unutterable woe owing to people who take life too much in that way. There is no more sure way to lead to unhappiness than the way which many take to seek pleasure. But how can we reconcile the two demands for spontaneity and regulation? Only by recognizing that the regulating principles themselves are a part of us, rooted in our deepest being.

What people often call "self-expression" is only an expression of a very small part of the self, and not in the true sense of the self at all. This is rather an important point to make at the present time when there is so much foolish talk and foolish writing against all sorts of repression. If self-expression is going to mean a right to satisfy every desire, it is obvious that no kind of satisfactory social life would be possible at all. The only self which has any right to be expressed is a self which is, first of all, unified within, and then harmonized with other selves. To treat every inclination as one to be followed, every impulse as one to be gratified, would merely produce anarchy in our moral nature, and so far from being an expression or a development of the self, it would be very decisively an inward disintegration. Surely if we plead the right of self-expression we must do so only for the whole of the personality; we have no right to express fugitive thoughts or feelings if the expression would react injuriously upon the quality of our own souls. We must not be terrified by what the psychologists say about the evil effects of suppression in disease such as neurasthenia. We have to remember that if we give way to all impulses we shall be repressing the best in our nature, and we shall suffer more from that than if we repressed the worst. If there is an inward moral conflict something has got to be repressed, and we side with the real self when we side with the good. If inward disapproval accompanies an inclination, the only way to real self-expression is to put the inclination aside. We reach the same conclusion if we make consideration of others the chief thing. We have no right to express anything in ourselves to the injury of others. We shall find that what will harmonize our being within will also secure the social good. Spontaneity without regulation would soon dry up the sources of life; powers would be wasted, and even emotions could not retain their freshness; there is no power of renewal in the unregulated life of desire. On that line, like the Prodigal Son, we can spend all.

The moral laws are not foreign impositions, but demands of our own nature. To quarrel with them as if they were enforced upon us from without is foolish, as they are that without which we should not be ourselves. The failure to appreciate this point of view is very strikingly expressed in "Last Poems" of A. E. Housman. Here is No. 12:

The laws of God, and the laws of man,
He may keep that will and can;
Not I: let God and man decree
Laws for themselves and not for me;
And if my ways are not as theirs,
Let them mind their own affairs.
Their deeds I judge and much condemn,
Yet when did I make laws for them?
Please yourselves, say I, and they Need only look the other way.
But no, they will not; they must still Wrest their neighbor to their will,
And make me dance as they desire,
With jail, and gallows and hell-fire.
And how am I to face the odds
Of man's bedevilment and Gods?
I, a stranger and afraid
In a world I never made.
They will be master, right or wrong;
Though both are foolish, both are strong.
And since, my soul, we cannot fly
To Saturn nor to Mercury,
Keep we must, if keep we can,
These foreign laws of God and man.

To this poet, some brute or blackguard made the world.

It is in truth iniquity on high
To cheat our sentenced souls of aught they crave,
And mar the merriment as you and I
Fare on our long fool's errand to the grave.
The troubles of our proud and angry dust
Are from eternity, and shall not fail,
Bear them we can, and if we can we must.
Shoulder the sky, my lad, and drink your ale.

Here is a man wanting to have a free life on the plane of the senses, without considering other people, and without admitting the validity or the rightness of the moral demands in his own nature. Because he wants this kind of life desperately, and finds that there are laws of God and man interfering with it, he deems them foreign, and himself a stranger and afraid. Any idea of law is a bondage. There is no realization that without law there can be no liberty, never a glimpse of the grand conception embodied in the words, "the perfect law of liberty." So long as what we call our dust is proud and angry there will be no end to our trouble. The reason for that is an eternal reason. Tabernacling in this dust of ours is something that demands life on a higher plane than that on which we are living, and if we are only proud and angry at the demand, there can be no deliverance from trouble.

EDITORIAL

What a treat it is to turn from such writing to a passage like the latter half of the Nineteenth Psalm, to many another in the Old Testament, to some glorious experiences described in the New Testament, in which men have found that the laws of God are the laws of their own nature, and that in keeping them they keep themselves, and come to their best, reaching their highest joy and their deepest satisfaction. They do not regard the laws of truth and right and love as foreign impositions, but as marked roads along which they are to find their true destiny and fulness of joy.

Now, the way to find God's laws a delight is to remember God's purposes, to keep alive a rich and fruitful sympathy with them. God's purposes are redemptive. They are best revealed in Christianity. They mean the realization of brotherhood in this world, and they work for the perfection of man and society in all that is high and noble, a purpose to be realized partly here and partly hereafter. All who are in sympathy with that purpose will accept and feel within themselves the Christian obligation of truth and love. It is in these laws of God, as a way of life for ourselves, we shall find our greatest delight and satisfaction. When God's will for us becomes our will for ourselves we shall find that what reigns on high is not iniquity that wrongs us, but magnanimous justice and glorious love. It is not as a restraint, but as a way of self-fulfilment, the will of God is felt by those who are in tune with His purpose.

The men of the New Testament who saw the will of God revealed in Jesus, and received from Him the truth of life, did not think of God as an unfriendly power imposing restrictions upon them; they thought of Him as a Friend and a Father, and Saviour. If they thought of His power, it was His power unto salvation. They spoke of His love, His gifts, and His grace. They thought of Him as one they could trust in life and in death. They spoke very little about laws as such, because they had seen its real nature. Law was love, and love was life. They felt they loved God because He had first loved them. Life was not a grudging compliance with an alien demand, but a generous answer to irresistible love. To turn from the poems of Housman to the Bible is to leave a petulant world of unbelieving egotism behind and enter upon the grand realities of religious experience. To the Housman way of interpreting life Christ is the most magnificent answer. And those who take His way will find God as wise as He is strong, as good as He is great; nor shall they walk in darkness, but in the light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.

T. R. W.

Unseen and Intangible Realities

"That which is not brings to naught that which is."

ST. PAUL'S saying is not quite a paradox. It is rather a vivid and forceful way of saying what he often says, namely, that unseen and intangible realities build and shape the things we see. Indiscernibles are mighty factors. An invisible world is behind and within the visible one. We recognize this truth now in a multitude of ways. In the fine peroration of his great message on "The Leadership of Educated Men"—given at Brown University in 1882—George William Curtis very impressively referred to the invisible force of gravitation which holds the world together and controls all its movements. He said:

"In the cloudless midsummer sky serenely shines the moon, while the tumultuous ocean rolls and murmurs beneath, the type of illimitable and unbridled power; but resistlessly marshaled by celestial laws all the wild waters, heaving from pole to pole, rise and recede obedient to that mild queen of heaven."

We have slowly come to realize, as science has piled up its inferences and conclusions, that our visible world is only a fragment of a larger universe and swims in a vast invisible world which has no known or conceivable bounds. Out of this inexhaustible sea of energy come the forces which build our visible world—forces which we name and use but do not understand. Gravitation, cohesion, attraction, magnetism, electricity, molecular energy, ether-waves are a few of the words which stand for mighty forces. We say the words and look wise, as though our finger were on a secret. We know, however, no more about the real nature of these forces which build our world than Aladdin knew about the jinnee that reared his palace when he rubbed his lamp. We know little more than that the visible comes out of the invisible, and that we can learn how these invisible forces work and how to direct them for our practical ends.

Everywhere and always the invisible is the builder of the visible. Michelangelo saw the dome of St. Peter's in the viewless realm of his own soul before he raised it into visible beauty above the groined arches of the cathedral. Every creation of art is an instance of the same truth. The form of beauty which comes forth into visible shape for the many to see and admire has first been an inner possession, growing into perfection in the spaceless soul of the creator, where only one could see it.

Plotinus used to hold that it is much truer to say that the body is in the soul than that the soul is in the body. And strange as it may sound, there is much to be said for this view of the ancient Greek philosopher. There are many good evidences to prove that some invisible reality—which we may just as well call soul as anything else, at least until we get a word that means more—that some invisible reality builds and vivifies and directs this visible, corporeal bulk of ours. There is, for example, a tiny speech-center in the left hemisphere of the human brain, so complicated that all the telegraphic instruments in the United States, combined and worked from one central key, would make a very simple instrument compared with it. When a baby arrives here on his hazardous venture his speech-center is not yet organized. Even if he knew all the wonders of the world he has left behind he would tell nothing about it—any more than Beethoven could have rendered a symphony without musical instruments. It looks as though the expanding mind of the child slowly organized and builded this marvelous center, which was only fleshy pulp before the organization was wrought out in it. There is, at any rate, no way to account in terms of matter for the transcendent meanings which burst into consciousness at the sound of words, nor for the way in which conscious effort and attentive purpose build the little bridges between the cells of the brain and make of it an instrument for the spirit.

E D I T O R I A L

We are, once more, all familiar with the way an invisible ideal holds and controls and dominates and constructs a life. It is one of the most notable features of our strange human experience. That which is not yet—for an ideal plainly is what ought to be but is not—works like a mighty energy. It upholds the spirit in hours of defeat. It makes one oblivious to pain. It conquers all opposition. It carries the will, contrary to all laws of mechanics, along the line of greatest resistance. It turns obstacles and hindrances into chariots of victory. It does the impossible. In Paul's great words, "the things which are not bring to naught the things which are!" What cannon of unwonted caliber, pounding at the battle-lines of men, cannot do, the impalpable ideas and ideals of the common people may after all accomplish. Dreams and visions and hopes are not so empty and useless as they often seem. Suddenly they find a potent voice, they grow mighty, they gather volume, and they do what cannon could not do.

One man with a dream, at pleasure
Shall go forth and conquer a crown;
And three with a new song's measure
Can trample a kingdom down.

We, in the ages lying
In the buried past of the earth,
Built Nineveh with our sighing
And Babel itself with our mirth;

And o'erthrew them with prophesying
To the old of the new world's worth;
For each age is a dream that is dying,
Or one that is coming to birth.

The religious books of ancient Persia say that when the soul of a good man arrives at the river of death a beautiful, shining, radiant figure meets it and says to it: "I am your true self, your best self, your real self. I am the image of your ideals, your strivings, your resolves, your determined purposes. I am you. Henceforth we merge together into one harmonious life." The parable is a genuine one. We are forever what our ideals make us.

But deeper and surer than all other invisible realities is that divine Spirit, not seen, but felt, who is the ground of our real being, the source of our longings, the inspirer of our larger hopes, the inner energy by which we live. Some persons think he must be dead or asleep or on a journey. They see such stalking evils, such collapses of civilization, such ugly shadows over the fair world, that they cannot hold their thin clew of faith any longer. It has snapped and left them standing alone in their dark cave. But He is there all the same, though they see Him not nor know Him. He does not vanish in the dark or in the storm. There is much love working still in these hard, dark days. Grace abounds, often unsuspected, even though sin seems so potent. Courage and heroism never broke through and showed their greatness more clearly than now. Sacrifice, which is woven in the same warp with love, is moving like a radiant light everywhere through the storm. Faith in something still holds men and women to their tasks of endurance. All that Christ was and is still attracts the soul that sees it. If an eclipse dims or veils the sight of Him for the moment we may be sure that this warm, healing Sun of our life has not set. He is still there, and some of us continue to feel our hearts burn with His presence, which is as indubitable a reality as is the rock-ribbed earth upon which we tread. What He needs is better organs to reveal Himself through richer, truer, holier lives to show His love through more finely organized personalities, for His grace to break through into the world. He cannot do his work without us. He cannot preach without our lips, comfort without our help, heal without our hands, carry the truth without our feet, remove the shadow without our faith and effort. The invisible works through the visible, the unseen and eternal operates through little instruments like us!

R. M. J.

The Home Missions Council

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE

THE sixteenth annual meeting of the Home Missions Council of Women for Home Missions was held in Atlantic City, January 17-19, 1923. It was generally felt by those in attendance that this was the best annual meeting which the Councils have had in recent years. The fact that the meeting was held in a hotel where all the delegates were housed made a better sustained interest possible than when the meetings were held in New York; also, there was a gain in the intimacy and freedom of the sessions in the hotel auditorium, even when it was poorly ventilated as that in which the Councils met, as compared with the austerity of a great church auditorium such as housed the gathering a year ago. One attending this meeting for the first time must have carried away at least two impressions. He could not fail to have been overwhelmed by the very multiplicity and complexity of the interests which entered into the discussions and the reports of the various committees and he could not help but be bewildered by the light-footed way in which the meeting leaped from one topic to another as the exigencies of the difficult time schedule required. The Councils are disadvantaged by the very size of the task with which they deal, so that the consideration which could be given to any one subject could not help but seem inadequate in many cases.

Anyone interested in the progress of church work in this country would do well to study carefully the proceedings of this meeting. The significant possibilities in this co-operative enterprise show more clearly each year and in no way can this be sensed so well as through a study of the reports made by the standing committees of the two Councils. For one thing, there is evidence of substantial progress in interdenominational co-operation, at least to the extent of the joint consideration of common problems. The membership of the two Councils now includes Boards and Agencies representing twenty-nine different Protestant denominations. To those who have hoped more speedily to find a solution to the difficult problems of denominationalism, the Council must seem as yet timid and cautious in its program. Not all of the members of the family of denominations are equally alive to the desirability of thorough-going co-operation in all Christian work and the elimination of all injurious competition. There are certain members whose predilections for their own ways of conducting affairs must always be had in mind. There are questions which we do not discuss openly in full assemblies except with fear and trembling. But this is the very situation that has made the existence of the Council necessary and that makes its continued operation a sign of hope. The steady increase in the number of denominations included in its membership and the steady broadening of the scope of its discussions and operations are marks of real progress. It is obvious, too, that there has been much loose talk in some quarters as to the extent of denominational competition and over-lapping in Home Mission work. Some of the popular strictures on our denominational agencies at this point are not entirely founded on facts. The field within which denominations are moving forward co-operatively are being enlarged and the fields within which denominational competition flourishes are being diminished. For example, this meeting laid its plans to carry into other Western States the very successful Every Community Visitation Plan which was inaugurated in Montana some years ago, under which the major Protestant denominations unite in a survey of the field and in the allocation of spheres of influence toward the extension of the work. Report was made of the steps which had been taken to unify mission work among the Chinese in San Francisco, probably the most indefensible example of denominational competition which can be found in mission work anywhere on the globe. The progress made in Alaska, in Indian Missions, in Utah and in the West Indies is already well known.

E D I T O R I A L

In the second place, there is great significance in the increasing recognition by all the Home Mission forces of the differentiating factors which enter into Home Mission work. The adaptation of methods and programs to meet the needs of particular populations and particular situations is an outstanding feature of recent development. Certain instances of this stand out in the consideration of the discussions of this meeting. There is, for example, a very remarkable work done under the auspices of the Committee on New Americans in the publishing of special racial studies, to which frequent reference has been made in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, in the development of an information service, in an immigrant aid and guide service, and in the organization and administration of a follow-up system of Protestant immigrants. Another illustration has to do with the splendid work done by the Women's Boards in the service of migrant workers in canneries. The Committee on City and Industrial Relations is planning to co-operate with the Committee on Social and Religious Surveys in a special study during the coming year of the intermediate sized city, recognizing that the one hundred and fifty or more cities of this type represent a field of religious work to which little attention has been paid. In like manner, the Town and Country Committee proposes to co-operate with the Committee on Social and Religious Surveys in a study of the village, which is the No Man's Land of American Protestantism from the town and country point of view. The clear recognition that there is no one method of church work which applies with equal validity to all types of situations is a very great gain.

In the third place, there is apparent an increasing reliance in Home Mission work upon the methods of field study, analysis and research to furnish the adaptations which differing circumstances require. Almost every committee that reported had something to say about the contribution made by the Committee on Social and Religious Surveys, and about the values to be found in all such broadly conceived and carefully executed plans for the scientific study of particular problems or particular areas.

As the other side of the foregoing, there is increasing recognition of the inter-relation of the various aspects of the Home Mission task. One obvious illustration of this is the closer relation of the Women's Boards and the general agencies. Another illustration is that we do not now so glibly talk of the different phases of work, such as city, or immigrant, or rural work as distinct from or perhaps even opposed to other phases.

The final point to be mentioned is the increasing use of various forms of schools, conferences and study courses to increase the efficiency of Home Mission workers. Perhaps the most notable progress in this connection has been made in the town and country field. The number of summer schools for town and country pastors has increased many-fold in the last few years. The work itself is being standardized and put upon the basis of thorough academic efficiency.

The Council gave serious consideration for the first time to the question of the possibility of standardizing the forms and terms of Home Mission employment. All who have dealt with the recruiting question have felt the handicap under which the Home Mission Agencies have labored in appealing to young people for life service, in that they could not so easily offer clear-cut fields of service, the terms and conditions of which could be definitely stated and which unmistakably offered to students the opportunity for a career. A preliminary report on this subject occasioned a good deal of interest and the committee which has had this in hand was instructed to continue its study of the question.

In the program of this meeting there seemed to be two chief weaknesses. That was due largely to the number of committees which must report, and the fact that the program is built entirely around these reports. The result is that the sessions do not sufficiently lift out of the general uniformity the more vital and pressing problems. Admitting the great diversity of interests and that none can be neglected, it would seem wiser to let each session make one or two profound impressions rather than so many lesser ones.

The second weakness, in like manner, grows out of the form of the program. This perhaps is the more important weakness of the two. It is the almost inevitable neglect of certain functional aspects of Home Mission work which pertain in almost equal measure to all phases of work. For example, practically no attention was given to such fundamental considerations as evangelism or promotion. The service implications of Christianity were not to the same extent neglected, but did not have sufficient consideration. The question of buildings and equipment, a problem from which one is never far in any consideration of the work, hardly entered into the discussions. The committee on this subject reported after most of the conference had gone, and comparatively few stayed for the special conference of those interested primarily in this subject, held in the afternoon after the regular sessions had adjourned.

Finally, there are suggested certain weaknesses in the organization of the Council itself. The first of these is that it does not seem to be closely enough integrated with the operating departments of the Boards. The standing committees should, to a greater extent, be the clearing houses of common experiences, in particular of the specialized departments of the co-operating Boards. Farther, the Council still presents too largely a field for discussion rather than an opportunity for action. Too many reservations are necessary to conform to the varying stages of the development of the consciousness of Christian unity.

At the business session of the conference, Dr. Charles L.

Thompson, Secretary Emeritus of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, was re-elected President, having served in this position continuously since the organization of the Council. Dr. Alfred Williams Anthony, who has served as Executive Secretary for five years, being the only Executive Secretary the Council has had, offered his resignation which, in view of his own urging, the Council reluctantly felt constrained to accept. Dr. Anthony consented, however, to continue as Secretary until his successor could be secured. Rev. Rodney W. Roundy was re-elected Associate Secretary.

THE OBSERVER

Heresy Trials

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

PERSONALLY, I do not object to a heresy trial. I know that they sometimes make the ungodly laugh, but that is because they do not understand. They clear the air sometimes, and also clear the way for further advances of the Church. They also serve as a sort of theological thermometer: they show where the Church, as a whole, stands. I have no feeling of glee over them, none of that delight that an Irishman feels in battle. When Dr. Theodore T. Munger was writing the Life of Horace Bushnell he visited a very aged man in Hartford who had known Dr. Bushnell—the last man left who had known him. The old man told Dr. Munger many interesting anecdotes, but began to wax eloquent when he came to the heresy trials in which Dr. Bushnell and his disciples were involved. Suddenly he burst out: "Those were times worth living in, Doctor. We had a heresy trial every year." The piping times of theological peace were proving dull to the old man. Well, few of us feel just that way about these trials, but it is a mistake to think that they necessarily hurt the Church or the cause of religion. As a matter of fact, I sometimes feel that they are a sign that there is still some interest in religion left in the people. One sometimes wonders whether anyone cared enough about religion to be concerned over a sudden departure from the faith or a sudden attack upon some old and cherished doctrine. I think the public interest Dr. Grant's case has aroused is an encouraging sign. Perhaps it is a good thing that the issue has arisen. It convinces one that a good many people still are interested in the doctrinal and theological aspect of religion; that some people still love the Lord with their minds as well as with their hearts and their ego.

I remember so vividly the first case of heresy with which I came in actual contact. It was at the meeting of the American Board in Worcester in 189—. There had been the famous case of the Andover professor, and I had followed it, as a boy, with interest. But the case of the young missionaries who certain officials of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions had refused to send abroad because they would not affirm with positive and sure words that they believed the unrepentant or unconverted soul had no chance of accepting Christ in the next world, came up while I was in college, and I was intensely interested in it. The Board was divided in its opinion. These young men were not dogmatically or bumptiously asserting any doctrine of the future life. They were not even preaching the doctrine of "future probation," which became the term about which the debates hinged. It was only because they would not say there was no chance after death. They left to God what happened in the next world.

The long drawn out discussion between the two factions came to a head in Worcester, and I went up to the meetings. The liberal wing was led by the Smythes, Egbert and Newman, while the conservative group was headed by Secretary Alden and Joseph Cook. It was pretty generally understood that the President, Dr. Storrs, was on the conservative side. Professor George P. Fisher was the recognized mediator between the two groups. I have never heard such debating before or since as I heard during those two days at Worcester. To some of the men to hold out the chance of salvation in the next world was to cut the nerve of missions. Dear old Dr. Cyrus Hamlin, the great founder of Robert College, pleaded with the Board with tears in his eyes and in his voice, not to let it be known to the heathen world that the Christian Church recognized the doctrine of future probation: "It would cut the nerve of missions." Joseph Cook spoke so passionately on the same side that when he came off the platform—I sat near the steps leading up to it—his collar had completely melted down and he was panting like a big lion, and his great eyes were on fire. The leaders of the liberal wing were equally eloquent and earnest, and Dr. Newman Smythe rose to superb heights as he convincingly claimed that the mission of the Church was to preach the gospel and not to set bounds either to God's mercy or His purposes. The liberals won the day and there have been no theological troubles in the American Board since that time, so far as I am aware.

It was not long after this that the case of Professor Briggs came up. This was an intensely interesting case, because Professor Briggs was theologically so orthodox. It was really his espousal of the new Biblical learning that aroused the first suspicions in his case. As the fray grew hotter he began expounding his doctrines on the seat of authority in religion, and it was found he was getting away from the Scriptures as the sole seat of authority. He claimed authority both for the Church and religious experience, or, as he called it, "the Reason." All this was too much and the trial came off with the decision against him. It led to his entering the Episcopal Church and to the Union Theological Seminary severing its official relations to the Presbyterian body. Dr. McGiffert, at present President of the Union Theological Seminary, escaped trial by transferring his membership to the Congregational Church.

While I was in the University there was an interesting heresy trial in Madison, Connecticut. A young man recently from the Divinity School was pastor of the Congregational Church. Everything seemed to be going all right until the young man started in telling his congregation some of the results of the higher criticism. There were some who said that it was not "the results" which stirred up some of the souls who heard him, but the way in which he presented them. I never knew, but I know that the case aroused great interest in New Haven. Everybody in the Divinity School was so excited that students and faculty could hardly pursue their wonted tasks. No one felt, however, that it was a fair test of the right of a minister to present the results of the new learning to his people.

The case of the Rev. Algernon Crapsey, of Rochester, attracted a good deal of attention, not only because of his connection with the Protestant Episcopal Church, which had been little disturbed by heresy trials, but because there was a feeling that his trouble with the Church authorities arose from his advanced social views as well as his position on the Virgin Birth and other doctrinal points. His case attracted national attention, just as Dr. Grant's is doing, because it was a test case—how far can a pastor vary from the accepted interpretations of the creeds and retain his place in the Church.

Dr. Fosdick of the First Presbyterian Church, New York, is in a peculiar position. Some Presbyteries wish to bring him to trial for various utterances, especially those to the effect that belief in the Virgin Birth was not necessary to belief in the Incarnation, but Dr. Fosdick is not a Presbyterian. He is not pastor of the First Church, but is a Baptist preaching under a yearly contract. He might be designated simply as a "pulpit supply." The only way to reach him seems to be to bring the church to trial for allowing unsound teaching from its pulpit. Everybody is watching the progress of the case with much interest. It is a rather interesting fact that Dr. Fosdick's church and Dr. Grant's stand almost side by side. Lower Fifth avenue, New York, Tenth and Twelfth streets, are the center of ecclesiastical excitement at this moment. Both churches have to turn away crowds every Sunday.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Place and Function of the Church To-day

By Rev. J. R. Cohu

Rector of Aston Clinton, England; sometime Fellow of Jesus College, Oxford

"CHURCH," what do we mean by it? In a clever skit the Rev. J. M. C. Crum exactly hits the popular conception of "Church":

"On one day in seven at eleven o'clock you unlock a church door, and you all go in and sit down in rows in pews and 'remember that you are in church' till twelve o'clock. Sometimes you lean forward and rest your head on your hands, and sometimes you sit back and rest your shoulders against the pews, and sometimes you stand up and glance sideways, but what really matters is to be in rows in the pews and remember that you are in church from eleven o'clock till twelve one day in seven.

"During that solemn hour several people are paid to wait upon the religious people in the pews. Some strong men are paid to pull bells to remind people when the one day in seven has come round again. And some melodious men and boys sing to them when they stand up in their places, and one man is paid to read to them out of very large books when they sit down. And then for about twenty minutes this man reads something he has written himself or talks out of his own head, and this is known of all as the most solemn part of their religion. When it is all over, the people go out and refresh themselves and tell each other what they were thinking about while the man talked. But when they meet the man afterwards, they say to him: 'Oh, I did like what you said about pride or gossip; I trust it has done good to some people you and I know of.' And all the people say of the one day in seven: 'What I like about it is that it is so very English.'

"And because it is so very English, and therefore very good, we sail across the seas to places where people live who do not know these things, and we build a big hut, put seats into it, teach the people to come and sit and stand there one day in seven, and pay strong men to ring bells and melodious men and boys to sing to the people when they stand up, and one man reads to them out of big books when they sit down, and talks to them for twenty minutes out of his own head, and he writes home to say that the eyes of the heathen are being opened, and the people in England send out money for more huts."

Now from jest to earnest. It is so easy to caricature our "one day in seven," so easy to make the "sacrifice of the Mass" everything and sneer at Matins and Evensong with their praying, Bible-reading, and preaching; yet, for us Englishmen, they are our sheet-anchor. Dr. Inge writes: "The prophet, not the priest, was held in honor by the Apostolic Church," and so it has ever been with us as a nation; we are built that way. And a well-spent "one day in seven" may produce a life of service quite as acceptable in God's sight as many daily services. Let us thank God that in every hamlet is a House of God with its altar, where "we draw nigh and take the Body of the Lord;" its lectern, where God speaks to us in His Word; its place of prayer, where we speak to God with heart and voice; its font, where Christ takes our little ones in His arms and blesses them; its pulpit, where is told us the old old story of Jesus and His love; let us thank Him, too, for His one day in seven. To our long and loving use of these means of grace we owe all that is best in ourselves and in our England. But, good work as our Church is still doing, is she doing all that Christ means His Church to do?

What is the Church of Christ herefor? His Church, I take it, is a society, a fellowship, a brotherhood of men full of the Spirit of Christ and carrying on His work. What is the Spirit of Christ, and what is His work? To put it roughly and briefly, Christ stands for the Fatherhood of God, the Brotherhood of man, and goodness through the Spirit; and Christ's one aim is the establishment of God's Kingdom of peace and good-will here on earth. Christ is forever telling us: First clasp your Father's hand and you will soon clasp your brother man's: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart; this is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." This do, says Christ, and, as a natural sequel, we shall see all men living together as one big, united family of brothers and sisters, in love serving one another, each sinking self for the good of all, and the Kingdom of God will be here.

This was Christ's one goal, the Kingdom of God: "His gospel was the gospel of the Kingdom; His righteousness was the righteousness of the Kingdom; His disciples were the sons of the Kingdom; His prayer, Thy Kingdom come on earth as it is in Heaven." From the work of the Kingdom He trained His followers; "Preach the Kingdom" was His commission; and, full of His Spirit, devoted to His Person, sharing His faith in the Kingdom, this little band made the work of the Kingdom their lifework, filling men's hearts with love of God and love of one another.

Clearly, then, Christ's Church is here expressly to voice, foster, deepen the spirit of the Fatherhood of God and Brotherhood of Man not only on Sundays in church, but as the main-spring of all we are and all we do in the home, in society, in business, in politics. Christ claims the whole of life, in every sphere, as His province, even as He Himself would tell you that as a carpenter He was doing God's work just as much as in His preaching; that He was every whit as much about His Father's business as guest at a wedding feast as when He was weeping with those that weep; as near to God in the company of publicans as when He knelt in prayer. This is the Spirit of Christ, and His Church must have in her the mind which was in Christ Jesus. She is here to preach and practise the same gospel of the Fatherhood of God and Brotherhood of Man, to make brother clasp the hand of brother in work or play, in joy or sorrow, in poverty or wealth, in all that concerns man in body, mind, or soul, without respect of persons. To-day as never before, men are crying out to the churches for this practical gospel in which love of God and love of man go hand in hand, with its call to comradeship, service, self-sacrifice, each doing to others as he would others should do unto him. As Dr. Diggle, late Bishop of Carlisle, was forever telling us:

"Let us have done with things that do not matter, and do let us put first things first. The primary facts are: The Fatherhood of God, Redemption through Christ by walking in His steps, goodness through the Holy Spirit, and the universal brotherhood of man. Let us make these the alpha and omega of our creed, and all other things, social well-being, political and civil integrity, harmony between capital and labor, domestic felicity, international righteousness, concord between the churches, and the cessation of wars among nations, will be added unto us."

Thus the one test of a standing or falling Church comes to this: "Is she effectively doing God's work of the Kingdom?" If she is, neither God nor man cares what machinery she uses for that purpose, bishops or no bishops, six sacraments or two. The Apostolic Church was congregational, the Cyprianic Church episcopal, the Papal Church imperial, the Reformed Church cared little whether there were bishops or not; yet in their day each and all of these were strong and living churches doing Christ's work of the Kingdom, and doing it well. Why? Because they were earnest, enthusiastic, alive, in touch with reality; they voiced the real life, the real needs, the real aspirations of their day, and in the words and ideas of their day.

Now the gospel of the Kingdom has lost none of its power, and men are thirsting for it. Say what parsons will, never were men more religious at heart than to-day; yet our churches are half empty, and the Church is no longer a power in the land. Why? For several reasons; here are just a few.

(1) The Church is dry-rotting with ecclesiasticism, that deadliest enemy of the religion of Christ now as in His own day. As the Kikuyu dispute, the present Reunion impasse, and the eternal squabbles of High and Low over sacraments amply prove, our real trouble is that we have lost all sense of Gospel values, and ecclesiastical values monopolize the field. What are the things the Church really cares for? Is it the righting of social wrongs and the battling to death with sin, error and injustice? No; if you want to rouse a Laodicean Church out of her lethargy and see her really "up and doing," touch her privileges, her endowments, her tithe, her traditions of men, her orders, her ecclesiastical autocracy. Which is the more distressing to her to-day, "the fact that four families are living in a five-roomed house, or the fact (so horrible to Father A.) that Mr. B. has no candles on his Holy Table, or the other fact (so terrible to Mr. B.) that Father A. has incense in his church and wears Popish vestments?" It is the silliness and unreality of all this that strikes the layman so forcibly and sickens him. The "real Christian thing" is lacking, and the values are all wrong. The Church comes first, the Kingdom next to nowhere. "Mint, anise and cummin" are all in all, while "judgment, mercy, and faith" are left out in the cold. Speak to-day on the lines of the Sermon on the Mount, and a "good churchman" curls the lip at such "milk and watery Morality Preaching!"

(2) Since the days of the Councils, or even of the Reformation, modern science, philosophy, scholarship, comparative religion, psychology, have given us a new and far deeper and truer knowledge of Nature, of the Bible, of God and man, and have effected a stupendous revolution in our ideas and outlook. Yet here we are as a Church still clinging to ideas and creeds and dogmas of the fourth and sixteenth centuries, which we have quite outgrown. Dare to call into question these obsolete Church-shibboleths, and you will be labeled a perjured man and a traitor. Just imagine a judge or doctor tied down in his practise to-day to what was thought and done in his profession in the first, fourth, or sixteenth century, forbidden to make even the slightest alteration to meet new light or new needs on pain of instant expulsion from his profession! As Froude pointed out long ago:

"To say that the clergy, who are set apart to study a particular subject, are to be the only persons unpermitted to have an independent opinion upon it, is like saying that lawyers must take no part in the amendment of the statute-book; that engineers must be silent upon mechanism; and if an improvement is wanted in the art of medicine, physicians may have nothing to do with it."

Adaptability to new environment is the law of life, and any institution that tries to remain stationary in a moving world is doomed. And are we to believe that the Holy Spirit has abdicated since the first, fourth, or sixteenth century, and is no longer here to guide into all truth?

This farce will go on so long as bishops insist on ordinands undergoing a uniform, stereotyped system of training in Theological Colleges whose intensely ecclesiastical atmosphere is uncongenial to thought, to freedom, to inquiry. There they are taught to magnify their office and that the difference between a priest and layman is a difference, not of degree, but of kind; there they learn to value as their highest treasure traditional views and practises, dogmas and rites, which have no kind of contact with the life of to-day, only with the outlook and controversies of a dead past; there they are supplied with a code of shibboleths by which to test the orthodoxy of others or of any man who desires, under their influence, to enter the Christian fellowship. These quaint old survivals are interesting to the antiquary, but hardly adapted to the work of the Kingdom.

(3) "The common people heard Christ gladly," and working men apparently formed nine-tenths of the Apostolic Church<sup>8</sup> (cf. 1 Cor. i, 26). To-day they seldom enter our half-empty churches. Why? Working men have left the Church because the Church first left them. For generations we, as a Church, have seen them sweated, badly housed, badly paid, badly fed. Did the Church stand up for the workingman and see his wrongs righted? Not she! She was too apathetic, too self-centered, too wedded to vested interests, or too afraid to speak, allowing herself to be exploited by the squire and the propertied classes. Now she is suddenly discovering that Labor is likely to be the dominant partner, so here we are all outbidding each other to curry favor with it, as if the workingman was not cute enough to see through it all.

(4 and 5) In the Apostolic Church converts flocked to the Church for two main reasons: (a) They saw that Church people were bigger men than non-Christians; "men took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus." Their simple, kindly, honest lives showed it; they were bigger men than their neighbors, more earnest, more charitable, more unselfish, more zealous for righteousness and the service of man. Can men say that of us Churchmen to-day? Is that the note of "good Churchmanship?"

(b) Another trait of early Christians which appealed greatly to outsiders was their intense brotherly love for one another: "See how these Christians love one another!" Do men say that of the Christian Churches to-day? Yes, with a sneer! In church we bemoan our "unhappy divisions" as "crippling the Body of Christ, hindering the activity of His Spirit," and doing untold harm to His work at home and in the mission field; yet here we are, as a Church, still Pharisaical, intractable, tart in our dealings with other Christian bodies which "follow not after us." We cannot blink the plain fact that their work, their ministry, their sacraments are blessed of God every whit as much as ours, yet we flatly refuse to give them the right hand of fellowship unless they submit to our terms and come into line with our episcopal machinery. James, Peter, Paul, Apollos, no more saw eye to eye than do to-day High, Low, Broad, Free; yet, when each saw the blessing of God resting on the other's work, he also saw that God needed them all equally, and each heartily gave the other the right hand of fellowship in "unity of spirit," that deep kinship between Spirit-possessed souls which transcends and makes light of all external barriers. "Good Churchmanship" to-day pooh-poohs such a bond of reunion. Nous avons change tout cela!

It may be urged: "Ah! but the Lambeth Conference resolutions, with their inspiring call to us all to clasp hands as fellow-workers with God in His work of the Kingdom, are going to 'create a new heart and renew a right spirit within us,' and set all these faults of ours right! I hope they may, but I am not over sanguine. Over and over again have imposing Church Assemblies passed high-sounding and admirable resolutions; we all applaud them to the echo, and go on just as before. 'My people love to have it so' is true of the Church of England to-day, and the shame of our futility rests on us all alike.

Is the Church ready to hate the blemishes that mar her spiritual growth and efficacy? Is she ready, in the spirit of Christ, to give herself heart and soul to the real work of the Kingdom, to face the real life, the real needs, the real aspirations of real men and women? If she is, she will once more "turn the world upside down," once more be the leader and inspirer of men, once more will she draw to herself "all men of good-will, all men and women who care for high and noble causes, all who are looking and longing and working for the coming of the Kingdom of God on earth."

The World of To-day

(Continued from page 198)

divisive nationalism. We are convinced that no question faces the people of God more crucial than this and we have thought it worth while to make this appeal in the hope that our conviction might be shared by the general body of the Church of Christ.

MISS ROYDEN ON THE PREVENTION OF WAR

The "Christian Register" of Boston this week prints an interview with Miss Maude Royden, the English woman preacher, who is spending two months in America. In answer to the question of her interviewer, Edward H. Cotton, as to what steps the Church might take to prevent war, Miss Royden shrewdly said: "The first duty of the Church is to get us out of this horrible slough, to get us on a firm foundation, where we may work out the peaceful solution. There are many people who loathe war, but can see no alternative. Let those who oppose the hope held out by the League of Nations find a better way. Let us be positive in our peace-making, and find an alternative to war. Our churches are much better at talking than doing. Our peacemakers are a cantankerous set. We must consent to work with all who are working for constructive peace." Miss Royden believes that the world needs the example of some strong nation actually laying down its arms and organizing for peace. To quote: "Two hundred years ago gentlemen would not go to an assembly of their fellow citizens without swords by their sides. To-day a gentleman does not need a sword by his side to vindicate his honor. But some man had to set the example. I have defended in England the attitude of America toward the League of Nations. Yet if America would consent to come in now she could dictate any changes she desired. Europe so much feels the need of her influence. Many of us are so pained at the turn taken by the League that we think America ought to come in, if only to dictate those changes." Strength to all who are saying such things.

Among the Refugees

By the Rev. W. A. Wigram, D.D.

POUR, at two days' notice, a mass of a million destitute refugees upon a poor country of some five million inhabitants; complicate that fact with the bewilderment incident to a great military disaster abroad, and a revolution at home, and it will be admitted that you have a problem the solution of which might tax the best of administrators—and that, by their own admission, the Greeks have no claim to be. "We are over-political," said a shrewd Greek observer to the writer once; "our men are too keen on political questions to manage them well. English slackness is an element in English political success." Whatever the reason, the fact is undoubted that, while Greek private ventures, whether economical or charitable, are often admirably managed, yet once let the government get control, and confusion, delay and corruption creep in without fail, so that the nation which has been the standing example for political historians in the past may yet present a lesson on the results of Socialism on human psychology to the modern world. Thus it may be understood that, when the flood of refugees began pouring into the country, those in authority were at once too busy and, we may add, too excited to take any effective measures at all as far as they were concerned. In fact, in the general confusion a Gilbertian touch was added to a situation that was melancholy enough generally when the news went round that the government had lost King Constantine's formal act of abdication!

Thus, though Greek authority was soon doing its best—and doing it most liberally—without regard to expense, it was doing it under a grievous handicap, laid upon it partly by circumstances and partly by the character of the Greek nation.

The Scene at Athens

Tens of thousands of families (barring, of course, the men who had been kept in captivity by Kemal) had been hurled on shipboard at Smyrna, everyone getting aboard as he or she could, and families being often scattered in two or three ships. Any refuge was acceptable, after days and nights of horror in the ring of flame on Smyrna quay, where each day the Turks searched the helpless for their valuables, and each night went to and fro among them with lanterns, searching for their girls. Then, after a hurried passage, the human cargo was landed on to the wharves of Piræus, while the ship turned round and went back for more. By the time that they were landed many refugees were, mercifully, past all feeling and caring, stunned for the time by the succession of strokes, they sat under such shelters as were provided, or often in the open streets, without moving. We had always thought that the author of Job exaggerated when he made the Patriarch and his friends "sit still for seven days and seven nights, neither said any word unto him, for his grief was very great." It is the mere fact, however, that, even after the comparative rest of the sea, many refugees sat thus for three days, scarcely stirring even to eat, in the dull coma of misery. For a fortnight they remained in the temporary shelter provided (great empty customs sheds with iron roofs and earthen floors) in the hot Athenian October. We must leave to the imagination the horror of such a place, where some two thousand people were gathered to live, eat and sleep, and where not the smallest facility for washing or any other sanitary measure was provided. It was in places like this that the English ladies were laboring, distributing food and such clothing as was available, with the help of Englishmen and a few Greek sailors, who preserved some order among the crowd. The destitution of the bulk of the people was absolute—Kemal's men had left them often but one garment apiece.

Gradually folk were moved into better surroundings, and separate camps or depots were formed, English and Americans each taking charge of one of the many organized. Gradually consciousness returned to the victims, and one saw the mothers and wives wandering from camp to camp seeking for news of their families—if, maybe, they had found shelter elsewhere in the storm.

This caused some trouble to those in control of "camps," who had, of course, to register those whom they were feeding. Kinsfolk naturally sought out kin, and wished to be with them in camp, and the fact complicated the camp organization, particularly when one camp was more popular than another.

The Demoralizing Effect of Charity

But what sort of accommodation is it that a decent Turk or Greek prefers to his own home under Turkish rule? Imagine the long sheds of an empty factory, with a glass roof and a stone floor; roasting hot by day, freezing cold at night, with damp ever rising from reclaimed ground that is below sea level. There little family groups huddle together, each in the chalk square marked out on the floor as their domain, fortunate if they have a few planks or a straw mat between them and the stones, or a blanket or two for the night chill. Some organization for cleanliness and sanitation has been forced upon them by camp authorities, and the government and foreign philanthropy combine to distribute a ration that is at least enough to sustain life—bread and good soup once or twice a day. "You must not make them too comfortable," was the advice of an American lady, with a hardness born of long experience. One would think that counsel was hardly needed, but the speaker knew her subject, for one of the most awful sides of the refugee status is the demoralizing effect it produces on all subject to it. It produces utter laziness and kills the self-help instinct, so that folk will sit in the comfortless surroundings of the camp and refuse even well-paid work when it is offered. "Where is the relief the papers say is coming from America," was the encouraging question of one refugee when offered a job; "have you got it?" Some sort of press-gang activity is needed to get even the most necessary camp work done, and an English lady who had spent a hard day distributing five hundred blankets to as many needy cases reported at the end that just one recipient had said "Thank you," and that one was a Turk! Verily, the Scriptural precedent was outdone for once.

Other Complications

Disease presently came in to complicate the whole problem, for smallpox and ophthalmia were the natural consequences of the conditions of life in the camps. Vaccination is no part of Turkish routine, and Athens is known as one of the most trying of towns for the eyes in all Europe.

The Greek government grappled with these plagues most skilfully, sending regular oculists to administer treatment to all sufferers, while vaccination was enforced by a rule that no person who did not show the "scratch" was allowed to receive the daily ration. Thus this danger was duly checked, and the feat is really a considerable one when it is remembered that the great mass of refugees are at that stage of mental evolution when a mother will instinctively hide the stricken child (keeping it in a box, for instance, in the middle of the family) rather than allow it to be isolated. Doctors of a cheerful mind meantime say that the smallpox is so small an evil that it is hardly worth complaining of (does not the Greek word for it mean "blessing?"), as we are pretty sure to have cholera, plague and typhus among us before the winter is done.

One other grim fact we must mention as evidence of what went on when Kemal's men worked their will on the inhabitants of Smyrna in the terrible days of ravage. There is hardly a young woman in the village who is not now expecting to be a mother as a result of personal maltreatment at the hands of the Turkish soldiers.

The Future

We have tried to put on paper what is now passing before our eyes in Athens, and our story has, no doubt, the defects and, we hope, the advantages also that come of special nearness to the facts. Now for the question of the future: What can be done with the great mass of refugees? Absorption in the population of the land may do much; but with the number we have to deal with that will not solve the whole question. To continue the metaphor, you speedily reach the saturation point. Hence the government order that every village in the land must receive a certain proportion of new inhabitants is no more than a palliative, though it has, we believe, been loyally accepted and acted on by a very hospitable peasantry. Some sort of general scheme of colonization and settlement on the land seems inevitable, and the question is, How can this best be done? the great scheme now ready for execution, viz., the draining and cultivation of the Struma valley, as designed by Sir John Jackson and Company, would certainly offer a means of disposal of an even greater number of workers on the land, supposing funds for its execution available, and such complications as "malignant malaria" duly dealt with. A terrible difficulty in this scheme lies in the fact that so great a proportion of the refugees are not only townsfolk, but women and children. All men of military age were detained by Kemal as prisoners, to labor as prisoners of war do in Turkey.

When one remembers the fate of the men of Kut (of whom seventy per cent. perished in Turkish hands), and one recalls the boast made by a Turkish officer to the writer, that in making a new railway "he had buried an Armenian under every sleeper of the line for a hundred miles," one wonders what proportion of those whom Kemal has detained will ever see their families again.

Meantime, something must be undertaken soon if it is to be effective. The season of the year is a factor in the problem of settling folk on the land; and the writer has some experience of how very long it takes, even under a British military administration, to move far smaller numbers across a roadless land to the homes marked out for them. Those responsible for the solution of the pressing problem might do well to remember the word of a British administrator in Mesopotamia when dealing with a like problem. "I will try to manage Joshua's job, and put these people in a promised land; remember, though, I have not got Joshua's powers. I cannot stop the sun."

THE POLITICAL MURDERS

The above communication (somewhat curtailed) we are allowed to print by the courtesy of the editor of the "Christian East," for which it was written, and in the next issue of which it will appear in full. Since its arrival a letter from Dr. Wigram has been received by a near relative, describing more recent events at Athens. The letter runs:

ATHENS, December 4.

MY DEAR ———:

We have at least had no occasion to complain of lack of incident this last week. I send you this letter in the "bag," and I send it in duplicate, for I understand that a censorship is in practice, though not proclaimed—in fact, all the papers appear with long white columns where the leading articles ought to be—and it may be that the copy of this letter next week will not get to you.

I told you last week that the "hot-heads" seemed to be getting control, and that folk might be afraid to fail to carry out their own threats on the six men of the Royalist Cabinet who were being tried. Now it seems that this was correct. The more moderate Republicans, who had welcomed Mr. Lindley's note as giving them an excuse for not proceeding to extremities, were forced to resign by the clique of younger officers who are, here as in Constantinople of old, the real power behind the throne. Others were put up, and the Revolutionary Tribunal that was trying the six Cabinet Ministers proceeded to pass sentence of death at seven o'clock one morning, and then—lest there should be interference—carried it into effect at 10.30 that same day. I understand that the King refused to sign it, and it was merely issued in his name.

The shock to the British colony has been very great, for naturally enough most of the senior members were personal friends of the condemned men. What the British government thought of it appears in the summary severance of relations. As for the grounds of the sentence, it is safe to say that nobody believes for a moment that the reasons stated are what the men were shot for. The said reasons are: (1) That the guilty men had offended the Entente by bringing back King Constantine (the little episode of the unanimous plebiscite is passed over in discreet silence); (2) that for two years they had been diligently employed in betraying the army and the country to the Turks.

That they bungled and failed in their policy in Asia is obvious, of course, but that there was the deliberate betrayal assumed is absurd—and if it were true of a whole Cabinet containing four ex-Premiers, what a condemnation of the whole nation! Hajinesti, the general—who may have been mad, but if so, had the awful clarity of insight and speech that a lunatic has at times—spoke out at his condemnation and told his judges outright that he knew that they were being shot as a measure of party politics, to make things sure for the Venizelists (so-called, for Venizelos himself strongly disapproves), and that the failure of their policy had given them the opportunity. "It is your hour now, but if you use it in this way, it will be our party's hour some day, too." The actual execution seems to have been horrible and clumsy. The families were informed of the sentence and told that they had two hours in which to get to the prison and have their last interview, and they, with Greek optimism, had been assuming that "they will never dare to touch my father; it will be a case of exile at the very most." Then the actual shooting was carried out by nervous men, and I believe that at least two volleys were needful in every case. One victim, Gounaris, was dying of typhoid and was carried in a chair to the place of execution. Finally, by way of outraging feelings yet more (for you know, I think, how much the funeral ceremonies mean to a Greek), the bodies were not handed over to the relatives, but huddled into a cart and hurried off to the cemetery in secret. Honestly, though, this was probably done to prevent the relatives from seeing their mangled state.

Mr. Lindley demanded his passports at once and left that same evening, leaving his family here to pack up and follow. The rest of the staff remain.

The whole thing has been an awful blunder. I say nothing of the crime, for in days when we have just seen the massacre of thousands, I am not going to pretend that I am specially moved by the murder of six. But what Greece wants, above all else, is unity, or a measure of it, underlying her political differences. This act has made that impossible, as far as one can see, by putting blood between the two great parties.

Meantime, things seem a bit better for English, at any rate in Constantinople, though I do not know that we are near to a real solution of the Christian problem there. However, English who have just come back from there speak of the changed attitude of the Turks. They had held that we were down and out, and saw, of course, that French and Italians were on their side. Hence, several ugly incidents in which English were maltreated. Then came the news that 35,000 men, fully equipped, had landed at Gallipoli, 150 warships appeared in the Bosphorus, and squadrons of planes hovered just over Constantinople. Followed, nearer home, the very wholesome lesson administered to a mob on Galata Bridge by the bare fists of the Irish Guards. (Forty Irishmen, trained boxers, were not given even side arms with a mob, but were allowed to hit with their fists. Hit they did, with the result that never was there so amazed a mob before, or one that ran more speedily.) Also, Sir H. Rumbold had up Rafet Pasha, in the presence of the French and Italian commissioners, and told him plainly that martial law and very drastic measures would follow if he went on with the line that (as Sir H. knew well enough) had been suggested to him by those very commissioners. "And I know that my colleagues fully agree with me in this. Do you not, gentlemen, both?" "Certainly, certainly," moaned the poor Frenchman and Italian, and this has had the natural result that now the Turk hates the French and despises the Italian, but has a wholesome fear of England generally, and Sir H. Rumbold more particularly. That is as it should be, and is as near virtue as a Turk is capable of coming.

Here I must stop for this week. Other events, such as the coming of the Bishop and the like, must wait for another letter.

W. A. W.

Is There Hope in the Factory?

By Professor H. A. Overstreet

Professor of Philosophy in the College of the City of New York

IN THREE PARTS.—PART I.

A RECENT year's leave of absence from college teaching gave me, quite unexpectedly, an opportunity that I had long desired to have. For more years than I care to mention, I had taught classes in matters social and ethical; and I had been particularly eager about the problems arising out of our industrial and business life. Like every good citizen whose eyes are at all open and whose sensibilities are at all alive, I had recognized in the economic conflicts some of the root evils of our life. Also, like many another good citizen, I had my solution for these evils—and taught them.

I blush now to think of those years. I was like a biologist teaching the "innards" of the crayfish without ever having come nearer to the creature than a text-book. That is, perhaps, a little exaggerated; for I had, indeed, "visited" factories now and then, "talked with" managers and salesmen, and of course with "working men." And I had watched strikes—from the outside. Also, I had "slummed" after the approved slumming fashion.

The year's leave gave me quite suddenly, and, for a college professor, quite breathlessly, the opportunity to stop all this looking in from without and to get at the whole thing from the inside. If I set down here some of the results of this valuable "laboratory" experience in industry, it is because I am woefully aware of my previous sins of omission and commission—sins of misunderstanding and therefore of misinterpretation; and because I feel that where I came short of intimate knowledge and made misjudgments, others too may have erred likewise.

The outcome of the entire year's experience within factories—mainly as a common worker incognito—was to give me a far more hopeful attitude toward our difficult industrial and economic problems. I still see grave economic evils, menacing the finer values in our life; but I see them no longer as hopeless evils, or as evils apprehended only by a few indignant spirits. I seemed to find within the industrial system itself forces already in movement making for a gradual approach to a more adequate scheme of human relationships. I seemed also to find that a good deal of the indignant idealism that berates Industry-as-it-is simply does not know what is happening in Industry-as-it-is. This indignant idealism has built up what Walter Lippmann calls a "stereotype" of a wretched system; and it still talks in terms of that stereotyped view, notwithstanding the fact that the industrial system has long since in many quarters moved beyond it.

The second outcome of the year's experience was a more vivid sense than before of the fact that no new economic system, however perfect, can be consummated at a stroke. The habits of people—and particularly the habits of workmen—change slowly; and for any more adequate system of economic life there must inevitably be slow and secure preparation. And here was the surprising thing that came to me, the discovery that preparation is now in many quarters in process. New types of industrial relationship are being tried out; new attitudes are being adopted; workers and managers and even owners of properties are beginning to think in new terms, to envisage new possibilities and to put into practice new experiments.

My experience in one sense was limited: I worked only in relatively high-grade factories. I did this for a reason. I was quite aware that there are "marginal" factories, where the conditions of barbarism still prevail, precisely as, in a society of decent people, there are thieves and murderers. What I was interested to find out, however, was not how badly factories could be run, but how well; for I reckoned that I should find in such factories whatever of hope there was for the future of our economic civilization. Again, my experience was limited in that I worked only in three factories; but I worked in them long enough and in enough different capacities to get more than a snapshot view of their inner life. I worked for three months in one large New England factory; for two months in a San Francisco machine shop; and for five months in a refinery on the Pacific coast. Added to this experience was the visiting of some twenty-odd factories across the continent and a final spurt of selling to foremen in some forty to fifty factories the privilege of educating themselves in the principles of their job. So I managed to get a fairly wide and intimate acquaintance with factory life both from the angle of the common worker and the executive.

I was hardly prepared for my first inside experience of factory life. I had come to think of the factory as the Great Abomination. I remembered Vaughan Moody's lines about "The Brute":

"Through his might men work their wills.
They have boweled out the hills
For food to keep him toiling in the cages they have wrought;
And they fling him hour by hour,
Limbs of men to give him power;
Brains of men to give him cunning; and for dainties to devour
Children's souls, the little worth; hearts of women cheaply bought;
He takes them and he breaks them, but he gives them scanty thought."

I was prepared for sombre tragedy. Some ten years ago I had gone through the living quarters in one of the great steel towns of Pennsylvania; and at that time the whole thing seemed miserably sordid, as unquestionably it was. When I secured my first job, therefore, I had my mind attuned for wretchedness. Imagine my surprise, then, at finding factory rooms full of laughing, joking girls. It did not seem right. The tragedy of their industrial lot should have been taken more seriously. And when I found the men, at the end of the day, streaming out of the gate, joshing each other and appearing not at all sullen and resentful, I felt that it was almost indecent. Shades of Euripides, where were the tears of things!

I am afraid I felt very much like the small girl who sent a dollar to the Johnstown Flood Relief Fund, inclosing this note: "I am sending a dollar for the relief of the sufferers. I hope that the suffering isn't over yet."

But ah! I thought, it is because these people are light-hearted Southerners: they are Tony Spinarelli and Mary Carducci. Wait until I see the American in industry, and the Scotchman. But when I found them, it was not greatly different. The American does not effervesce as does the Italian; but he has a way of going through his factory day spiritually uplifted by his own special brand of American humor. And the Scotchman has his Scotch. I began to let my sympathies run out elsewhere—to the servant girl penned off in a kitchen away from her kind; to the white collared clerk writing down figures in the polite hush of an office. These factory girls were living a life! Whatever one might say of the particular degree of its refinement (and one might say a good deal about that), it was, at least, interesting and vital. It was a life, I found, into which the average girl swung with a zest. The work was by no means exhausting, the rewards (in those days) were fairly ample; and she was given scope for the exercise of that power which has apparently been woman's most precious prerogative, the power of interminable gossip. Also for that other power of hers of daring irreverence. Think of a servant girl saying to her mistress: "Aw go chase yerself! My Gawd, if there ain't no baking powder, how can I bake? Go step on the gas!" The servant girl, I suspect, develops a yielding politeness which is partly timid, partly secretive. (Am I talking of days that are gone?) The factory girl gloriously unleashes the energies of her tongue; and woe be to the superior who wins her disrespect or her malice!

There was something huskily healthy, too, I found about the men. They worked hard; but they built up tissue. I sometimes have the feeling, when I walk into the male section of a department store, that I am witnessing the evolution of a neuter sex. Not so in the factory. There the men (particularly in the machine shops) were huskily male, rough-and-tumble, virile. They slapped into their work and slapped out of it with a push and a go that marked them far from being the spiritless, flattened out victims of the industrial Juggernaut.

This first experience was in a high grade factory run with decent respect for the human beings inhabiting it. I have since been in more or less intimate touch with several scores of factories, and I find that the experience was not wholly exceptional. It may remove the romance from industrial slumming; but I think it must be confessed that the days of sheer barbarism in industry are pretty nearly at an end. The industrial issue has become more refined. The problem is no longer that of making factory life barely tolerable—as in the nineties—but of making a tolerable life more interesting, secure and vital. To be sure, there are industries where the fight for sheer decency still prevails; but on the average, I seemed to find, management has come to realize that if it is to get the most out of its workmen, it must make the most of them.

I found, in short, as the economists would say, that in many quarters labor was being regarded no longer as a commodity, but as an investment. You nurse an investment; you look after its interests with sedulous care—because your interest depends upon it. With a commodity you do what you please.

I grant the "selfishness" of this view. Capital and management are still interested in profits. Labor is still a means to an end. But labor treated as an investment is, I take it, in a better state than treated as a commodity. Scope is given for the development of its human nature; and as that human nature develops, labor advances more surely toward the next stage, when it will be neither commodity nor investment, but co-operator.

Two contrasted experiences of mine will point to two very fundamental movements that are taking place in the factory. In one factory, after I had secured my job, I was sent directly to the department in which I was to work and told to take orders from one of the workmen. I was given the orders. But I needed more than orders. Being utterly raw, I needed instruction. My workman-master, however, was gifted with a large capacity for eloquent silence. Also, it seemed to me, that he was not at all happy at my intrusion. Whether he saw in my budding industrial intelligence a dangerous competitor to himself, or whether he was just naturally ornery, he at any rate made no large efforts to tell me how to do the things I was to do.

By a series of happy guesses and less happy blunders, I managed, after a while, to get some skill at my job; but I felt all the while not only that I was not wanted, but that there would be measurable satisfaction in one-quarter at least if I failed. Perhaps all that was good for my struggling soul. But it by no means increased my love for that factory.

In contrast to this experience was that in another factory, where, having been taken on, I was first placed for a full week (with pay) in an instructional class. There, under careful supervision, I was taught the rudiments of my job; so that when I finally emerged into the factory I was confidently "on my own." My entire feeling was different. I went into my work with the vim of an interested and already partly skilled craftsman.

Again, in the first factory mentioned, after I had been dropped into my department, I was literally dropped out of sight. The foreman who had hired me spoke no further word with me for weeks. Perhaps that, too, was good for the stiffening of my soul; but again, it by no means increased my tender feeling for that factory. Again, in contrast, was the treatment at another factory (not the second one above mentioned). There, on the third or fourth day, while I was manfully and perspiringly struggling to keep up the pace with an endless chain that, much to the amusement of the older hands, insisted upon devilishly eluding me, I heard my name called, and turned to face the Personal Manager.

"Well, old man, how is it coming?"

It was the littlest thing in the world; but when a man feels like a fool and an incompetent and a down and out, sometimes a very little thing acts like the biggest bracer in the world.

The Personal Manager had a sense of humor; and I had not quite lost mine; so for a few seconds we had quite a merry time over my awkward struggles.

After that the factory had me, body and soul! Here I was, an atom in the big industrial machine, and the Personal Department remembered I was there!

I give this not simply as a personal experience, but for what it signifies for labor management in general. We talk of the sulkiness of the worker, his lack of "loyalty," and all the rest. Workers are human beings. A word of appreciation; and they are all there! Left alone, unregarded, it is not to be wondered that their inherent humanness, their deep lying self-respect, makes them into resentful creatures.

The two significant movements in the better type of factories, then, are the movements (1) toward the adequate industrial education of the worker; (2) toward the establishment of relations of interest and respect between management and men. The first movement takes the form of preliminary instructional periods; "vestibule schools," in some cases "flying squadrons," whereby the younger men are given the chance to learn the industry in all its phases. This educational movement, I believe, is of profound moment for the future of the factory. It means that the factory has it in it to become something more than a place of slavish mechanical labor, a place, namely, of intelligent craftsman co-operation.

The second movement takes shape, in the main, through the organization of Personnel or Industrial Relations Departments. In the hands of a well-trained manager and staff such a department becomes the psychological center of the factory. It tests out the capacities of the men, assigns the square pegs to square holes, follows up the men in their daily work, organizes incentives, looks after promotions, keeps alive the recreational spirit, cares for the physical health of the operatives.

These new additions to the factory are perhaps the most significant sign that industry is passing beyond the purely mechanical into the psychological stage. At last management is looking beyond its cost sheets and its machines to its men and women. However, far short of millennium we still are, that, at least, is an advance.

Christianity in the Factory

By S. R. Rectanus

Director of Employment in the American Rolling Mills Company of Middletown, Ohio

[The following was given as an address before the recent annual meeting of the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.]

WE believe that all of our personal service work is the practical application of Christianity to industrial relations. This is a Christian civilization in which we live and work. Excepting for the practical application of Christianity this civilization would pass away. The Christian Church is, therefore, the foundation of our civilization and is charged with a great responsibility.

Our experiences during the past twenty-three years may be of interest to you because what we are doing is the result of the application of Christian principles to our business. These principles are fixed and unchanging, but our policies have to be formed and our plans have to be made to meet conditions as they change. We cannot renounce our principles, but we can and try to improve our practises. What we are doing is open to the world. Any fair-minded man can see for himself and decide whether he agrees or not. Please do not get the idea that we are holding ourselves up as an example. We realize that much improvement is possible and are working diligently to that end.

During the twenty-three years of operations by the American Rolling Mill Company we have never had a strike or any serious labor trouble. This might be due to accident, but we earnestly believe that it is the result of the way we do business. Sometimes our friends, hearing of disturbances in some other plant, try to hold our experience up as an example and ask why other people do not do business the way we do.

That is an unfortunate question. No two men or groups of men can do things in exactly the same way. They can agree on principles, but the application has to be made to suit the conditions. At different times, in different plants, we have to find different ways of securing the same results. The needs of the business, the conditions in the community, the nature of the product—these and other facts may change the way of doing things.

As an illustration of the application of our principles I am going to tell you very briefly of the work of our Personal Service Departments, for whatever interest it may hold for you. None of these activities was installed. They grew up gradually as we developed.

The business of the American Rolling Mill Company is to manufacture special grades of iron and steel sheets for use in making high grade finished products. The company was organized to undertake this business with the intention of creating a permanently profitable investment for its stockholders. We are frequently reminded by our officers of the reason for our corporate existence. It is surprisingly easy to lose sight of the forest on account of the trees. Each one busy with his work needs a frequent reminder that we are in business to produce more than we use—to make money—or we fail entirely and lose all opportunity to practise the things in which we so firmly believe.

The organizers of the company—and our original President and original Secretary still actively hold those places—the organizers believed that it was necessary to adopt and practise such policies as would bring about a condition of mutual confidence and sympathy between the management, the working organization, the customers, the stockholders, and the citizens of the communities in which its plants are located. As the organization grew larger it became necessary to subdivide the work and one group was made especially responsible for Personal Service. Realizing that our working organization consists of leaders, doers, upkeepers, and counsellors, it is the charge of the Personal Service Division to help us continually do those fundamentally sound things which will build up a contented, permanent organization of congenial workmen to whom work is a pleasure and extraordinary accomplishment all-consuming ambition. Our Vice-President and General Manager is likewise the head of this Personal Service Division.

The employment department is the reception committee. By personal visits through the plants and offices some member of the staff keeps himself informed of the needs of every department. The employment department can relieve every executive of a great burden by finding the right kind of men for him when men are scarce, by discouraging the wrong kind of men when jobs are scarce, and by assuming the burdensome details. It can even make the final arrangements and really employ the man, subject, of course, to reversal. But the employment department in our company cannot relieve any division manager or department superintendent or foreman of the responsibility of having the right kind of men in his department.

We generally have more applicants than vacancies. This is the logical result of the reputation which the organization has acquired and the fact that men in our employ urge their friends to join them. Occasionally, we have to solicit men to come with us, but this is generally the case only when extensive construction or expansion is undertaken.

Our efforts to develop scientific methods of selection have met with only a measure of success. Intelligence tests have been helpful to a certain extent. A part of our program is to try to make every one who enters the waiting room of our employment department feel at home. First impressions are usually lasting, and we have spared no pains to create the impression that Armco is a place where men like to work. Each applicant is given a private personal interview. He is allowed sufficient time and is encouraged to present his views fully, so that he will feel that he has had fair consideration. The fact that men are employed usually for only the minor positions, helps us in our selection, for it gives a chance to let us get acquainted with the man and him with us in a relatively short time. The responsibility for employing men includes their actual introduction, their transfers and promotions.

After we have helped him find a suitable place to live and make sure that he is properly and safely dressed, every new employee is given general information by personal instruction. We have no Book of Rules. An employment man conducts the new employee to his foreman, over the proper route, and personally presents him to the man under whose direction he is to work. We believe that a man should start in on his job in the right frame of mind, and the introduction to the foreman and to the work is, consequently carried out carefully, in the hope of giving the newcomer a demonstration of the company's policies and some knowledge of its business.

A foreman can discharge any of his men at any time for any reason he chooses. He is, of course, required to be able to justify such action. Most men dislike to "fire" any one, and since an unsatisfactory man can be sent to the employment department on a disposition order, very few men are discharged. No man leaves our employ finally until after he has had a talk with the employment department.

To be fully taken into the team a man must be with us for a year. On the anniversary of his employment his life is insured, under the provisions of our group insurance contract and he is considered an Armco man. Two-thirds of our men are married, and it seems worth while to reach with the man into his home and say, "Armco is interested—you are more than a hired hand—you are a friend."

A year's service is a real time of mutual probation. After that a salaried employee is eligible to participate in the Special Compensation Plan, under which a percentage of the net profits is distributed. Some of our employees are paid by the ton, but the majority are paid an hourly minimum rate which is supplemented by a bonus for production. We are interested in high production with a relatively few good men. It takes quality men to make quality product.

After a year of service our men are also eligible to subscribe for stock under the terms of the easy payment plans, which are organized from time to time. Other employees have bought stock on the open market and at least fifteen per cent. are now part owners of the business.

On the fifth anniversary of employment a gold service pin is issued with an appropriate expression of good-will. It is an Armco monogram with a pendant numeral. Every five years the emblem is redeemed by a payment of five dollars and a new one with the suitable pendant is presented. Forty per cent. of our employees have been with us five years or longer.

The medical department is responsible for the health of the organization. About six years ago everyone was given the privilege of free physical examination by a specialist. No one then in our employ was required to submit himself and everyone was assured that the interview with the doctor would be just as confidential as a private consultation. In other words, a man would not be discharged if he did not pass the test.

Each new employee is examined, not with the view of excluding the unfit, but to help decide where a man can best work. Re-examination is also encouraged. By this means many men have been warned of the approach of disease and are enabled to avoid it. We have a staff of full-time surgeons, physicians, and nurses who are provided with modern, well-equipped hospitals and dispensaries. Their work is to keep the man well. They do not conflict with the doctors in private practise, but will treat any employee for any malady as long as he is on the job. This treatment may be a simple curative or a prolonged course as the condition indicates.

Naturally we give full surgical and medical attention to men who may be injured. Every employee goes to the dispensary with every injury, no matter how slight. We have very few fatal or serious injuries, but many minor ones are treated.

The safety department is still working to improve our mechanical safeguards, but their principal endeavor is to impress the organization with an idea. That idea is that safe men do not get hurt. The best mechanical device can be taken off or disregarded, the most stringent rule can be broken. Many men are naturally careless or headless! They think it brave to take a chance. "Hurry up" usually makes confusion not speed. Patiently, persistently we are learning not to take a chance. Accidents do happen, but we can plan to prevent them. We are jealous of the reputation that this is a safe plant.

The training department does not confine its activities to classroom work. True, there are the evening classes, where technical instructions are given to help men do their job better, and the office apprentice course whereby stenographers and office assistants are helped by class exercises, and practical experience. The training department also has charge of the customers salesmen course and the general apprentices. Its Americanization classes have been very helpful to foreign-born men and women who want to become citizens. Foreigners as such are hard to find in our organization, although ten per cent. of our employees were born in countries other than the United States. In various ways different groups of Armco men are told what we make, how we make it, why we make it, and how our output is used. It may be the foreman's classes or the guides' course or an Armco products study that serves as a medium.

Thrift is encouraged because we are interested in building up a steady, prosperous group. A bank building was erected near the entrance to one of our plants. It is used by a local trust and savings institution as a branch. A representative of the bank is permitted to solicit savings accounts during working hours and the paymaster will make deposits by authorized deductions from wages.

The Armco bulletin, our plant publication, which is issued regularly, is another method of exchanging ideas and of passing out information.

The mutual interest department, through its visitors, keeps in touch with men who are absent from work. Not in a spying nor patronizing way, but as a friend. If a man is absent from work, without excuse he must need help, for Armco men are diligent. Maybe a little practical nursing, or some legal advice will be very helpful and prevent loss of income.

The visiting nurse takes a tiny bouquet to each new baby and offers her trained service if it is needed. Each marriage is the occasion of a modest present. Death brings an expression of sympathy and an offer of help. Not meddling, just friendliness.

If a new employee, who is a stranger in town, expresses a church preference when he is employed, the mutual interest department informs the minister of his denomination so that he may have an opportunity to welcome the newcomer. We have no biased opinions regarding form of worship, but the stranger within our gate is certainly worthy of personal consideration. For that reason we also keep in touch with housing and living conditions in town to help bring the new family to a home.

Although our belief is that cost of living depends largely on wages, we found the organization keenly interested in changes of living costs and through a committee of working men made and published a study which gave the desired information.

The Armco grocery store was opened to make the dollar in the pay envelope reach farther, and cafeterias are operated as a business convenience.

Social and athletic recreation as well as sickness insurance are provided by mutual benefit organizations. These are managed by the executives chosen by the membership and not by the company. In accordance with its fifty-fifty policy a contribution equal to the dues of the members is subscribed by the company.

The men who are of the company live in the city. The company has, therefore, been keenly interested in every agency in the city of a public or semi-public nature that has to do with the health, happiness and moral growth of the community. No opportunity has ever been overlooked to actively and generously support every movement that it believes to be in the interest of the citizenship. The Personal Service Departments supplement, but in no way duplicate nor compete with the public departments of the same or similar name. For instance, before the Middletown Recreation Association was organized, the American Rolling Mill Company furnished supervision and equipment for five public playgrounds. It did this because it felt that the need was very great for such wholesome, outdoor activities. When the Community Recreation Association was organized, the company turned over to this new public association this playground equipment and retired from a field that is generally conceded to be a public and not a private responsibility.

You will observe that no one of our Personal Service activities is essential to the conduct of the business. All of them are helpful if properly administered. Any of them is harmful if its purpose is misunderstood by the organization. Misunderstanding is doubtless one of our most fruitful sources of unhappiness. Confidence is based on understanding and respect. To make sure that we understand each other a method has grown up and is developing in the organization which is known at present as the Advisory Committees.

The functions of these committees are briefly described in the following quotation which has been printed and distributed to the organization: "Once a year elections are held in the several departments and at that time departmental advisory committees are elected by secret ballot from the organization. Each department committee has a chairman.

Every employee who has been in the continuous service of the company for one year is entitled to a vote and is eligible for election.

"The departmental advisory committees represent the employee in their department in an advisory capacity. It is their privilege and duty to take up with their department superintendent any matter that, in their opinion, is not being handled properly. It may be a question of production, of working conditions or a personal matter. The superintendent, likewise, may call upon the committee for advice or to give it, first hand, information that it should have.

"The general advisory committee is composed of all the departmental advisory committees and has for chairman the General Manager. This larger committee holds the same relation to the general management that the departmental committee does to the department.

"The functions of the general advisory committee may be stated thus: First—To advise with and learn the policies of the general management. Second—To convey to the employees an understanding of these policies and to reflect the sentiment of the employees on such matters as may be of help to the general management.

"The committees have no administrative, executive or legislative function."

Work has been the burden of my talk, labor has not been mentioned. Let me quote you from a message of our President, Mr. George M. Verity:

"Work—honest labor—is one of the noblest things in life. One who can feel that he is doing his fair share of the work of the world has good reason to be happy.

"No normal man can, however, be satisfied simply to work. He wants to work to some purpose and to accomplish the largest possible result, both for himself, his family and his associates. He wants to work effectively. There can be no real effective work without the inspiration of that thing called 'Spirit,' which is the main spring of accomplishment.

"It is for that reason that we have been so greatly interested in the development of real 'Armco Spirit.'

"This spirit is a comprehensive, vital force, which finds expression in the practical application of policies built on a platform of Christian principles, in which selfish purpose has no place. It is the spirit which makes for the brotherhood of man and the building of the highest type of Christian citizenship, which in turn produces an indestructible Republic."

Dr. Patton's Birthday

We join with the rest of the friends of Dr. Francis L. Patton in congratulating him on his eightieth birthday last month. Ex-president of Princeton University and of Princeton Seminary, Dr. Patton is also the oldest living ex-Moderator of the Presbyterian Church. He presided over the Pittsburgh General Assembly forty-five years ago. In the course of his response to the birthday greeting sent him by the present Moderator and Stated Clerk of the Church, Dr. Patton made an interesting comment on his own career. He wrote: "I often think that I might have accomplished more through the printed page than I have done." He goes on: "But I am more than satisfied on reflection to feel that though there will be next to nothing in a written form to keep me in remembrance, there lives in the minds of those to whom I have preached and lectured nothing but kind feelings toward me, and that, as their letters testify, I have in some cases at least been useful in my influence."

Community Chests and Merger Campaigns

By Ward W. Adair and W. R. Hopkins

[A strong tendency is developing toward raising money for the philanthropic organizations of a community by means of a "drive" in which they all unite, the "community chest" method. Is it permanently the best way of raising funds? This is a question on which people of good-will want light. Mr. Adair, of the Railroad Y. M. C. A. of New York, believes that it is not. Those who have taken part in Cleveland's great community chest campaigns heartily believe in it. We print Mr. Adair's article first, although it is in the negative, because Mr. Hopkins' account of the experience of Cleveland is an answer to Mr. Adair's argument. Mr. Adair is executive secretary of the railroad branches of the Y. M. C. A. in New York, and is editor of "Railroad Men," a monthly publication for the employees of the New York Central Lines. Mr. Adair knows whereof he speaks in the following article. He helped to conduct the first Red Cross drive for a hundred million dollars, and later managed the second Y. M. C. A. drive in the counties about Albany, New York.]

Mr. Hopkins is one of the leading citizens of Cleveland and has been actively interested in the Community Chest of that city. He is a man of affairs, and he believes the Community Chest to be the solution of money-raising for social agencies.]

THE SNARE OF THE COMMUNITY CHEST

AS the Community Chest idea moves eastward, it becomes a vital question with philanthropically disposed people who may soon be called upon to register either their approval or disapproval of a blanket plan of public beneficence. In the last seven years it has fallen to the lot of the writer to direct or assist in directing campaigns aggregating five million dollars, and for thirty years the raising of substantial funds for religious and social enterprises have constituted a definite portion of his work. This newest form of philanthropy is of interest alike to the giver and the solicitor. Does it rest on a solid foundation, or is it an ephemeral phase of public financing that is likely to wear itself out?

The first Community Chest known to history is briefly described in the fourth, fifth and sixth chapters of the Book of Acts. The essential facts are as follows: "They had all things common. . . . For as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them and brought the prices of the things that were sold and laid them down at the Apostle's feet; and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need. . . . And in those days there arose a murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews because their widows were neglected in the daily ministration."

There are many more references to the original Community Chest, but none more interesting than the thoroughly human touch, that, while all contributed, the disbursement was attended with racial and religious jealousy.

The argument for the Merger Campaign has been greatly weakened by the return of peace. The War Chest was justified by the exigencies of a world conflict, and by the necessity for a great outpouring of the country's wealth to take proper care of her enlisted men, both at home and in foreign lands. Greatly against the best judgment of many high officials in the Welfare Agencies concerned, President Wilson issued an edict which demanded "The United War Work Campaign." The present writer happened to be in the thick of that, as he had been in numerous Red Cross, Liberty Loan and Y. M. C. A. campaigns that preceded it, and it is betraying no secret to say that the interests of the successful agencies in war work were seriously compromised and menaced by the big merger campaign. Great injustice was done the organizations which had proven their ability to raise their funds and prosecute their work, by the inclusion through orders from the White House, of various other organizations which had neither proven their ability to do war work nor to raise their own funds. That particular Merger Campaign forced support for institutions that afterwards signally failed to show that they deserved it, in proof of which stand the Government figures showing that while the largest of these organizations operated its work at the rate of fourteen thousand dollars per hut, another reported the amazing total cost of fifty-two thousand dollars per hut! Except for the Merger Campaign, no such financial abuse would ever have been possible.

The question now arises whether there is adequate justification for the merger campaign in times of peace. The underlying idea of it is unquestionably a holdover from the war. During those days of stress and struggle, there was notable unselfishness on the part of many expert directors of campaigns, but there were others who watched those great financial operations narrowly, and saw in them opportunities for private aggrandizement. If the fundamental notion of the War Chest could be carried over into times of peace, would there not be numerous attractive berths, at liberal salaries, for men who succeeded in getting certain cities to adopt the plan? To be the Executive Secretary of a Community Chest, fraternizing with the wealthy and prominent citizens, and wielding a position of influence, presents an appeal not likely to be lightly dismissed by the type of individual whose eye is ever upon the main chance.

The most pronounced opponent of the Community Chest is compelled to admit the plausibility of its well-known arguments. That people of philanthropic mind are harassed and annoyed by the multiplicity of appeals, is readily granted. But it is noteworthy that although their patience may have been tried at times, the idea of the Community Chest is not generally born in the minds of the leading givers, but rather in the fertile brain of an outsider who comes in to remind them of their annoyance and a way out. Will the expert giving this kindly advise later become the Executive Secretary of the Chest? Stranger things have happened.

That philanthropy is very poorly developed in the average city and that the burden falls upon relatively few, is another convincing fact. A comparatively small list of names becomes familiar to financial campaigners, and, following the lines of least resistance, they wear the word "Welcome" completely off the door-mats of those whose liberality is a matter of common knowledge. That there are hundreds, and possibly thousands of additional names readily available is a fact often overlooked by the campaigners, who have a big task to accomplish in a short time, and, who are therefore not inclined to dig up new prospects. For this reason philanthropy is badly distributed in the average community, and this fact affords a cogent argument for broadening out.

Another big thing that the Community Chest does is to afford a more or less efficient check on extravagance. An attempt is made to standardize budgets, but it will be instantly seen that this is an extremely difficult task. Standardizing the expenditures of totally divergent societies recalls the story of the Civil War veteran who sat on the curbstone displaying a placard, which read, "Help a Veteran of the Civil War! Wounded Five Times—Wife One—Children Seven—Total Thirteen." One of the first duties of the old-fashioned school teacher was to impress upon her juveniles the impossibility of adding three lead pencils and two apples. It is almost impossible to reduce to a common denominator, organizations whose work is as dissimilar as lead pencils and apples.

Before we go far into the Community Chest question we encounter the fact that religion and philanthropy are almost inseparably interwoven. Abou Ben Adhem blustered considerably, in Leigh Hunt's poem, about his small love for God, and his surpassing love for his fellow men, but we do not recall that anyone corroborated his claim. It is more than likely that the reason his name "led all the rest" was that the list was made out alphabetically. Certain statisticians have gone so far as to say that more than eighty per cent. of the philanthropy of the average community comes from those who are believers in and supporters of religion.

Reverting again to those days of the original Community Chest, it will be recalled that a certain lame beggar was carried daily by friends to a strategic spot for the plying of his trade. It is significant that they did not seek out the resort of unbelievers, nor follow the unstatesmanlike tactics of Lazarus, who laid himself down at the gate of the hard-hearted Dives. No, these shrewd compatriots of the lame beggar "laid him daily at the gate of the Temple which is called Beautiful, to ask alms of them which entered into the Temple." There is something about religion and philanthropy that makes them go well in double harness. Kindness, compassion and sympathy are more naturally expected among religious people than among those who give no thought to such things. Unselfish service has long had its inspiration in religion. In the light of these facts it is interesting to note that the trend of the Community Chest is toward the social rather than toward the religious. Not only is this attitude a grave peril to all future philanthropy, but it is a fundamental mistake. Let any community measure the effectiveness of purely social organizations against those whose primary motive is religious, and it will not take long to discover which type of organization makes the most important contribution to community welfare. It were well to move slowly in magnifying "social effort" and minimizing those organizations whose vitality has survived the passing of countless social movements, and whose deep religious motive has made them a constant power for good over a long stretch of years. There is no gainsaying the fact that the Community Chest is one of numerous influences at work at the present time to "put the soft pedal on religion."

It will readily be seen that this important phase of the merger drive can hardly fail in a few years seriously to impair the hold of religious organizations upon their clientele. It has been their habit to come before their supporters, in anniversary gatherings and the like, bringing their sheaves with them, and enthusing those who have supported them with stories of the results achieved. What will become of such gatherings in cities where the constituencies of such organizations have lost their identity through being compelled to give to a chest instead of to an organization? It requires little of the prophetic gift to foresee the result.

The impelling motive of philanthropy is interest in and devotion to a cause. "That appeals to me," is a common remark of givers when approached by solicitors for a really deserving cause. This raises an interesting question of how long philanthropy can survive without such a motive. The appeal in, "Give to the chest and get rid of callers," is so utterly selfish and sordid that no philanthropy can be perpetuated upon such a slogan. It is worthy of note that the Community Chest has had no adequate test as yet. It is a new broom and may sweep fairly clean for a time. Has it that underlying vitality that makes for permanence? Has it that challenge to unselfishness and devotion that has built up the modern list of public contributors? Has it the genius to discover and enlist their successors?

Then, too, there is something to be said on the other side of that seductive suggestion, "Only one appeal a year." In the opinion of the writer, nothing more lamentable could happen, in the realm of liberality, than to allow business men to be called upon for gifts only once in twelve months. The prosperous business man should be kept posted about the great work for the public betterment in his community, in which other men and women are investing their time and talents. He should be frequently confronted with the fact that it is his duty, as well as his privilege, to put in his money against their lives. If one man, whose chances for business success are equal to those of another, elects to forego the making of money in order that he may serve his fellow men, it is certainly no more than fair that the other should give out of his prosperity to the support of such work. Men should not be encouraged in the selfish idea of "getting rid of an appeal." The best thing to keep a business man's wells of sympathy from drying up is to afford him opportunities for becoming interested in the betterment of others. The beneficial reaction upon a giver when he makes an investment in other people, makes for the development of kindness and the broadening of sympathy.

The "tired business man" is not so tired as he is painted on the melodramatic stage. The average leader in a big commercial enterprise would not thank you for applying the adjective "tired" to him. His time is well ordered and he works with far less friction than smaller men. He has time to see an occasional caller, who is seeking support for some good work, and he owes it to himself to devote the time necessary. There is no greater fallacy than the overworked expression, "I have so many calls for subscriptions!" Dr. John Henry Jowett sagely remarked, "Some people are always confusing the number of appeals made to them with the number to which they respond favorably." Very true. A man can easily fool himself at this juncture and arouse a great self-pity that has no foundation in fact. A veteran solicitor once replied to a gentleman, who made this hackneyed excuse, "Well, my friend, if the other appeals haven't made you any poorer than ours has, you are just as well off as you were before they were made."

One of the most stubborn arguments used by the opponents of the Community Chest is that it is wrong in principle. They contend that it penalizes the strong and successful agencies by destroying their initiative, and by capitalizing their good name and standing for the benefit of other organizations, thus enabling weak and untried agencies to be carried along by the stronger and tested organizations, instead of developing on merit their own constituencies. They contend further that it virtually destroys the option of the giver, that while he may declare his preference for certain organizations when he makes his contribution, the fact remains the various community causes, those in which he believes and those in which he does not believe, alike draw their sustenance from the common treasury to which he contributes. They contend that it divorces an individual organization from its contributing friends, making almost impossible the expansion of further development of its clientele, thus confining such an organization within its present limits and making future expansion difficult, if not impossible.

Those who have had long experience in the cultivation and development of a list of benefactors, see a tendency in the Community Chest to deaden enthusiasm and spontaneity in giving, and to reduce civic generosity to something about as impersonal as ordinary municipal affairs. They see in the idea the certain decay of loyalty and devotion, and firmly believe that in time the chest will be looked upon in much the same light as the paying of taxes. The spirit of criticism, rather than that of intelligent, sympathetic interest, is likely to be the result. They further believe that they see a grave danger of political, sectarian, or social pull and domination in the administration of the public beneficence.

The Community Chest idea is likely to act as a deterrent of incentive. Certain organizations have enlisted and held their financial support largely upon the showing they were able to make in the direction of self-sustenance. Philanthropically-minded men, were generally inclined to help those who showed a disposition to help themselves. If a self-respecting membership of an organization, in business for the public weal, paid ninety per cent. of its expenses, it was not difficult to find a constituency willing to make up the remaining ten per cent. The impersonal Community Chest, however, cannot administer its affairs upon the meritorious record of participating organizations in the direction of self-support, else they would be forced to drop a considerable number of welfare agencies who have never developed a body of paying members in the idea of helping themselves. In the nature of the case many organizations cannot develop such a paying membership. As long as the Community Chest continues, the deserving and the undeserving must feed from the same trough.

Another consideration that is by no means unimportant, is that in the event of failure to attain the financial goal, a pro rata reduction of the budgets of participating organizations is the only apparent remedy. This means that a strong and deserving organization, that might of its own initiative, have raised its full proportion must nevertheless cut its staff and program in the same proportion that is required of the other organizations helped by the common fund. Thus it will be seen that all the organizations, both strong and weak, are deprived of the power of initiative and become common sufferers in the failure of the chest. Naturally the organizations that have been accustomed to raise their budgets without trouble in the day of their independence, feel that such a hardship is unnecessary and unjust.

Perhaps the most undesirable tendency seen in the Community Chest is the elimination of the personal element from the gift. To those who have sought beneficence for public institutions through a term of years, this personal touch has been invaluable. When the going has been hard, the workers have often been cheered by a heartening word spoken by some man or woman, who, while possibly not able to give a large amount, lightened the labor by their co-operative and interested spirit. A cheering word in commendation of work well performed has often been the song on the march and the battle cry on the charge.

The gift without the giver, on the other hand, is like the song without the singer, or the oration without the magnetic speaker. There is too great a tendency in our American life "to say it with a check book." "We seek not yours, but you" said one of the wisest and most adroit financial solicitors of early Christendom. Ten dollars, and a heart interest in the cause, means far more in the long run than one hundred dollars from some abstract and impersonal source.

The world is forever making the mistake that humiliated the prophet Elisha. A busy man was he, facing a multiplicity of demands upon his valuable time. He delegated to Gahazi, therefore, a task that was by every right his own. "Take my staff and lay it upon the face of the child," was the prophet's order. It would be mighty convenient if he could be saved that long walk and let the magic staff do his work. We are quite prepared for the sequel. "Gahazi passed on before them and laid the staff upon the face of the child, but there was neither voice nor hearing. Wherefore he went again to meet him, and told him, saying, 'The child is not awaked.'" The peril of the impersonal threatens the whole fabric of unselfish service. Doing everything through an agent is an American tendency that needs to be speedily corrected. The gift and the giver should go together. The inclination to eliminate "bother" is one against which we should be on our guard, both for our own sake and for the sake of others.

In a public address a few days ago, one of Yale's leading educators declared his life policy in these impressive words: "Every interruption is an opportunity. 'No man knocks on my door who is not sent of God.'" His platform is worthy the prayerful pondering of every man who is in a position to help forward the world's work.

WARD W. ADAIR.

CLEVELAND'S COMMUNITY CHEST

CLEVELAND, pioneer daughter of Connecticut, laid out by the Connecticut Land Company in 1796 to be the principal city of New Connecticut, has always been hospitable to talent and ideas, and generally quick to respond to any call upon its generosity. She seems always to have had citizens who were ready to recognize and support merit in men and measures, whether that merit consisted of personal talent, feasible plans, or the public good. Her own pioneer origin made her hospitable and her highest honors have been freely bestowed upon worthy men regardless of their origin. She has, therefore, naturally attracted people from many parts of our own country and from most parts of the world. Her percentage of people born in foreign countries or born of foreign parents is very high. The diversity of her population and her industries naturally created many needs for philanthropy and charity, most of which have been met by private organizations and institutions.

During the twenty years prior to the entry of this country into the World War steady progress had been made in the matter of securing co-operation by all of the charitable and philanthropic organizations of the city. The Jewish charities had already been working together in the Jewish Federation of Charities. The other charities had united in forming the Welfare Federation of Cleveland, and these two organizations had co-operated with each other and with the city's Department of Public Welfare. But this co-operation did not include any general solicitation of funds by either of the federations. Each organization still secured its financial support in its own way and as best it could. In the effort to secure such support there were naturally many conflicts and much confusion in the public mind as to the respective merits of the various organizations. There seemed to be an endless and bewildering procession of drives, tag days and other schemes of raising money, with the net result that the great bulk of all contributions to all such organizations came from a discouragingly small number of people.

When the Government launched the first Red Cross drive in 1917 Cleveland was called upon for two million five hundred thousand dollars, and the two federations co-operated actively in helping to form and operate the Red Cross organization for that campaign, with the result that four million eight hundred thousand dollars was raised.

When the call went out from the National War Council, in November, 1917, for a million dollars for the two Y's and the War Camp Community Service practically the same organization raised one million three hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

In the spring of 1918 all of the organizations which had been engaged in the two previous drives were combined in the Cleveland War Council to conduct the Victory Chest drive in May, 1918, and raised more than ten million dollars in response to a call for six million dollars.

This combination of organized effort had secured contributions of more than sixteen million dollars in three drives in which Cleveland's quota was only nine million dollars. But the surprising financial results were even less remarkable than the revelation of community interest in united effort in a good cause. A new basis had been found for community spirit and effort.

It was not strange, therefore, that our leaders in charitable and philanthropic work saw the possibilities of this splendid organization as an agency for raising the funds required for carrying on their activities. Early in 1919 the Cleveland War Council, the Welfare Federation of Cleveland and the Federation of Jewish Charities united to form the Cleveland Community Fund to raise all of the funds required for the various agencies in the two federations.

Just as the Victory Chest had been made a vehicle through which every member of the community could make his contribution, however, small, to all of the services designed to minister to the men and women in the service of our country, so the Community Chest was designed to be the vehicle through which every member of the community could share in the work of every one of the established institutions of the city devoted to charity and philanthropy.

The Community Fund was the natural outgrowth of years of effort to bring all of our charities and philanthropic organizations into harmonious relations, plus the development during the war of a single money-raising organization which had learned to make a universal appeal with irresistible force. There was only one difference in the two appeals: one called upon every member of the community to be generous for his country's sake, the other asked him to be generous for the sake of his city and humanity. In each case the appeal was put upon a plane so broad and high that no self-respecting person should be able to ignore it.

The question was, Would it work? Would an organization and methods which had succeeded during the war through an appeal to patriotism also succeed in time of peace with only a local appeal to private generosity?

Here are some of the answers:

The first Community Fund drive in November, 1919, was for $3,425,000. The complete organization and system perfected during the war drives was used, so that every possible contributor would be reached promptly and personally. As nearly as such a thing could be, the organization was perfect in method, spirit and energy.

The response was amazing in its eagerness and volume. The few thousands who had formerly carried the principal burden of the city's charities and philanthropies suddenly found themselves reinforced by scores of thousands of new givers. A new idea had been brought home to every person in the city. Here was a way to give everybody a chance to help to do things which everybody had always wanted to see done, but which most people had never helped to do. The community had been asked for $3,425,000 and had given more than five million dollars through the gifts of 148,324 people.

But that was all made possible by the war. People were still feeling its strong and generous emotions. How would it be afterwards? This question was anxiously asked and only Time could answer.

We are now four years away from that first Community Fund drive, and there have been four drives. Here are some of the answers Time has given in the four years:

The second and third drives in 1920 and 1921 came at a time of deep industrial depression, but the number of contributors increased in 1920 to 233,984, who gave $4,364,848.50, and in 1921 the number was further increased to 310,254, who gave $3,818,853.03, which was $45,844 more than was asked for.

In 1922, 383,960 persons pledged $4,300,000 for 1923, among whom were 171,243 school children and 156,000 employees in offices, stores and factories. This means that more than forty per cent. of the entire population of the city contributed to the Fund for 1923.

The budget for the year 1920 included seventy-seven institutions; the one for 1923 includes 116 institutions. Each successive drive has commanded more hearty and general support. Opposition and misgivings have apparently disappeared and the merit of the plan seems completely demonstrated.

So much for the plan as a means of raising money. What about the results in the institutions receiving it?

The first result was to reduce the cost of raising money from about fifteen per cent. to about two per cent., thereby increasing the value of the contributions directly by this difference in cost.

The second result was to relieve the personnel of these institutions from the burden of collecting money, and so leaving them free to devote all of their energies to their proper work. This concentration of energies upon the real purposes of the institutions has not only increased their efficiency, but the fear that there would be a loss of interest in their work by reason of the fact that each institution no longer made its direct appeal to the public for miscellaneous contributions seems to be without foundation. It should be borne in mind that the Fund is not designed to interfere in any way with contributions to any institution by persons specially interested in its work, but only to take care of general public solicitation of funds.

Another result is the elimination of contention and competition between the institutions in the matter of raising money.

Still another result is to secure for each institution the business and technical assistance of the central organization and the interest of the entire community in it as a community agency. Most people were unaware of the existence of many of these institutions until they saw their names in the budgets and reports of the Community Fund.

It is not too much to say that every organization included in the Community Fund budget has gained in dignity, power and public esteem by reason of that connection. If the plan has any evil effects upon the institutions helped by it they do not yet appear.

What about the effect upon the beneficiaries of these institutions?

For one thing, Cleveland has had no bread line nor soup kitchen since the Community Fund was established, although a considerable part of the time found our industries profoundly depressed and unemployment general. The city's charitable and philanthropic institutions have functioned more perfectly than ever before, and people familiar with the situation would undoubtedly endorse the following statements which appear in the campaign book of 1921:

"There is no age, from the cradle to the grave, where the Community Fund does not function as a protective, ministering agency."

"Cleveland's Community Fund . . . takes care of eighty per cent. of the hospital work, seventy-three per cent. of the citizenship and recreation work, sixty-two per cent. of the relief work, and eighty-three per cent. of the organized child-care work that is done in the city."

"Practically every worthy organization which is on a permanent basis, regardless of religious, racial or other affiliations, co-operates and participates in the Community Fund. Every agency which is supported by the Community Fund submits its books to monthly audit and makes financial statements each month to the central office in the Electric Building. There is no solicitation of funds for operating expenses at any time during the year by the agencies in the Community Fund. This is all taken care of during the one big annual campaign. No solicitor for Community Fund is paid a commission for his work. Hundreds of workers are now in the field in Cleveland, giving their time, their energy, their services, because they believe in the Community Fund, and because they realize the impossibility of any man's shirking his community responsibility."

What has the plan done for the community as a whole?

It has developed a new sense of the obligation of the community as a whole to provide for the relief of suffering and to put behind every worthy public philanthropic agency the voluntary financial support of every member of the community.

It has given a new and broad field for the development of co-operation by every element of the community; it has given rise to a new sense of civic unity and pride in good works.

It contains the promise of a steady growth in power to co-operate along other lines for the public good.

In a city long notable for its generous attitude toward merit in people and ideas, it has made possible the most generous activities in our city's history.

Should the Cleveland Community Fund plan be adopted generally?

No plan is inherently so good as to be universally applicable. No plan can work itself. The results of any plan will depend upon the people trying to use it and the conditions to be met.

The success of the plan in Cleveland is largely due to the fact that it was the natural and logical result of the work of many years toward such an end. But, even so, we may well doubt whether the Community Chest would have been a success without the leadership of Samuel Mather, aided by an exceptional group of lieutenants headed by Charles E. Adams and Fred W. Ramsey. Mr. Mather brought to the leadership of this campaign great personal prestige and influence. Himself long the city's most generous and unobtrusive giver to many good causes, truly and effectively devoted to the public good, his leadership of the movement commanded public confidence and his personal example stimulated generous emulation. This leadership we shall not always have, but we trust that it has already sufficed to put upon a permanent basis the Cleveland Community Fund.

W. R. HOPKINS.

Foreign Correspondence Department

Conference of the Canadian Student Christian Movement

By J. LOVELL MURRAY

THE Conference of the Student Christian Movement of Canada, which was held in Toronto during the Christmas vacation, was of such significance for the religious life of Canada and so symptomatic of the mood and mind of Canadian youth to-day that it seems to warrant more than a passing mention to American readers who are interested in developments across the border.

The gathering commanded attention in Canada for several reasons. It was the first National Conference of the Student Christian Movement which was organized a year and a half previously, superseding in a general way the national organization of the Student Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. of Canada. The Movement is still in process of finding itself and the national conference was regarded as a long step in that process, and also as a visualization of the spirit and aims of the new organization, about which there has been much difference of opinion throughout Canada. The meeting, which was attended by 549 delegates, was representative of all parts of the Dominion and gave the best opportunity up to date to size up the new Movement.

The personnel of the gathering also compelled notice. The carefully chosen delegates were keen, self-reliant, talented types of Canadian youth. In their number were representatives of many forms of religious opinion, including not only Protestant evangelical Christians, but Roman Catholics, Unitarians and Christian Scientists. There were present also representatives of other nations, including India, China, Korea, Japan, Africa, the West Indies, Great Britain, seven countries of continental Europe, and of course the United States.

The platform merited attention because of the distinguished speakers of the Conference, because of the wide range of themes under consideration, and because of the large share of student participation in the discussions—and be it said that that participation was on a high level, of quick, straight thinking, and of able utterance. This, indeed, was one of the most characteristic things about the Conference. Students served as presiding officers at all the sessions. Question and answer followed each of the stated addresses in the forenoon sessions, while in the evening sessions and the meetings which were arranged for the afternoons delegates had the floor almost entirely to themselves. It was a student conference with a vengeance, and the delegates, both men and women, opened their minds to one another with the greatest freedom.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of the Conference was the strikingly broad basis on which it was projected. It dealt with the issues of student life (including a session devoted to Students and Religion), and also with such national questions as New Canadians, presented by Principal E. H. Oliver, of Saskatchewan; the rural situation in Canada, by Premier E. C. Drury of Ontario; the Anglo-French question, by Senator Belcourt of Quebec, and the new industrial situation, by Prof. R. M. MacIver of the University of Toronto. It took account also of conditions in other lands as they were set forth in one session by an able group of Asiatics and an equally able African, while later in the Conference the question of Canada's international responsibility was dealt with by Hon. H. W. Rowell, K.C., one of Canada's foremost statesmen. The world brotherhood of students was not forgotten. The work of the World Student Christian Federation was surveyed by Dr. John R. Mott; the pitiable conditions of the student classes of Europe were portrayed by a relief worker so convincingly that over $1,800 was subscribed on the spot, and the Conference found time to listen sympathetically to a Berlin student as he told of the Youth Movement in Germany.

The Conference was broad, too, in its open-mindedness. It did not purport to be a distinctly Christian conference. It was, rather, inductively Christian. It started with a clean slate, so far as religious presuppositions were concerned—if such a thing is possible. It was not a gathering of experts, nor was it held in the interests of any propaganda or crusade; but it was a meeting of representative students, immature, perhaps, but earnest, to think out together the meaning of religion for them and its implications for the life of the world to-day. Men and women of all shades of Christian belief, Jews, Mohammedans, and some of no classified belief, shared the floor without privilege or prejudice. The voices of tradition and authority were conspicuously silent. But parallel with the discussion of problems there ran a chain of daily addresses by Dr. Herbert Gray, of Glasgow, in which the claims of Jesus Christ and the nature of His Kingdom were powerfully and winsomely set forth. A period for intercession was set apart each day. Doubtless it was the expectation of the promoters of the Conference that as the problems affecting community, national and international life were analyzed and interpreted by experts and discussed by the delegates it would appear in the end that only the spirit and precepts of Jesus would afford the necessary solutions. Thus the Conference would emerge as truly Christian. There can be no doubt that this expectation was in part fulfilled. At any rate, it was most interesting to observe these two lines of thought, cumulative and more or less converging, carried on side by side in one program.

Indeed, breadth, the breadth of tolerance, of world interest, and of open-mindedness was the keynote of the Conference. This was for many the mark and measure of its success. They claim that this feature of the proceedings was a reflection of the present temper and viewpoint of Canadian youth, at least of Canadian college youth. A gathering, they contend, that is not frank, courageous, open-minded, tolerant, untrammelled in its search for truth would be out of joint with the times, so far as youth is concerned. They insist that in such a fearless facing of the facts of our life to-day, and in their implications for high ideals of character and service, the Conference was aiming at spiritual reality rather than pious sentimentality. A prominent Toronto clergyman found the Conference to be indicative of "a religious renaissance among the students of the world," which he regards as "nothing less than the outburst of a new Christianity, which is at the same time just the flowering of the oldest Christianity, the Christianity of Jesus."

Others again, both before and since the Conference, have had their misgivings, and in their number are many who would not be classed as fundamentalists, but as quite liberal thinkers. They felt that a greater degree of courageous frankness would have enthroned Jesus Christ more explicitly, and that the wind was tempered too much to the unbelieving. They missed the positive note of conviction, except in Dr. Gray's address. They wondered why the mystical side of religion was so largely ignored. They thought it significant that the Conference neither opened nor closed with prayer, and that prayer did not figure at all in most of the sessions; that the Church came in for criticism, but for little commendation; that in the forum on Students and Religion many of the testimonies were groping, inconclusive or agnostic, while only a few, and notably a Korean, spoke out with the clear ring of an experimental knowledge of Jesus Christ; and that just before the closing session the Conference went into a serious and prolonged debate as to whether the word "Christian" should not be deleted from the name of the Movement. They felt that the Conference, as a whole, represented a very diluted sort of Christianity, and that it ended with an interrogation mark instead of a triumphant exclamation point. And they fear that if the Movement is like its Conference it is without chart or compass, and knows neither its direction nor its goal.

Two of the most prominent visitors from outside of Canada were heard to say after the Conference that they were not sure yet whether it was really a Student Christian Conference or simply a student conference.

No one could be present at the sessions, however, without feeling that the Student Christian Movement is in Canada to stay; that it has immense possibilities; that it has a tremendous hold on the affections and allegiance of a host of students, and that the Conference was at once a most interesting experiment and a disclosure of such courageous thinking, such dynamic energy, such sturdy, forward-looking idealism, and such conspicuous ability among the Christian students of Canada as to fill one with hope for the future of the Church and the Nation. And as for the movement which found objectivity in the gathering and which will unquestionably remain as a Christian movement, its future rests with the type of leadership under which in the next few years it will move forward into the vast areas of opportunity that lie open before it.

---

Robert Bruere, the other day, told a group of Christian people how he longed to come into the Church, but that at the door of the Church he found the demand that he believe in some things which he did not understand. "If," he said in substance, "I saw that belief in these things made men more able in radiant leadership, I might pray that I might accept them, too. But I do not see that they do. All too often your belief is lip service. You do not believe them any more than I do."

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

The Best I Remember*

THIS is one of the most delightful books we have read in ages. Mr. Porritt, one of the outstanding English journalists, has been on the editorial staff of the "Christian World," of London, for several years, but before that was connected with the "Manchester Guardian" and several of the daily papers. He was parliamentary reporter for awhile and not only wrote letters to the "Manchester Guardian" and other papers, but was sent by these papers all over England and Scotland to various conferences and, of course, was continually interviewing the most distinguished men of Great Britain. Mr. Porritt was of a very friendly disposition and soon became on intimate terms with the great in every walk of life. Of course his years on the editorial staff of the "Christian World" have brought him into continual contact with the leading churchmen of the last twenty-five years. This book, "The Best I Remember" is an informal, chatty, delightful series of recollections of these various men. Chapters are given to Dr. Guinness Rogers, C. Sylvester Horne, W. T. Stead, Hugh Price Hughes, Joseph Parker, Newman Hall, Dr. Clifford, Dr. Jowett, Dr. Orchard, Dr. Campbell, Dr. Forsyth, Dr. Fairbairn; nearly every outstanding preacher of the Free Churches. These chapters are full of personal reminiscence. With everyone of these men Mr. Porritt has been on intimate terms. He has walked with them, and dined with them, as well as been with them at great public gatherings. His recollections throw most illuminating sidelights on their characters. Not only their finest qualities are here recorded, but also their little foibles which make them seem more human.

Some exquisite stories are told of all of these men, and here and there some secrets are revealed, some hidden things brought to light. The sketch of Dr. Joseph Parker finely supplements that by Dr. Joseph Fort Newton in his recent book, "Preaching in London." The chapter devoted to Sylvester Horne is a very interesting study of a buoyant soul which became somewhat disillusioned after his contact with politics in the House of Commons. Mr. Horne also had considerable trouble with his church officers who could not be quite persuaded that politics and religion had much to do with each other. Mr. Porritt gives us this enlightening paragraph about Horne:

"Deep down in his heart Sylvester Horne believed that there was no separation of the secular and the sacred. The two had so to mingle that the sacred permeated the secular in life. He lived by that faith, and it explained the way he thrust his religion into his politics and his politics into his religion. They were, to him, one and indivisible. Yet he never talked politics in the pulpit, though it was often said that he did. At Whitefields he comforted the saints (never very numerous, judging by the size of the congregation) in the morning, treated all questions under the sun—politics included—from the New Testament standpoint at the Men's Meeting in the afternoon, and always preached an evangelistic sermon which would have gladdened the heart of Dwight L. Moody in the evening. But, truly, to Sylvester Horne politics and religion were two interwoven instruments for promoting the Kingdom of God on earth."

American readers will especially enjoy the chapter on Dr. Jowett. It is more personal than anything that has yet been written about him. Dr. Jowett is a very modest, if not shy, man. His life is in the pulpit and it is in the pulpit that most Englishmen know him, but Mr. Porritt shows us that when you get close to him and come to know him, he is one of the most delightful companions in the world. There is one thing which Dr. Jowett cannot stand and that is praise. He runs from praise as someone else might run from the plague. It embarrasses him. He was persuaded at one time to go to a dinner which was given him in the House of Commons dining room by Sir Albert Spicer and Sir Joseph Compton Rickett to welcome him on his return to England at the close of his New York ministry. About one hundred members of Parliament of all parties joined in the tribute and Mr. Lloyd George was the chief spokesman. It was a very unique tribute and very beautiful words were spoken of Mr. Jowett. Mr. Porritt says: "After that dinner I walked to Victoria station from the House of Commons with Dr. Jowett and I told him that he might well be forgiven for a little vanity over such a unique tribute. "It did get under my skin, I confess," he said, "you know me well enough to know that I do not seek personal glory, or court publicity. I have always lived my own life quietly and simply, just loving my home and my work; still, to-night's function has made me feel that work such as I have tried to do is not done in vain. I take it all as a tribute to the Christian ministry."

Several chapters throw much light on the political situation in England as well as the state of journalism. There are some very interesting chapters under the headings of "Politics and Politicians;" "Religion in Politics;" "A Polyglot and Some Editors;" "Women in Journalism;" and "Tumult and Peace." There are also interesting chapters on "Ministerial Humorists;" and "America and American Humor." Mr. Porritt came to America in 1920 to attend the fourth International Congregational Council at Boston, and having a fine sense of humor, he enjoyed his visit very much indeed and while in this country he made a special study, from our papers and books, and speeches which he heard, of American humor. The consequence is that this chapter is delightful reading. It is a good thing that he has preserved that classic story of Dr. Burdett and the wife of the spiritualist; also the story is here of the woman who wanted to pray for the recovery of Dr. Burdett's lost eye. It is a perfectly delightful story, well-known to contemporary Americans, but one well worth preserving for posterity. Mr. Porritt has left out the story of the advertisement which, if I

*The Best I Remember. By Arthur Porritt. George H. Doran Company.

BIBLE HEALING

THE REDISCOVERED MINISTRY IN THE CHURCHES!

---

A thousand independent cults and isms, in every age, have been started at one place or another, in this city or in that country; but for the first time since the days of Jesus, a general MOVEMENT now inaugurated, is interdenominational and international and INSIDE the Churches,—for the purpose of promulgating the healing gospel, for body and for soul, as Christ commanded and practised, and as the Bible sets it forth.

The Church has ALL the POWER that outside movements have—and more! CHRIST GAVE HER THE POWER—HE NEVER REVOKED it—she must now use it!—So says the crusading Preacher who has veritably thrilled Christendom with this challenging proposal. So intense was his conviction that he gave up his position, that of Secretary of the Eastern Department of the American Bible Society, to promote it. Wondrous cures have been wrought in various churches.

The Bible Healing Movement

IN THIS AGE WAS LAUNCHED BY DR. SAMUEL C. BENSON
AT CITY TEMPLE, LONDON

and championed by Dr. Jowett and F. B. Meyer, and many other prominent people, to whom Dr. Benson presented this thrilling cause. All last Fall the movement engaged the press and pulpit of London. On Dr. Benson's return, the New York launching was sponsored by Dr. Jefferson, at Broadway Tabernacle, and the Y.M.C.A. and Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, Frank Crane, Dr. Keigwin, F. B. Harris and other celebrities of all denominations backed the Conference. The New York Times, World, Tribune, Journal, etc., gave it column articles, and the Christian Work devoted three pages, and concluded, "Intensely interested in his message; Benson is genuine!" The Bible Healing Prayer Book is now ready. A compendium of 450 pages, leather, gilt edge, thin paper, for Pastor's pocket, daily treatments for use in sick room, $2.00. For patients, same, except cloth on thicker paper, $1.25. Plan of the movement, free.

Local Stores—Brooklyn, Ventres, 286 Livingstone Street
New York, Westminster Book Store, 156 Fifth Avenue

Address BIBLE HEALING

Tract Society Building, 150 Nassau Street, New York City

remember rightly, he recorded in his letter to the "Christian World" during his American visit. The advertisement which he saw in Boston was in connection with an undertaker's establishment. The undertaker had three grades of prices—$50 for a look of composure on the face, $60 for giving the face a smile, and $75 for giving it a look of ecstatic complacency and joy. I may be mistaken, but I think that was Mr. Porritt's story. However, this book is full of others as good and better.

We might say in the closing paragraph that not only would a clergyman find this book most highly entertaining for leisure hours, but full of suggestions because of its having caught the secret of so many great prophets of the faith. To read the chapter on John Clifford and his eternal youth is to feel youthful again oneself. We are glad to hear that there is some possibility of Mr. Porritt's coming to America some time in the near future, and he will be very cordially welcomed by all who read this book.

BISHOP MANNING'S SECOND LETTER TO DR. GRANT

(Continued from page 194.)

which they have pledged themselves to teach.

I do not wish to say any thing that is unnecessary or that is needlessly severe, but in view of your reply to my letter, it is my duty to tell you truthfully what the situation is in which you have placed yourself before the Church. This is not an isolated incident. It does not stand alone. For years past your words and actions have given grave concern to the Bishops of this Diocese, and to the Church. By your advocacy of easy divorce, you have shown your contempt for the law and the teaching of the Church of which you are a minister. In terms offensive and shocking to Christian believers, you have cast doubt upon the teachings, the services and the Sacraments of your Church as you did in your recent sermon. By your own utterances you have seemed to the Church to deny the essential Faith for which she stands. The suggestion that this is a difference between "low Church" and "high Church" is merely an attempt to confuse and obscure the true points at issue. There is here no mere issue between parties in the Church. The real issue is that of belief in the power and Godhead of Jesus Christ, and here all parties in the Church are at one.

This issue is far larger than the Episcopal Church, as the letters which I am receiving from ministers of other churches amply testify. The time has come for all believers to stand openly together upon this matter of life or death to the Christian religion.

Let me then state clearly the reason why you are not brought to trial so that no one can misunderstand the position of the Church in this matter.

You are not brought to trial because your letter in response to mine is vague and ambiguous instead of clear and explicit. Your statements are so phrased that they cast doubt upon the Church's essential faith, and imply your own disbelief in it, while not quite fully and clearly stating this. Even though the faith of the Church may virtually be denied, and doubt cast upon her most essential belief, a court ought to be convened only when this denial is in terms that are clear and free from ambiguity. You therefore stand in this position: You have, by your own utterance,

"Our Church Was Packed"

From "The Stream of Life"

1235 Subjects on Safety Standard Film in our Five Libraries

Clean, wholesome entertainment. Bible stories visualized. Educational pictures. Travelogues of missionary lands. Athletic sports, many industries illustrated. Experienced librarians to assist you in selection. Low rentals.

The United Projector & Film Corporation has given especial attention and study of church requirements, and has incorporated its findings in a booklet, "The Picture and the Pulpit," which is sent to clergymen on request.

Write for this Booklet TODAY

Approved by National Board of Fire Underwriters
Price $195.00

Ask us about our church financing plans

Dept. I
United Projector & Film Corporation
69 W. Mohawk Street
Buffalo, N. Y.

Libraries at Buffalo, Albany, Harrisburg, Pittsburgh, Toledo

Writes Pastor Vaughan,

of Lancaster, N.Y., in regard to a service at which the Victor Safety Cinema was used to exhibit "The Stream of Life." This wonderful picture is but one of many in our libraries that is especially suited to church use.

The Victor Safety Cinema

Designed for church and school use. A high-grade, accurate, well-made, sturdy machine. Portable, easy to set up and operate anywhere. Projects steady brilliant pictures up to 100 feet from ordinary electric circuit or storage battery. Uses Safety Standard non-inflammable film and is absolutely safe.

caused grave doubt in the mind of the Church at large as to your belief in the deity of our Lord Jesus Christ. You have been given opportunity to remove this doubt but you have not done so. You have made your reply to me in words which fail to make clear your belief in this essential truth. There for the present the matter rests.

Sincerely yours,

(Signed) WILLIAM T. MANNING.

HYMN-TUNE CONTEST

The Hymn Society, an organization of hymn-writers, composers and hymn-book editors, having its headquarters in New York City, has offered a prize of fifty dollars for the best hymn-tune to be composed before April 8, 1923, for the Harvard prize hymn of Major Harry W. Farrington. The contest judges are Rev. Dr. Milton S. Littlefield, Professor H. Augustine Smith, Dr. Clarence Dickinson, Augustus S. Newman and Professor Waldo S. Pratt. The hymn is as follows:

"OUR CHRIST"

I know not how that Bethlehem's Babe
Could in the God-head be:

I only know the Manger Child
Has brought God's life to me.

I know not how that Calvary's cross
A world from sin could free:

I only know its matchless love
Has brought God's love to me.

I know not how that Joseph's tomb
Could solve death's mystery:
I only know a living Christ,
Our immortality.

Original tunes to this hymn may be submitted, with return postage, to the chairman of the committee of judges, Rev. Dr. Milton S. Littlefield, Corona, Long Island, New York, any time before April 8, on which date the contest will close. The name and address of the composer should be in a sealed envelope attached to the manuscript, but should not appear on the manuscript.

LARGEST BIBLE ORDER EVER MADE

The American Bible Society recently placed an order for one million, five hundred thousand portions of Scripture with a firm in New York City. Each volume will contain the four Gospels, the Book of Acts and Proverbs. They will be sold throughout the United States and South America for one cent each. Already the Society has received orders for eight hundred thousand of these books.

IRRESISTIBLE

JOIN OUR DELIGHTFUL "CHRISTIAN WORK" PARTY

On the Great White Star Line "S. S. Baltic" Summer Cruise to the Holy Land, Egypt, Turkey, Greece, Spain, Italy, Etc.

61 Days      $600 and Up

Starting June 27, 1923

A Surpassing Summer Vacation Opportunity

For Ministers, College Professors, Teachers and Business Men

IDEAL SUMMER WEATHER ON SHIP BOARD

With the Average Temperature on Shore Lower than Boston, New York or St. Louis, Nights Cool. Practically no Humidity

Clark's 20th Cruise to the Orient

Stop-Overs in Europe

Return Tickets, first class, good on Adriatic, Baltic, Cedric, Celtic, etc.

Until January 1, 1924

Luxurious White Star Transatlantic Liner

S. S. BALTIC

23,876 tons register. Three great promenade decks, Sumptuous Public Rooms, 24 Suites with private bath.

The Climax of Luxurious Travel

A FASCINATING ITINERARY

Madeira, Cadiz, Seville (Cordova, Granada and the Alhambra), Gibraltar, Algiers, Athens (Corinth, Eleusis), Haifa, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Bethany (Nazareth, Sea of Galilee, Samaria, etc.), Alexandria, Cairo, Naples, Pompeii, Aome (Capri, Sorrento, Amalfi), Monte Carlo, Cherbourg (Paris and the Battlefields, London, etc.), Liverpool to New York.

D. E. LORENZ, Ph.D., Author of "The Mediterranean Traveler" and Managing Director of Clark's Orient Cruise of 1922, and "Round the World" Cruise of 1923, is organizing a party of CHRISTIAN WORK readers. Why not take advantage of this remarkable opportunity and spend your vacation months visiting the most fascinating countries in the world? No travel worries—just rest and enjoyment. Rates include regular shore trips, landings, drives, guides, hotels, railroads, fees, etc.—everything first class.

We Invite Our Readers to Join Our Party

ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET (70 pages) AND SHIP DIAGRAM SENT FREE POSTPAID.

NOTE.—A few vacant rooms are available on our Mediterranean Cruise, Feb. 3, 1923, and on our Round the World Cruise, Jan. 22, 1923.

Address: Cruise Department, CHRISTIAN WORK.

70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

A Religious Review

FEBRUARY 24, 1923

Religious Reading

Frederick Lynch, D.D.

Impressions of Central Europe

Rev. Alexander Ramsay, D.D.

The Encyclical Letter of Pope Pius XI.

Observer's Letter

What the World Is Waiting For

Rev. William Pierson Merrill

Foes of International Friendship

Charles Edward Jefferson, D.D.

RELIGIOUS BOOK WEEK

Three Dollars a Year

Ten Cents a Copy

Lorenz's Easter Music

EASTER SERVICES (New 1923)

"Easter Bells," by Ira B. Wilson
"Joyful Eastertide," for graded Sunday Schools.

8 cents per copy, $6 per hundred, postpaid.
Samples sent free upon request.

EASTER SUNDAY SCHOOL CANTATAS

"The Glory of the Cross," by Lorenz.
"The Lighted Cross," by Ira B. Wilson.
"Easter," by Ira B. Wilson.

20 cents per copy, net in any quantity.
Send 20 cents for sample each of the three.

EASTER RECITATIONS AND EXERCISES

"Easter Treasury No. 28" (New 1923)
25 cents per copy, postpaid.

EASTER CHOIR CANTATAS (New 1923)

"Joy After Sorrow," Wilson. 60 cents.
"The Resurrection Story," Adams. 60 cents.

Sent on approval upon request.

Easter Anthems

Our ten most popular out of over 300
we publish sent on approval upon request.

Easter Solos and Duets

Our ten most popular out of 100 we publish sent on approval if you advance 10 cents for postage and packing. If you state voice desired, we will so limit selection.

Send for free catalog.

Sample and approval offers good only if The Christian Work is mentioned.

Lorenz Publishing Co.

216 W. 5th St., Dayton, Ohio
1711 Grand Central Terminal, New York.
218 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago

THE CHURCH PEACE UNION ON THE NEAR EAST

The trustees of the Church Peace Union, comprising some of the most eminent leaders in the American churches, at their Annual Meeting in December sent to Secretary of State Hughes a request that the United States "be represented at the Lausanne Conference by an authorized representative or representative with power to assume for the United States its full share of responsibility in co-operation with other nations for the just solution of the Near East problem."

This resolution was accompanied by a covering letter to Mr. Hughes from which we quote the following lines: (Does this not represent the sentiment of the Christians of America?) "The Union has every confidence in the desire of the President and yourself to protect American interests throughout the world, but it feels that in the present crisis in the Near East there should be more than usual emphasis laid upon the moral sentiment of the American people and that it should be made effective through diplomatic channels as far as possible with the nations now represented at the Conference at Lausanne. The feeling was frankly and vigorously expressed at this meeting that the foreign policy of the United States is so weak and faulty that it merits and we believe receives the condemnation of a great majority of the people of the United States. We believe that the conscience of the American people is sorely troubled because of the massacres and persecutions during the past seven years in Turkey, and shocked beyond measure by the settled policy of the Kemal government to expel the whole non-Moslem population under its jurisdiction. This we look upon as a matter affecting all nations, especially those whose civilization has its foundation in Christianity. In a situation filled with such tragedy, it is humiliating to have our Government merely look on. We want America to do her full duty and to shoulder her responsibilities. We want her voice to be heard wherever great problems are under discussion and vital issues are being settled. We want our country to be interested in the life of peoples as well as in the property of her own citizens; in human lives everywhere and not simply in American financial and commercial interests. It seems intolerable to us that we alone of the great self-respecting nations of the world should be outside the organized life of the world."

REVELL'S BOOKS

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS

WINIFRED KIRKLAND'S NEW BOOK

The Easter People

A Pen-Picture of the Moravian Celebration of the Resurrection.

In a narrative of rare beauty, Miss Kirkland describes the great Christian festival as it is observed and perpetuated, year after year, by a simple, God-fearing community at Salem, North Carolina. Illustrated. Paper Boards. 50c.

Harbor Jim

A. Eugene Bartlett

Author of "The Joy-Maker" has given a fascinating picture of Newfoundland and the quaint lives of the fishermen. There's a seal hunt, a journey up the Humber for salmon, and through it runs a story you'll not forget, original and tender. With frontispiece. $1.00

Between the Lines in Asia Minor

Mary Caroline Holmes

recounts the chief events of the siege of Urfa during the winter and spring of 1920, and the part she and those associated with her played during the two years following. Illustrated. $1.50

Pandita Ramabai (Sarasvati)

Clementina Butler

Chairman, Executive Committee, American Ramabai Association gives the history of this movement for the child-widows of India. A deeply interesting record of missionary and humanitarian endeavor. Illustrated. $1.00

The Revival of Wonder

Dr. Malcolm J. McLeod

utilizes apt illustrations drawn from every-day life, from the fountains of literature and from the commonly-shared experiences of humanity, giving them a moral and spiritual application of the surest kind. $1.25

The Gospel in the Ten Commandments

Dr. J. C. Massee

has given us a series of sermons delivered on Sunday evenings in Tremont Temple. An unusually fine series of sermons, heard with large appreciation and spiritual profit, by overflowing congregations. $1.25

Learn to Live

Daniel A. Poling, LL.D.

Associate President and Citizenship Supt., The United Society of Christian Endeavor, has a volume of Straight Talks to Young People. A bright, cheery presentation of principles, which, when adopted, cannot fail to produce in any human being, old or young, "the fruits of good living." $1.50

Five Minutes with the Boys' and Girls' Congregation

William H. Walker's

new volume of talks to young folks. Straightforward and practical. Dr. Walker has a direct way of using his illustrations and applying them in an unstrained, understandable way. $1.25

The Problem of the Working Boy

William McCormick

has a book of suggestions for workers among growing lads which aims to rid the work of the nubby pambly element which so often hampers its usefulness. $1.25

New Tasks for Old Churches

Roger Babson's

Suggestions for the solution of today's problems, clear-cut and courageous, regarding the physical, social, and spiritual salvation. $1.00

FLEMING H. REVELL COMPANY

NEW YORK, 128 Fifth Ave. CHICAGO, 17 N. Wabash Ave.

The COMMUNITY CHURCHMAN

A Monthly Magazine for all churchmen who are community minded

A working tool for every pastor and layman, informing, inspiring and helping him to make his church of larger social and spiritual service to its community.

Annual Subscription price, $2.00

Rate to Ministers, $1.50

Single copies, 20 cents each.

HANDBOOK OF THE COMMUNITY CHURCH MOVEMENT

This Handbook (84 pages, paper-bound) contains concise information concerning the numbers, varieties, methods of organization and kinds of service of the community churches throughout the United States. Price 65 cents, postpaid.

Address, Dept. W

THE COMMUNITY CHURCHMAN

2822 Annette St., Indianapolis, Indiana

McSHANE BELL FOUNDRY CO. BALTIMORE MARYLAND

Church, Chime and Peal BELLS

Memorials a Specialty

MENEELY BELL CO.

TROY, N.Y. AND 198 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.

BELLS

When answering advertisements please mention The Christian Work

FOR YOUR EASTER COMMUNION

Individual Cups

Over 40,000 churches use the Thomas Service. Clean and sanitary. Write now for Catalog and Special Trial Offer.

Thomas Communion Service Co. Box 432 Lima, Ohio.

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

CONTINUING

THE EVANGELIST AND NEW YORK OBSERVER

Vol. 114.—No. 8.

New York, February 24, 1923.

Whole No. 3011.

CONTENTS

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY.....	227
EDITORIALS:
Class Consciousness: Rev. T. Rhondda Williams.....	231
Religious Reading: Rev. Frederick Lynch, D.D.....	232
Making a Life. Professor Rufus M. Jones.....	233
EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE:
Impressions of Central Europe: Rev. Alexander Ramsay, D.D....	234
THE OBSERVER'S LETTER:
The Encyclical Letter of Pope Pius XI.....	235
THE WEEKLY SERMON:
What the World Is Waiting For: Rev. William Pierson Merrill, D.D. ....	237
GENERAL ARTICLES:
Foes of International Friendship: Dr. Charles Edward Jefferson	239
LITERARY SUPPLEMENT:
The Best Three Books of the Year: A Symposium.....	243
COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT:
Present Status and Tendencies in Rural Community Organizations: Professor Walter Burr, Ph.D.....	247
INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR MARCH 4..	250

The Christian Work; Published weekly; 10 cents a copy, $3.00 a year in the United States, $3.52 in Canada, and $4.04 in all other countries (postage included.)

Application made for entry as second class matter February 17, 1923, at the Post-office at New York, N. Y., under act of March 3, 1879.

Printed in U. S. A.—Published by The Christian World, Inc., Frederick Lynch, President; Henry Strong Huntington, Vice-President; Benson Y. Landis, Secretary-Treasurer.

All communications and remittances should be sent to "The Christian Work," 70 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Printed by Birkle & Glaser, 103 Park Place, New York City.

The World of To-day

THE TWENTY-THIRD SESSION OF THE LEAGUE COUNCIL

In response to the Canadian suggestion that Article X of the League Covenant be amended or eliminated, the Council of the League of Nations at its session at Paris, ending early this month, asked all the members of the League to express their mind on Article X by July 1, 1923. If the article is thrown out, some of our Senators ought to look more kindly on the League. The Council also determined to call an international conference to discuss the establishment of uniform formalities in the collection of customs. In addition to the member States, Ecuador, Mexico, the United States and Germany will be invited to the meeting. Dr. H. S. Cummings, Surgeon General of the United States, has at the invitation of the Council become a member of the League's Health Organization. The plan is to have an international sanitary bureau at Washington to co-operate with the League's Health Organization. The League, taking a leaf from the Washington Conference on the Limitation of Armaments, will call an international conference of naval powers other than the four nations which signed the Washington limitation agreement. The new naval limitation conference will meet after the results of the Pan-American Congress at Santiago, Chile, are known. The League Council at Paris took a definite step toward the limitation of all armaments by asking all member States to make their appropriations for armaments for next year no larger than they were in 1913. Our own refusal to work with the League and our failure to ratify the Convention of St. Germain, which forbids the private manufacture of arms, made the Council feel that at the present it is vain to debate the possibility of controlling private manufacture of arms and munitions. There were further manifestations of the development of international common-sense. Czechoslovakia and Hungary agreed to refer their dispute over boundaries to the adjustment of the League Council. The progress in Austria since the League secured an international loan for that country has been most hopeful. But the spirit of "national sovereignty" and international jealousy stood in the way of considerable progress. In response to a request from Albania last October for the assistance of a foreign financial expert, the Finance Section of the League's Finance and Economics Commission recommended the appointment of an Englishman named S. Peterson. Italy and France objected to the nomination. The Council deferred action and Albania virtually withdrew its request for the present. The French blocked the plan of Hjalmar Branting, Prime Minister of Sweden, to bring the question of reparations and the Ruhr affair before the Council. Poland asserted that the League had no interest in the appeals of Germans in Posen against what they considered arbitrary edicts of expulsion. The Polish representative termed the matter a purely domestic, internal question. The Council, however, considers that the protection of minorities is part of the League's function in Poland as elsewhere. The dispute will go to the Permanent Court for International Justice.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

AUSTRIA'S REHABILITATION

The work of reconstruction in Austria is under the oversight of the League of Nations. Dr. Elford Zimmerman, the League's High Commissioner at Vienna, is a Dutch banker and formerly burgomaster of Rotterdam. He began his work in October, after the plan for putting Austria on its feet was sanctioned by the Council of the League at its twenty-first session. Dr. Zimmerman's latest report shows that the inflation of the currency by the printing of paper crowns was stopped in November; that the cost of living in Austria has fallen each month since; that the deposits in the savings banks have steadily increased; that great economies in the public service have begun. The government has dismissed twenty-five thousand officials. During all these years of distress, Austria has kept practically all of the old imperial civil service in office, although their labors were no longer needed, merely because the government was afraid to dismiss them. This recent act of economy, a necessary hardship, has helped to increase the problem of unemployment. Dr. Zimmerman reports that there are probably one hundred and twenty thousand unemployed men in Austria. The new Austrian bank began operations on January 2; its capital of thirty million gold crowns was all subscribed in Austria itself, twenty-two million by the people and eight million by the government. This bank is to finance the loans authorized by the Council of the League of Nations last October. The loans will ultimately run to six hundred and fifty million gold crowns ($150,000,000). Eighty-four per cent. of this amount has been already guaranteed by England, France, Italy and Czechoslovakia. The loan is secured by the Austrian customs and railway receipts. The League Council at its Paris meeting three weeks ago authorized the initial loan of fifteen million dollars.

THE QUESTION OF MEMEL

Among the questions put over for a more convenient season, when the Treaty of Versailles was drawn up, was the disposition of Memel. Ten years ago Memel was the North-eastern port of Germany. The inhabitants of the city are practically all Germans, the people outside Lithuanians. The treaty provided that the Council of Ambassadors at Paris should determine the permanent status of the city and its environs, but for three years an Allied Commission has nominally governed Memelland, supported of late by a small French garrison. Last month, the Lithuanians in Memelland rose and took over the government, restricting the little garrison to its barracks. The Council of Ambassadors thereupon sent an ultimatum to the Lithuanian government, demanding the withdrawal of the provisional government of Memelland in seven days. The Lithuanian government answered that it had no control over the provisional government of Memelland which was established by the local people. This is practically the same answer as that which Poland gave to the Council concerning General Zeligovski's aggression in Vilna some two years ago. Despite Polish violence and Lithuania's historic claims on the city, the League allowed Poland to hold Vilna. It is now adopting a similar policy in regard to Memel, yielding to a fait accompli. Memel will go to Lithuania. The League has placated Poland by assigning her part of the neutral strip which had been erected between Poland and Lithuania beyond Vilna. The purpose of the neutral strip had been to prevent military contact between the two countries, but in its indeterminate state it has proved a rather lawless district. The Lithuanians have resisted by force the Polish forces which were sent to occupy the territory assigned to Poland. The situation is a most unfortunate one. The only hope for its peaceable solution lies with the League.

HAVE WE THE RIGHT IMMIGRATION COMMISSIONER AT NEW YORK?

About two weeks ago Robert B. Tod, our Commissioner of Immigration, started fifty-one Armenian refugees back to Turkey in a way that was heartless, indefensible and very possibly illegal. M. Vartan Malcom, a New York lawyer of Armenian birth, had obtained a writ of habeas corpus for the production of the refugees in the Federal Court, on the plea that the law permitted them to enter under clauses of the immigration law which make special exceptions of persons persecuted on account of their religion. Commissioner Tod had ordered their deportation on the ground that the quota of Armenians allowed here had been exceeded. The refugees were to go back to the Near East on the Madonna of the Fabre Line. Before the boat sailed Commissioner Tod was informed over the telephone that the writ had been issued, though it was not served on him until the boat was under way. When it was served on him an official of the Fabre Line offered to stop the ship and take the Armenians off, but the Commissioner would not consent. All of these immigrants were related in one way or another to people who are already in this country. Two of the young women were engaged to be married to men who had fought in the American army in the World War. If the deportees were to be landed in Turkey it meant suffering, and possibly death for them. If they were to be taken to Greece, it meant lack of food and possible starvation. But the essential difficulty was Commissioner Tod's attitude. He seems to hold the opinion that it is his business to prevent immigration. It is his business to administer the law as his superiors interpret it, with kindness and consideration. Through all the ranks of our force at Ellis Island, from the humblest doorkeeper to the Commissioner, we need sympathetic and kindly people, people who have enough brains to recognize that because a man wears clothes a little different from ours and cannot understand English, he is not therefore inferior and to be treated like a dog or a sheep. The habitual discourtesy of many an employee at Ellis Island is calculated to make one's blood boil. That discourtesy goes at times practically to the point of cruelty. We should like to see Commissioner Tod, and perhaps half of his subordinates, themselves go through the mill incognito as incoming immigrants.

THE WALLOONS OF 1624

The descendants of New England Puritans and of Scotch-Irish Presbyterians are prone to think that the peculiar tone of America came practically wholly from their strains. The approaching tercentenary of the arrival of the Walloons—the French and Belgian Huguenots—is a salutary reminder to us that from the first America has been a nation of various stocks. Most of the Walloons who sailed into New

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

York Bay in the spring of 1624 on the good ship "New Netherlands" had, like the Pilgrims, found asylum in Holland and came hither under the flag of the Dutch West India Company. These exiles for the sake of their faith were filled with a deeply religious spirit. They were accompanied on their voyage by Sebastian Krol, a lay chaplain, who conducted services every morning, noon and evening on the way over, and on arrival at Fort Orange (now Albany), to which most of the thirty families in the colony went, he immediately began the work of providing for organized worship according to the tenets of the Reformed faith. The religious policy of the colonial administration of New Netherlands breathed a spirit of toleration and liberality which was rare in that age, and which echoed the spirit of freedom then found almost solely in the Dutch Republic. John Baer Stoudt, director of the commission which is planning the observance of the Walloon arrival here, quotes the following record in the rules laid down by the Dutch West India Company for the government of the colony: "Within their territory they shall only worship according to the true Reformed religion, as it is done within this country (Holland) at present, and by a good Christian life they shall try to attract the Indians and other blind persons to the knowledge of God and His Word, without, however, committing any religious persecution, but freedom of conscience shall be left to everyone. But if any one of them, or if anyone within their territory, shall intentionally curse or speak blasphemy against the name of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ he shall be punished by the commander and his council according to circumstances." The Federal Council has instituted a Huguenot-Walloon New Netherlands Commission for the celebration of the anniversary. Its chairman, Mr. Robert W. de Forest, is himself a descendant of a distinguished Walloon exile, Jesse de Forest. The President of the United States, the Queen of the Netherlands, the King of Belgium and the President of the French Republic are honorary chairmen. The commission plans a Huguenot memorial pilgrimage to spend two and a half months this summer in a tour that will include such places of historical religious interest as La Rochelle, Montpellier, the Cevennes and Paris, in France; Torre Pellice, the Waldensian capital, in Italy; London, Canterbury and Edinburgh, in Great Britain; Geneva and Zurich, in Switzerland; Worms, in Germany; Brussels, Mons and Louvain, in Belgium; Amsterdam, Leyden and The Hague, in Holland. In Holland the participants in the pilgrimage will be the guests of the Leyden Pilgrim Fathers' Society, and will share in the celebration of Queen Wilhelmina's silver jubilee. Dr. Charles S. Macfarland of the Federal Council and Rev. John Baer Stoudt of the Commission will accompany the tour. Applications for participation in the pilgrimage should be made as soon as possible, either to the Commission, at 105 East Twenty-second street, New York, or direct to Dr. H. W. Dunning, 188 Rawson road, Brookline, Mass., who is making the arrangements for the trip.

PREMEDITATED MURDER AND TORTURE

The Federal Council's Commission on the Church and Race Relations is compiling a report on lynchings. It seems hardly believable that between 1885 and 1921 America allowed the lynching of more than four thousand persons, the great majority of them Negroes. Eighty-three of the victims were women, seventeen of the women white. Some of the accounts of the torture inflicted at lynchings are so frightful that we cannot endure to print them. One of the worst elements in the lynching evil is that men definitely plan them and carry out their dreadful schedule. Take such newspaper accounts of these organized murders as the following, cited by the Commission:

Late last night the jailer who enticed away from the prison on the pretense of a call to make an arrest. As soon as he was out of hearing a mob of two hundred masked men went to the jail and took the keys from his wife, and securing the three prisoners took them to the bridges and placed a strong rope around the neck of each, tied the other end of the rope to the timbers of the bridge and compelled their victims to jump.

(Summarized). Masked mob entered the jail at two A.M. and took out nine prisoners—one white man and eight Negroes. Eight were shot to death, and one, a Negro, escaped death after being wounded. The mob overpowered the town marshal and the jailer, carried the men out and tied them to fence posts by their necks and then fired five volleys into their bodies. Only one of the prisoners had been convicted—a Negro, under sentence of death for the murder of another Negro.

Under the headline, "Three Thousand Will Burn Negro," one newspaper printed:

The lynching has now been fixed at five P.M. A committee of citizens has been appointed to make necessary arrangements for the event and the mob is pledged to act in conformity with these arrangements. . . . Three thousand strangers are to witness the disposition of John Hartfield. . . . Officers are unable to control the crowds.

The headline over a fourth article ran, "Avengers Set Six O'Clock as Lynching Hour." The text was as follows:

A party of seven in two automobiles with Henry Lowry, Negro murderer, . . . stopped here at 12:20 o'clock Wednesday afternoon . . . to Richardson's landing, where they will cross and be joined by a party waiting on the Arkansas side, prepared to lynch Lowry promptly at six o'clock. (Later Associated Press dispatches gave full account of the burning as planned.)

We are, verily, a savage people.

DANGEROUS RADICALISM IN THE UNITED STATES

Albert Bushnell Hart, Professor of History and Constitutional Government at Harvard, looked facts in the face in a very healthy way in an address at the New York National Republican Club the other day. He found threatening our country two really dangerous forms of radicalism which are not generally recognized among conservative people—the radicalism of the courts and of those nullificationists who would upset the Constitution by disregarding the Eighteenth Amendment. In regard to the first he emphasized the excessive degree of authority which the courts have gradually acquired as against the executive and legislative branches of government. Not until 1853 did the United States Supreme Court undertake to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional. Professor Hart considers that the Kansas Industrial Court in reality takes away the right of the workmen to peaceful strike. The extreme labor movement constitutes a dangerous form of radicalism, in Dr. Hart's judgment, but for every such radical group there is an antagonistic radical group of employers who set up governments of their own in industrial communities. In regard to the Eighteenth Amendment Dr. Hart said: "There are no more dangerous radicals than those who violate the Volstead law because they don't like it and because they believe it infringes upon their personal liberty. There are two good reasons for the Volstead act, the first of which is the enormous harm that has been done by drink. The second reason is that the experience of one hundred years has shown that the liquor business has always been an organized political business. It has meddled in politics throughout the Union and has had affiliations with every party. The liquor men have never obeyed the law." Few things in American life are more disquieting than the way in which men who should be leaders in the healthy life of the nation join in this nullification movement. When the graduates of a college like Yale, which in times past has contributed its full quota of high-minded leaders to the public service—when the graduates of such a college coolly unite at some of their class dinners to disregard the law and the Constitution, there is call for prophylaxis in the thinking of some of our supposedly "educated" men.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

PROPOSED CANONS OF JUDICIAL ETHICS

Some years ago the American Bar Association adopted a set of Canons of Legal Ethics. A little over a year ago the Executive Committee of the Association appointed a committee of five, three judges and two practising lawyers, to draw up and submit similar Canons of Judicial Ethics. The committee consisted of Chief Justice Taft, Judges Cornish of Maine and von Moschzisker of Pennsylvania, and ex-Senator Sutherland of Utah and Charles A. Boston of New York. When Mr. Sutherland was appointed to the Supreme Court, Garret W. McEnerny of California took his place as one of the two practising lawyers. The reason for drawing up such canons is because—we quote—"declared ethical standards tend to become habits of life." The canons begin with a counsel against the candidate for judicial office making promises "of conduct in office which appeal to the cupidity or prejudice of the appointing or electing power; he should not announce in advance his conclusions of law on disputed issues to secure class support." The shrewdness of some of the counsel to judges is very pleasing. The judge, says the report, "should avoid unconsciously falling into the attitude of mind that the litigants are made for the courts instead of the courts for the litigants." A like danger threatens the official of every organization, whether of the Church, the State, or the business corporation. The judge, say the canons, should be "temperate, attentive, patient," and they especially urge the duty of punctuality upon him. To quote further: "Judges should be courteous to counsel, especially to those who are young and inexperienced, and also to all others concerned in the administration of justice in their courts. . . . A judge should not be swayed by public clamor or consideration of personal popularity." The committee were not above noting a certain human weakness in some judges. The judge, they remark, "should not be tempted to an unnecessary display of learning." The canon in regard to injunctions is of especial importance. It runs: "Judges should discourage ex parte hearings of applications for injunctions and receiver-ships where the order may work detriment to absent parties. . . . The judge should remember that an injunction is a limitation upon the freedom of action of defendants and should not be granted lightly or inadvisedly. One applying for such relief must sustain the burden of showing clearly its necessity and this burden is increased in the absence of the party whose freedom of action is to be restrained, even though only temporarily." The proposed canons counsel against dissenting opinions except where there is conscientious difference on fundamental principles. They wholly discountenance judicial idiosyncrasies. "A judge should adopt the usual and expected method of doing justice, and not seek to be extreme or peculiar in his judgments or spectacular or sensational in the conduct of his court. . . . He should not compel persons convicted or accused to submit to some humiliating act or discipline of his own devising, without authority of law, because he thinks it will have a beneficial corrective influence. Judges imposing sentences should endeavor to conform to a reasonable standard of punishment and should not seek popularity either by exceptional severity or undue leniency." The canons lay it down that "the judge should be studiously careful himself to avoid even the slightest infraction of the law." They counsel against the judge's lending his name either to business ventures or charitable enterprises; he shall not "at any time" become a "speculative investor upon the hazard of a margin;" he should "avoid making political speeches, contribution to party funds, the public endorsement of candidates for political office or participating in party conventions." He should, the canons, declare, refrain from the practise of the law. Altogether, the canons lay down an ideal that is by no means reached by every judge to-day. Their acceptance would make a concrete standard by which a judge could gauge his own conduct. They would exert a continual healthy influence on judges themselves, and they would help to clarify in the public mind what was to be expected of the judge.

THE I. W. W. AND SABOTAGE

The Industrial Workers of the World for a while advocated sabotage in industry. That sabotage included the injury of machinery and equipment, and also the sabotage of time, in other words, loafing on the job. But the I. W. W. found the use of sabotage most demoralizing. Men who accepted the idea of treachery to their employer as legitimate, naturally took that treachery into other relations of life. The I. W. W. found their members committing sabotage against their own industrial organization. They dropped the policy. To-day there exist in Europe two nuclei for workers' internationals—the one of the Syndicalists at Berlin and that of the Communists at Moscow. The recent I. W. W. Convention, after long discussion, decided it could not affiliate with either without forfeiting certain of its fundamental principles. The Defense News Service commenting on their action, remarked, "It is a matter of tactics. At their preliminary conference in Berlin a few months ago, the Syndicalists went on record as approving the use of sabotage and violence as weapons when deemed necessary in industrial strife. Both of these weapons are discountenanced by the I. W. W., which officially declared against them more than four years ago, on the grounds that force invariably defeats itself."

The work of the newly organized National Unemployment League has already resulted in the introduction in the United States Senate by Mr. Ferlinghuysen, of a bill providing for a survey of the nation's needs in the way of public works in periods of depression and unemployment. The bill would create a Federal Commission on Unemployment, whose duty it shall be to make investigations "to determine where the public interest can be best served by the development of the following public works: Roads, afforestation, and drainage and irrigation of waste lands." The Commission members are to serve without salary, but may secure the aid of salaried assistants—engineers, draftsmen, etc.—for which purpose the measure carries an appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars.

EDITORIAL

EDITORIAL STAFF

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

Frederick Lynch

ASSOCIATE EDITOR

Henry Strong Huntington

MANAGING EDITOR

Benson Y. Landis

LITERARY EDITOR

Tertius Van Dyke

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Edmund de Schweinitz Brunner

CONTRIBUTING STAFF

Henry A. Atkinson
Peter Ainslie
Hugh Black
S. Parkes Cadman

Sidney L. Gulick
Rufus M. Jones
E. Guy Talbott
T. Rhondda Williams

EDITORIAL COUNCIL

Nehemiah Boynton
William Adams Brown
Howard Duffield
Sherwood Eddy
Irving Fisher
J. W. Johnson

Shailer Mathews
George Foster Peabody
George A. Plimpton
Howard C. Robbins
Fred B. Smith
Cornelius Woelfkin

Charles S. Macfarland

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS

Austria: Professor Carl Beth
Canada: Dr. J. Lovell Murray
Czechoslovakia: Professor Francis Zilka
France: Rev. Professor Wilfred Monod
Germany: Direktor A. Hinderer
Great Britain: Rev. Sidney M. Berry
Hungary: Dr. S. Szabo
Switzerland: Pastor Adolph Keller

Class Consciousness

IN the history of industrial progress we hear a good deal about the class-war. There are those who put all their hopes for social betterment on the consolidation of industries, and the promotion of class-consciousness among the working-class. Let workingmen, they say, realize their power, consolidate their forces, and, with an eye on class interest alone, demand the recognition of those interests. It is necessary to see that class-consciousness is a distinct moral advance upon pure individualism, and its maintenance among working people involves a good deal of self-discipline. The sacrifice of personal interests is often necessary to the maintenance of the interests of the class. And the fact that certain classes of workmen are ready to sacrifice their own immediate individual interests in order to secure the interests of their class, is a moral advance.

Why do not a great many workingmen join a trades union, why do they prefer to spend on beer the money they would have to pay into the union? It is because they have not undergone the moral preparation, the self-disciplinary process, sufficiently to realize the class-consciousness. Why should an individual consider the interests of his class at all? Is it only because in the end it will be for his own interests to do so? That is certainly not the way in which the thing has worked. The men who have worked most earnestly for reform have been those who never did hope to gain anything personally by their action, who knew, indeed, that they would be dead long before the object would be gained. They knew also that while they lived they would lose rather than gain.

In the early days of the I. L. P. Movement in England there were men who most self-denyingly gave themselves to that movement, knowing perfectly well that they personally would never see the fruition of their efforts, and that in the meantime they would have to suffer many deprivations by the public prejudice they would encounter. There is a considerable moral element in any enthusiasm for class-interest, and especially in the growth of a true class-consciousness. It rests upon a realization in the individual of unity with at least a large number of his fellows. It is notorious that the lower men are in the moral scale the more difficult it is to get them to form any union at all.

All the economic and political arguments for the union are there, and yet it cannot be formed, because there has not been in the individual the intellectual and moral preparation for it. The rise of class-consciousness is not the mere result of people living together on a similar level, or in similar conditions, it is the result of reflection by individuals upon such conditions, and this reflection contains moral and intellectual elements. But though the class-consciousness may be regarded as a step in social and moral evolution, it should never be regarded as more than a step.

To become fully human, and by that I mean fully moral and spiritual, co-operation must become nation-wide, yea, ultimately world-wide. Even the international brotherhood of the proletariat is not sufficient range for the true co-operative spirit; nothing less than the brotherhood of man will do. And the foundation of this is a spiritual conviction. To try and get the working classes to think of themselves as mere economic and political factors, as some writers do, is to denude them of an immense power which they could wield if they realized their moral and spiritual force. Young students of Karl Marx should beware of being carried away by the truth there is in his teaching to think that it is the whole truth. The economic factor is of enormous importance, but to regard it as the only factor is to miss the biggest truth.

The idea of interest, whether personal or class, though not devoid of a moral element in the latter case, is not to be compared for a moment as a dynamic with the distinctively moral and spiritual idea of the intrinsic worth of every human being, and the unity of all human beings. The reform movement would gain tenfold in power, even for economic progress, if it could be consciously grounded in an intense spiritual realization of that one life manifested in all men, and by virtue of which all men are one. This is the true sanction for co-operation, this is the ultimate reason why there should be co-operation at all, and this is the spirit that would worthily work a co-operative commonwealth, if it were established.

We ought to work to get as many individuals as possible, in all classes, to realize the truth that there is no such thing as an isolated personality. Whatever that wonderful entity is which constitutes the individual, it is certain that it could only come to be in an environment like unto itself; it is distinguished from all, and separate from none. The content of the individual soul itself is a social content and it can only grow in social relations. Mazzini said: "Thou canst not, even if thou wouldst, separate thy life from that of humanity, thou livest in it, by it, and for it. Thy soul cannot rid itself of the influence of the elements amongst which it moves."

And long before Mazzini, Marcus Aurelius taught: "We are made for co-operation like feet, like hands, like eye-lids.

EDITORIAL

To act against one another, is to act contrary to Nature." Before Marcus Aurelius, Paul pictured the ideal society as that of many members in one body, so related that no member could live unto himself. Long before Paul, Plato used the same figure. The pursuit of personal advantage in the narrow sense must be contrary to the personal good in the higher sense, because that personal good can only be realized in co-operation. The full realization of this truth is the only inner life that would match the outer life of a co-operative state.

T. R. W.

Religious Reading

THE days seem to be gone when on Sundays the family gathered about the evening lamp and read from the religious paper or read some book of a religious nature. Neither do the young folks take home the religious book from the Sunday-school library as in former days. Indeed, the Sunday-school library seems passing away before the universal public library. This is not altogether gain, for, while most of the books for young people on the public library shelves are excellent, there are many books of a more distinctively religious nature that the Sunday-school library supplied. These are not all of a sentimental nature either. One of the books which had most to do with awakening the writer was "The Schonberg Cotta Family"—the story of Luther, Melancthon, and the rest, an historical romance over which we imagine many a boy has dreamed for hours. Many books of this character we got from the old Sunday-school library, and we cannot help feeling that it supplied a great need. As we travel up and down the land, visiting in many homes, we do not seem to find the boys and girls reading these books as much as did the boys and girls of forty years ago.

Neither do the grown-up people seem to read religious books and papers as they did fifty years ago. Of course, one reason for this is that the deluge of popular magazines has swept almost all serious literature before it. The Sunday paper and the hundreds of fifteen-cents magazines have not only driven the religious magazine out of the home, but also the serious magazines of all sorts. Then people do not read as much as they did. The moving picture in winter and the automobile in summer have lured thousands from books.

Yet we claim religion is one of the chief interests of man. Is it, we wonder. If it is, why is it that we seem so little concerned about it, and display our interest in it only on Sunday morning? One does not expect the great mass of Roman Catholics to read religious books, except books of devotion. For them the problems of religious thought belong to the Church and to the scholars within her fold. But the Protestant claims that religion is the concern of the individual. Every man is not only his own priest, but his own prophet. He is to settle the problems of the faith for himself. His pastor may guide him in his thinking and shepherd him in his vicissitudes, but with all this, he is his own prophet and scholar as well as priest. Also, in the Protestant conception of the Church, the layman is a co-worker with the pastor in the Kingdom of God. His fundamental principle is, "We are workers together with God." The Protestant layman belongs to the Church, not simply for worship, not simply for instruction, but as a worker with his pastor in all good causes. He takes a part in all good work, is interested in all religious and social problems. If, then, both personal religion and the social application of the Gospel is of such concern to him, how is it that he does not read religious literature?

For he does not. The best religious books have very limited sales. Of the fifty million Protestant churchmen in the nation are we not safe in saying that not more than one million take a religious journal? How can religion really be of such interest to our church people if not one-fiftieth part of them ever read a religious journal, and only a handful read religious books? We are afraid people are not so much interested in religion as some of our optimistic friends think. Religious Book Week has been set aside, hoping that pastors would call the attention of their people to this strange phenomenon, this contradiction in the Christian Church. There are several reasons why the pastors ought to urge upon their people the taking of a religious journal and the reading of religious books. We would like to mention the two or three most important of these, for they really have much significance for the success of the Church of God.

First of all, the Church is face to face with the greatest and most perplexing tasks she has ever faced. The last ten years have not only thrown the nations into a weltering pit and produced chaos in international morality, but they have disturbed all the relationships of men. There are wild theories of personal morality being heralded in books and theaters and in revolutionary circles, all the old moral sanctions are being either questioned or defied, as well as the doctrinal teachings of the Church. The Church has got to meet all these denials of morality and faith, and, furthermore, she has got to reconstruct a new world order on the ruins of the old. She has got both to dream and build the city of God. The mind of every Christian is as much needed in this great endeavor as his heart, good-will and money. He ought to be able to bring vision to the solution of these problems as well as consecration. He ought to have a thorough knowledge of every attack that is just now being made upon the Christian faith and the Christian morality and be able to meet it. He ought to be thoughtfully considering the great task of the Church as it faces the perplexing, baffling social and international problems. He can be fit for these great constructive tasks only as he reads the books devoted to their discussion, only as he keeps in touch with them through the pages of the religious journals.

Again, the Christian is one who is supposed to view life seriously and intelligently. He ought to be not only the most outstanding man in the community for his piety, but for his whole character. His brains ought to show the result of his contact with the eternities as well as his heart. He should be the biggest man in the community and the man with the widest interests, in touch with all big things. For, as we have said again and again, "Big thoughts make big men." Therefore, the Christian should read books that call for the exercise of the mind; that enlarge and broaden his vision; that deepen his character and put power into his personality. He should know more than other men as well as love more. He should have reason for the faith that is in him. He should be concerned with the work God is doing through His Church, and should be interested in all that is being said and thought about the faith. We need big men among our laymen as well as among our clergy, and it is books, thoughts, big thoughts, and the exercise of the reason that makes big men. We can think of a dozen books published this year the reading of any one of which carefully by an intelligent Christian would remake him.

EDITORIAL

And could we say just a word to the preachers, asking them if they ever realized how much more joy there would be in preaching to a congregation that came every Sunday fresh from reading some book dealing with the very problems of religion on which he is to preach, fresh from reading a religious journal which has fertilized their minds for the preachers' words, than in preaching to the average dumb, indifferent, purely secularized congregation he usually meets? It would be of infinite gain to the preacher, make preaching a thing of joy and enthusiasm, if he knew he had before him a group of men who had been reading, who were always reading about the things of the faith and the work of the Church. Compare the joy of the musician who comes before an audience at home in music, loving it, educated in it, living in it continually, to the joy of one who comes before an audience of people ignorant of music, therefore unresponsive to it. It is the same with the preacher. We would say to our fellow preachers that it is of infinite advantage to you to see that every one of your flock reads a good religious paper and many of the best books dealing with the faith and the part the Gospel and the Church must play in saving the world.

F. L.

Making a Life

OUR present-day age has a kind of passion for the study of developing processes. We do not feel quite at home with any subject until we can work our way back to its origin or origins and then follow it in its unfoldings, explaining the higher and more complex stages in terms of the lower and more simple ones.

That method, however, cannot be successfully used to unlock the secret of the gospels. We do not find beginnings here; we cannot follow genetic processes; we are unable to discriminate higher and lower stages of insight. We must launch out at the very start in mid-sea. Whatever words of Christ one begins with indicate that He has already arrived at an absolute insight—we mean, that He has found a way of living that is no longer relatively good, but intrinsically and absolutely good.

It is an inveterate habit with men like us to estimate everything in terms of relative results. We are pragmatists by the very push of our immemorial instincts. Our first question, consciously or unconsciously, is apt to be, what effects will come, if I act so, or so? Will this course work well? Will it further some issue or some interest? And this deep-lying pragmatic tendency—this aim at results—appears woven into the very fiber even of much of the religion of the world.

Sometimes the results sought are near, sometimes they are remote; sometimes they are sought for this world, sometimes they are sought for the next world; sometimes the pragmatic aim at results is crudely and coarsely selfish, sometimes it is refined, or altogether veiled, but religion has no doubt often enough been an impressive kind of double-entry bookkeeping, the piling up of credits or of merits which some day will bring the sure result that is sought.

Just that entire pragmatic attitude Christ has left forever behind. His inner way, His interior insight, passes on to a new level of life, to a totally different type of religious aspiration and to another method of valuation. For Him the beyond is always within. The only good thing is a life that is intrinsically good; the only blessedness worth talking about is a kind of blessedness which attaches by a law of inner necessity to the character of the life itself. It makes no difference what world one may eventually be in, if only it is still a world of spiritual issues—goodness, holiness, likeness to God, will still constitute blessedness as they do in this world.

When once this insight is reached, it affects all the pursuits and all the valuations of the soul. All "other things" at once become secondary, and "entering into life," "seeking life," "finding life," becomes the primary thing. "Making a life" overtops in importance even "making a living"—the life is more than meat, more than raiment, more than gaining the whole world. It is better to enter into life halt and maimed—with right hand cut off and eye plucked out—than bend all one's energies to preserve the body whole and yet to miss life. The way to life is strait the entering gate is narrow. One cannot enter without facing the stern necessity of focusing the vision on the central purpose, without getting "a single eye," without letting go many things for the sake of one thing.

Sacrifice, surrender, negation, are inherently involved in any great onward-marching life. They go with any choice that can be made of a rich and intense life. It is impossible to find without losing, to get without giving, to live without dying. But sacrifice, surrender, negation, are never for their own sake; they are never ends in themselves. They are involved in life itself.

One great spiritual law comes to light and becomes operative, as soon as the interior insight is won, as soon as the inner way is found: The law that the soul can have what it wants. This law of the interior life, of the inner way, Christ affirms again and again in varying phrase. The inner attitude, the settled trend of desire, the persistent swing of the will, are the very things that make life. The person who cherishes hate in his soul forms a disposition of hatred and must live in the atmosphere which that spirit forms. The person who longs for deeds that are wrong, and allows desire to play with free scope is inwardly as though he did the deed. He is what he wants to be. And so, too, on the other hand, the rightly fashioned will is its own reward and has its own peculiar blessedness. The person who hungers and thirsts for goodness will get what he wants. He who seeks, with undivided aspiration, will always find. He who knocks with persistent desire for the gates of life to open will see them swing apart from him to go through to his goal. He who asks, with the ground swell of his whole inner being, for the things which minister to life and feed its deepest roots, will get what he asks for. The very pity of the Pharisee's way of life is that he has his reward—he gets what he is seeking. The glory of the other way is the glory of the imperfect—the glory of living toward the flying goal of likeness to the Father in heaven.

R. M. J.

EDITORIAL

Impressions of Central Europe

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE

I HAVE spent the last three months of the old year in Central Europe in organizing the work of "The World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches," of which the Archbishop of Canterbury is president. This has given me unusual opportunities of observing at first-hand the social, economic and ecclesiastical conditions, especially in Czechoslovakia, Poland and Austria. I had intimate conversations with the leading representatives of all Reformed communions in these lands, and had prolonged conferences also with many groups of pastors and others who could speak for the Churches.

Conditions vary widely. Among the Czechs of the ancient kingdom of Bohemia and Moravia the securing of independence within the Republic of Czechoslovakia and the uprising of national feeling have created a great movement away from the Church of Rome. The Czech Brethren Church records an accession of no fewer than sixty thousand within the last four years, and the Czechoslovak Church, which is served by ex-priests of the Roman communion and retains the Catholic ritual, claims as many as one million adherents, and these, one and all, have seceded from Rome and are indifferent to the Pope's decree of excommunication pronounced against them. There is probably no other community in Europe where the appeal of the Gospel meets with such an immediate response as among this people for whom John Hus is a national hero, and where his memory is a living force. It is, however, a remarkable fact that among the Slovaks, united in the same republic and closely allied in language, no such movement is to be found. The Slovak-Lutheran Church, with some 380,000 adherents, has been reconstituted on an independent basis under the superintendence of two bishops and is permeated by a spirit of buoyant hopefulness. I attended a crowded service of two and a half hours at a great ecclesiastical gathering in the little town of St. Martin among the hills, where all lay deep in snow, in an unheated church with a temperature outside of thirteen degrees of frost. But the line of demarcation between Rome and Wittenberg remains unchanged. In that province of Poland which was formerly German Poland the Lutheran Church has suffered immense loss by the exodus of vast numbers of Germans to their fatherland. The computation I heard gives those as amounting to the huge total of four hundred thousand, and this Church is therefore left in possession of large churches and magnificent philanthropic institutions without a constituency able to maintain them. It can easily be understood under what extreme difficulty it has to carry on its activities in the midst of an overwhelmingly Roman Catholic population. In the town of Posen the German population has within two years shrunk from sixty thousand to eight thousand, and in Bromberg it has been reduced from eighty per cent. of the entire community to a remnant of sixteen per cent. This grave weakening of the one great Protestant Church is a very serious blow to the cause of evangelical religion and even intellectual culture.

There are two conclusions which have most deeply bitten themselves into my mind. One is the state of privation and distress to which the middle classes, especially of Austria and Germany, have been reduced. Of Austria in particular I can speak with some authority, for I traveled through most of the country and held conferences in many centers and entered into conversation with very large numbers of people. Of Germany I heard a great deal from those who knew its conditions intimately, and learned much also from those I met in the short while I spent in that land. What are the facts? One Lutheran pastor after another informed me that his total income from all sources was one million kronen per month, and that, with the exchange at 330,000 kronen to the pound sterling, equaled three pounds per month. Besides this he had a house and (if in the country) his garden. Others have less than this pittance. The produce of the garden goes far to provide a meager subsistence. But clothes he can hardly buy; books are an impossible luxury; all that makes for the refinement of life is beyond him. A scholar of eminence told me that all he wore had been given him. He had the highest degrees two great universities could confer. If there are children, the case is more desperate still. In every railway carriage the conversation one overhears turns on the problem of food and its cost. It is with a mere languid interest one learns in England of the downfall of the exchange in these lands, but to the people involved it is a concern of life and death. In Munich the price of a necessary item of food leaped from fifteen marks to fifty marks in one day because of the downfall of the value of the mark, and can it be wondered that there was looting of shops by a maddened and hungry populace. All those who had money saved or lived on investments or had fixed incomes see their money disappear and they are reduced from comfort to starvation. A rent restriction act prevents in Austria the raising of rents, and these remain at the pre-war figure, which is the merest fraction of its former value. It may cost a landlord, I was told, more to repair a single broken electric light than he receives in rent for a year. In Vienna, on a commanding corner site, there may be seen an unfinished building, with the walls standing a few feet high and heaps of unused bricks against them. It is a gaunt and gaping ruin of what was to have been a Lutheran church. Before the war the pastor's house was built and early in the war the church was started and the money was in hand for its erection. As with us, building operations were suspended by law in these years. Now all the money for the completion of the building has lost its value and the cost at the same time has soared to impossible heights. The unsightly wreck remains, a scandal and a reproach to the Protestant name. Orphanages, homes for the aged, and the like, can only exist by the aid America gives, and the closing down of these institutions or their continued struggle for existence devoid of the necessary comforts of heating and nourishing food tell the same sad tale of crushing poverty. Of the eleven thousand students in Vienna over seventy per cent. must work for their living while at their studies and the common resource for earning a pittance is by sweeping snow from the streets or keeping doors at cinemas, and the like. Starvation has indeed only been averted by the splendid efforts of the Student Relief work in their provision of free meals and cast-off clothing. Similar conditions, I am credibly informed, prevail widely and increasingly in Germany, and of the intellectual classes, for whom universities cater, both among teachers taught in Russia and Poland, like piteous tales were told me. The slow death of the interest in the things of the mind, the mental starvation involved, the materializing of the spirit by the absorption in the unending struggle to keep body and soul together, pave the way for the loss of the best fruits of the heritage of our civilization. Terrible as the effects are on the physical life, the reaction on the higher life of the spirit may easily prove in coming days more terrible still.

It is not surprising that the second impression one gathers is the attitude of pessimism which is settling down on the best minds of Central Europe. I met editors, leaders of relief work, merchants and very many pastors, and all spoke in the same grave way of the outlook. In this respect the depression is deeper than a year ago. The remarkable fact is that all blame the peace much more than the war for the present result. The unsettled question of reparations overshadows all else. It is the universal conviction in Germany, and among all people of German origin, as well as in neutral lands, that the policy of the French is directed to the dismemberment and the industrial ruin of the German Empire, and to the demand at the same time for the exaction of impossible payments, far beyond even a prosperous country's capacity. This belief unites all political parties and all classes of the community in an attitude of antagonism to France. The real fear of the future is that Germany, in despair, may become the prey of revolution and be driven into an alliance with Russia. I found no one who was not persuaded that the continuance of the present drift will inevitably lead to the bankruptcy of Germany, and that such a collapse must involve Europe in financial distress. The breakdown of the Paris Conference and the determination of France to pursue its own plan must, in this state of feeling, have an incalculable repercussion, and the Prime Minister's openly expressed fear "of grave and even disastrous consequences" is only too likely to be realized.

ALEXANDER RAMSAY, D.D.

THE OBSERVER

The Encyclical of Pope Pius XI.

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

THE full text of the encyclical letter of Pope Pius XI has at last reached America. It makes intensely interesting reading and all of our readers who care to secure a copy of it in pamphlet form would, I am sure, find themselves in heartiest sympathy with almost everything the new Pontiff has to say about the present world conditions and their cause. Also, it is a good pamphlet for Protestants to read, as it sets forth officially the attitude of the Roman Catholic Church toward the various religious, social and world problems. How significant such an utterance as this is is realized when one remembers that it is read to some five hundred million people throughout the world. It is read in its entirety from every Roman Catholic pulpit in Christendom, although it is addressed primarily to the bishops. It deals with the present world situation, and in this regard is a very astute and keen piece of analysis. It then calls attention to the fact that practically every institution that man sets up fails to cure these ills and evils; that a cure can only be found in the application of the Christian faith to the whole realm of life.

One of the most arresting paragraphs in any recent literature is right at the beginning of this encyclical under the caption of "The Peace that Did Not Come." How true it all is. Listen to these words which I quote at some length because they are so significant:

"In fact, weapons have been laid down by the belligerents of yesterday, but here are fresh horrors and fresh fears of war in the Near East: terrible conditions aggravated in great part of those regions by hunger, epidemics, by devastations reaping numberless victims, especially the aged, defenseless women and innocent children.

"It can well be said that rivalry and strife continue still over all the immense theater of the World War, even if dissimulated by political dealings and concealed by the fluctuations of finance. These are evident in the press, booklets, newspapers and pamphlets of all kinds, not concealed or else partly hidden in the regions normally serene and peaceful for study and the advancement of science and art.

"Therefore, public life of peoples is still surrounded by a dense fog of hatred and reciprocal diffidences and offenses. If the defeated nations suffer more seriously, grave are the woes of the victorious; the smaller nations complain of being overcome and exploited by the greater, the greater are offended and complain of being wrongly judged and circumvented by the smaller; all suffer from the sad results of the past war. Nor did the nations who went exempt from the terrible war, who neither avoided its evils, nor succeeded in being free from the results thereof, feel less these results than the former belligerents. Past evils, still persisting, become always more aggravated owing to prompt remedies being impossible, the repeated attempts of statesmen and politicians to cure the evils of a shaken and corrupt society have had no good results and may have by their own failure increased the existing difficulties of social conditions. More so because the anxiety of people, about the menace of new wars, is increasing, nor, unfortunately, can it be foreseen if these will be more terrible and devastating than the last. As a result perpetual anxiety overshadows life, while the continuation of this harmful condition of armed peace, amounting almost to war, exhausts the finances of the people, wastes the flower of youth and poisons and troubles the best sources of its physical, intellectual, religious and moral life."

Another paragraph deals with the growth of the class war. It was thought that the war would put an end to the growing bitterness between classes, but it has intensified it. Capital and labor are arraigned against each other in deadly enmity. Bolshevism and anarchy lift their horrible heads in every quarter. The class war has become an inveterate and mortal disease which, like a destructive worm, is sapping all of society's vital forces. Excesses are everywhere condoned, and there is a general attempt in many countries to overthrow, not only the Christian faith, but the Christian morality.

The Pontiff paints in very mordant words the effect of all this chaos and fall of moral principles upon the family. The family is going to pieces, as is the rest of society, and just as the general uneasiness is felt in the hearts of nations and classes so the lesser parts feel the disturbance, and the ills that afflict society afflict the family. Divorce is almost driving marriage out, substituting what practically amounts to free love in its place. There is a point where divorce always becomes free love. When divorces are given and taken as easily and lightly as they are to-day, where marriage is understood as simply a business contract for living together until both partners wish the bargain dissolved, then you have nothing but free love. The Pontiff might well have added, although he did not do so, what is the truth, that you are just about as well off without the trouble of the marriage ceremony when marriage reaches this stage. Not only is the general moral degeneracy of the world felt in the loosening of the marriage ties and the immorality of the home, but "we see often a morbid restlessness spreading in every age and condition, insubordination and insufferance impermeating minds, more and more, contempt of obedience and intolerance of toil become habit; the modesty of women and girls set aside by licentiousness of dress, of conversation, of participation in immodest dances. The open insult to the misfortune of others is often rendered more provoking by the ostentation and impudence too frequently seen in those whom sudden gains have enriched, but not bettered. Consequently the increased numbers of disinherited and outcasts who almost always end by swelling the ranks of agitators of public and private order."

A great part of the letter is devoted to examining the causes which led up to the war and which plunged the world into its present unhappy stage. I need not go into this here, except simply to say that the Pontiff is absolutely right when he says that, whereas individuals have learned to live by the Christian principles, the nations have been living by the law of cupidity. They have been living in perpetual competition of ambitions. Every nation has been run simply by the law of self and self-advancement. This always is a source of strife and hatred; always international injustices grow out of it. When nations forget that people are brethren in the great family of humanity, and that other nations have a right to live and prosper, and "that it is never lawful or wise to disjoin the useful from the homes," then war always comes. But the Pontiff says the profounder cause of the war is that men everywhere have fallen away from God and Jesus Christ. This is why they have sunk into the depths of so much evil, and it is only when they shall come back to Him that they will have peace, fine peace.

The Pontiff also deals with the problem of the schools, but here not much is said with which we are not all familiar. The Pontiff insists that there can be no Christian regeneration where the children are not trained from their earliest childhood, and that religious training must go on simultaneously with the secular education. In Europe this is not much of a problem, because most of the schools are church schools. In our own country it is a great problem and the Pontiff does not touch upon it. We have got to do in America what I have been urging for some time. All over the country groups of the leaders of the Protestant Church and the Roman Catholic Church have got to get together and thrash out the problem. This would be a fine thing, not only for the question of religious education, but it would be a splendid thing for the leading Presbyterian, Baptist, Congregational and Methodist pastors to sit down for a whole day with a group of the finest ecclesiastics in the Roman Catholic Church. Neither one knows anything about the other in America, and it is time that some acquaintance was begun.

Large sections of the letter are devoted to what the Church should do to overcome these various evils, and there is quite explicit instruction about methods to be pursued for restoring Christian reign in the family, in the state, in the industrial situation, and in international relationships, all of which is good advice for Protestants as well as Catholics. In fact, there is very little in the whole letter that is not just as Protestant as it is Roman Catholic, unless it is the fact that the Pontiff believes in the Church more than the average Protestant and looks to the Church to accomplish the religious and moral regeneration of the world. The only thing that distinguishes this letter from a letter that the Federal Council might write is that the Pontiff considers the Church as the representative of Jesus Christ in the world and having authority to speak and act in His name. Of course, the Protestants will not admit this.

The encyclical rises to its highest point in the closing paragraphs of "The Path to True Peace" and the part the Church must play in it. The time has come when the Church must not only regulate the relationships of individuals and insist upon individuals ordering their personal life and relationships upon the teachings of the Christian faith, but the nations must also order all their relationships upon the Christian principle. The nations are bound by exactly the same ethical and moral laws as those by which individuals are bound, and the nations are as accountable to the Judgment Bar of God as individuals; there are no two moralities, no two ethics, no two codes of honor, no double standards of morality—one for a nation and one for an individual. There is only one, and that is the spirit and law of Jesus Christ. "When governments and nations will follow in their collective acts, be they internal or international relations, these dictates of conscience which the teaching, precepts and examples of Jesus Christ propose to and impose on every man, then only can they trust one another and have faith in the pacific settlement of the difficulties and controversies which might arise from different views and opposite interests."

So exercised has the Pontiff become over the troubled conditions of the world that in his encyclical he intimates his intention of calling a great world conference of all the bishops of the Roman Catholic Church in the near future to debate upon these things.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

A Near East Handbook

The Near East Relief has issued a pastor's handbook entitled "A Million Lives Saved," which contains an account of the work of the organization in the five areas of operation: Northwest Persia and Mesopotamia, Russian Armenia and Trans-Caucasia, Palestine and Syria, Constantinople and Asia Minor, and Greece. There is much concrete material concerning the field and the service that is being rendered on the basis of which to build a presentation of the Near East situation to a church congregation. Detailed suggestions are given for a church program. Among the many personal messages included is the following from Fred B. Smith: "I congratulate you that you are the messengers of a new kind of world."

THE WEEKLY SERMON

What the World Is Waiting For

By Rev. William Pierson Merrill, D.D.

Minister of the Brick Presbyterian Church, New York

"For the earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the revealing of the sons of God. For the creation was subjected to vanity, not of its own will, but by reason of him who subjected it, in hope that the creation itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now." (Romans 8:19-22.)

THE clearest evidence of that quality in the Bible which we call "inspiration," is the eternal freshness of its great sayings. They do not come as echoes of the dead past. They ring out like bells, calling us to present, urgent realities—church bells, summoning us to worship; fire bells, warning of danger; school bells, calling us to come and be taught. Here are words written nearly nineteen hundred years ago, and they fit the facts of the time like some editorial in the morning paper—yes, they fit better than any present-day editorials. Written nineteen hundred years ago! Yet if one would attempt to put in words the situation at present confronting thoughtful minds, the situation that sends us to the paper every morning with eager interest and anxious foreboding, he could not hope to state it better than it is stated in these words, coming from the ages past. Every morning we ask: "What is France doing? What is Germany doing? What is Turkey doing? What is being said and planned in Great Britain? What attitude is our Government at Washington taking? What about Russia? What about the radicals in this country and in other lands? What is the real meaning of this turbulent and tangled situation, and how can we best meet it?" Here, in these few words, from a letter a tentmaker once wrote to a little group of unknown folk in Rome, is the philosophy underlying the conditions of our own time.

That final clause startles us. We read it with a sharp poignant sense of hopelessness—"until now." "We know," Paul writes, "that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain until now." When he wrote those words, he was full of a radiant assurance that a new day had dawned; the groaning would cease, the hard labor would bring forth a new world. "Until now" these evil things had gone on; but from now on, things would be different. The Son of God had come, and a new order had sprung into being. Catching this vivid note of exultant hopefulness, our hearts cry out,

"O, had I lived in that great day,
How had its glory new
Filled earth and heaven, and caught away
My ravished spirit too."

But, friends, nineteen centuries have gone by, and still we have to say, "until now." Hopes have sprung up, only to fade into new disappointments, and still the whole creation is groaning, waiting for something, longing for deliverance, unable to see its way. Until now; yès, how much longer? "How long, O Lord, how long?"

Yet for us, as for Paul, if we be true Christians, there is hope as well as disappointment in those words "until now." Always the Christian says, "What has been until now, need not go on." True Christianity is always incorrigibly hopeful. Wherever there is a soul that has been touched by Christ, there hope springs up. The Christian refuses to believe that the best may not lie just ahead. Always he marches on with an excited feeling that just around the next corner may lie the Kingdom of God. So is it a challenge to us, as it has been to every age, this word "until now." Year after year, century after century, men have gone on their foolish, stupid, wasteful, cruel course. Christ has made a difference, yes, a great difference; but the knowledge of Him has not gone far, nor has it sunk deep. The groaning of all creation, the crying out for deliverance, has gone on until now. We still say what an acute critic said a half century ago, that our age is "wandering between two worlds, one dead, the other powerless to be born." "The old order changeth," yes, but for better or for worse? Where is the hope of the coming of the Kingdom?

Two practical questions arise. What is the real trouble, and what is the hope of salvation from it? What are Paul's answers to these questions?

Here is his analysis of the difficulty. "The creation was made subject to vanity." That word reminds us of the only sceptical book in the Bible, with the beat of its refrain. "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." The word Paul uses means "without result," that which is empty, ineffective. It means that which, in modern phrase, "gets nowhere." The creation, by its very nature, seems to be subjected to a process of continual disappointment. Nothing comes to fruition. Mankind is like that figure in the ancient Greek fable, painfully rolling the stone up hill only to have it break away to roll back long before it reaches the top. Is not that a true picture of human life, of this which we call social progress? Could you put it better in a phrase than to say that the whole world is subject to vanity? Greed, selfishness, strife—man spends himself on these, and the outcome is one disappointment after another.

But why is all this? Why has God made such a world? That is the question with which men have been struggling through the ages. And it has never been faced with greater intensity, or answered in greater variety, than during the past few decades, in which the vast increase of human knowledge has put an edge on ancient questions. Why is it that the creation is thus subjected to vanity, that man is thus doomed to a continual round of disappointment, ever on the march, never arriving? There are several possible answers. One says chance is the explanation; another says a hard, merciless fate is driving us on; another bows his head, frankly confessing agnosticism in the presence of an unfathomable mystery. There are men and women all about us, in your acquaintance and mine, who are giving these answers.

Many answers? Yes, but for a Christian there is only one answer, and that is the answer Paul gives. Ask him why it is that the world has thus been subjected to vanity, and he replies, "Not of its own will"—there we are all agreed; there is no doubt about that; no one would choose to go on with this round of emptiness. But Paul continues, "The creation was subjected to vanity, not by its own will, but by reason of Him who subjected it, in hope that the creation itself should be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the sons of God."

There is the great eternal and Christian answer to the problem of life. We believe that that is why God made the kind of world He has made, a world in which poverty and cruelty and disease and all sorts of evils run their free course, and bring to naught the fears and hopes of men. God is making such a world because He has in view, for ultimate goal, a world of freedom and glory and sonship, and that goal which is in the far off purpose of God could only be reached through the outworking of freedom, only as men are left free to plunge into all sorts of folly and vanity. The world is subject to vanity because it is capable of liberty.

There is no other way. If men are to be free, they must be free to make fools of themselves, free to be stupid and selfish, free to curse themselves and others with all the monstrous inventions of which the human intellect is capable. There is no other way. This ultimate glory of a world of men at once free and righteous must be left forever unattained, or it must be reached over this long hard, bitter way of leaving men free to do as they will, until they shall attain to the willing of what is right.

Here, then, is the picture of our world, the world of to-day, no less than the Roman world of the first century, groaning and travailing in pain, ever subjected to disappointment, but always capable of glory and freedom.

How emerges our second question, "What can be done about it?" Where lies the hope of salvation? What is it for which the world is watching?

"Oh why and for what are we waiting,
While our brethren droop and die;
And on every wind of the heavens,
A wasted life goes by."

Paul has his answer, clear, definite, positive: "The earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the revealing of the sons of God." There is a wonderful picture in that word translated "earnest expectation." Some one has said that a sculptor could carve a statue on the lines of this one word, for it means to wait with head erect and eyes on the horizon. It means to look for something to come as a shipwrecked mariner watches for a sail, or to stand on tiptoe, scanning the horizon for the coming of relief. It is so that Paul pictures this world in which we live.

Is not the picture true? Who of us is so dull of heart that he does not detect all through what is written and said and done in these strange days, this attitude of earnest, agonized expectation, waiting for something that shall bring deliverance. What is it to be? The world does not know. But we do know, else we are not Christians.

That one thing for which the world is waiting, for which it has waited for all these centuries, is "the revealing of the sons of God." What the world is waiting for is simply more Christians. We must go further, for we have made that word Christian a poor little word. What the world is waiting for is more Christians who are really like Christ. Think for a moment what it has meant, that into the life of the world has come one Son of God. Miss Maude Royden has said that this was the greatest of all Christ's miracles, that He, by his one short life, changed the course of history. Friends, one of the worst blunders Christians have made, so great a blunder that we may almost call it a crime, is that we have so persistently put that figure of Christ apart from the rest of us, failed to see that what He was, we ought to be, that that is the very meaning of His coming here, that there might be, as Paul says, "many sons," that He might be "the first born among many brethren."

A moment ago, I asked you to think of what it has meant to the world that there came into its life one Son of God. Think now of something more. What would it mean to the world of our day, if many sons of God were revealed, living as Jesus lived? That is what the world is waiting for. That and that alone can free it from its bondage to vanity, and lead it into the liberty of the glory of the sons of God.

You and I believe that, if we are Christians: What does such faith imply and require? It means something intensely personal for each one of us. The world is waiting and suffering for something which can only be supplied as men and women really become like Christ. What does that mean for me? What a call is in that fact, that I put myself into that group whose lives reveal the life of God. Am I like Christ? I profess a Christian faith; I am a member of a Christian church. Am I really, in any respect, like Him? Do I show in the presence of men how a son of God lives? That is the question for every one of us to face; until we have faced that, we have not begun to face our real Christian responsibility.

But there is a second implication in this answer. If this is what the world is waiting for, if this is the only, or the best, hope of salvation out of the mess that men have made of the world in which they live, how tremendous is the summons to every one of us to put his best into revealing in other lives their divine sonship, and to devote himself to that which shall make men realize their kinship with God.

Here again we come upon a great word, a picturesque word, which appeals vividly to the imagination. That word "revealing" means "unveiling." It is the word which the New Testament uses for that great final book of the Bible which draws aside the veil from the course of human life, and shows the eternal forces at work behind it. The world is waiting for the revealing of the sons of God. It is our high privilege, our urgent duty, to give to as many human lives as possible the chance to reveal the divine life, the capacity for which is hidden deep within them. We cannot give spiritual life to any soul; only the spirit of God does that. But even as our Lord stood by the tomb of Lazarus, called forth the dead man, and then said to His followers, "Loose him, and let him go," even so does Christ call to you and to me, his followers on earth to-day, to do our utmost to strip away these wrappings that keep the real self from being revealed, that hide the images of God that might be revealed in all human lives.

The men and women who make up the throngs in this crowded city, stand and walk about like veiled statues, uncouth figures. No one suspects the glory hidden there. It is our great business, as Christians, to devote ourselves, what we are and what we have, to this work of unveiling the sons of God, whether here in this city, or in distant China; only so can mankind ever be delivered from its bondage to vanity, and brought into the glory of freedom.

It is a very solemn thing to be a Christian in such a day as this, for to be a Christian is to profess a confident faith that we know what it is the world needs, that the saving power after which mankind is painfully groping in the darkness, is absolutely clear to us for whom the day star has risen. There are so many who do not know, who watch and long and hail any flaming portent, any self-advertiser, any promise, with pathetic eagerness. Is it not a very solemn thing to stand in such a world as this of to-day, and say, "We know what it is that the world needs?" That is what we say, if we are Christians, and instantly, if we have said that, comes back into our hearts the thrust of the keen question, "What are you doing about it? What are you going to do about it?"

Remember how we spent time and money and selves in the emergency of the war. It was right that we should. But here is something infinitely more important than the issues of the war, for it carries in it the only safeguard against recurring war, the only hope of victory over those malignant forces that are continually beating back to earth the poor, bruised race of mankind, ever looking for something better to come of it, ever condemned to a fresh disappointment.

Suppose Christians once really believed that in Jesus Christ and in what He reveals for every man, is the true hope of humanity. How we would give, how we would work, how we would push our saving enterprises here in this city and all over the world, bringing to light more sons of God, unveiling the image of God hidden in so many lives. How we would ourselves every day reflect, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, until we were changed into the same image, from glory to glory! What a mockery is a profession of Christian faith which does not get at the most serious business of one's life, so serious that it has a right to call for all our valuable time and strength and money, so serious that we stand condemned if we allow ourselves one foolish indulgence, one needless luxury, that takes resources which might have been used for making more lives like the life of Christ.

God will have a world at once right and free. The way to such a world is costly, tragic, long, and hard. There is no other way. But, oh, how glorious is the end to which it leads! Calvary shows that God will do His part; the solemn question is, "Will we do ours?" How long shall the weary world have to wait for that Christliness which it is our business, our privilege, to unveil? Even until now, the earnest expectation of the creation waits for the revealing of the sons of God. It need not wait longer, if Christians will follow Christ.

Foes of International Friendship

By Rev. Charles Edward Jefferison, D.D.

Minister of Broadway Tabernacle, New York

FRIENDSHIP is a delicate plant and is easily broken or blighted. It is a fragile creation, and to be preserved must be carefully safeguarded. Dr. Samuel Johnson reminded us long ago how important it is to keep one's friendships in repair. International friendships are especially complex and unstable, and one of their most deadly foes is neglect. Nations drift apart as individuals do through carelessness, and ignorance of the fundamental laws of life. It is only by conscious effort that two nations can be kept together in mutual sympathy and good-will. If they ignore each other, they become in time victims of suspicion, and all the other unholy feelings which work mischief in the world. It is not enough that friendly feelings should exist in the heart they must be expressed. Only the sentiments which find expression are likely to survive. Two nations which wish their lives to become intimately and helpfully intertwined must lose no opportunity to express publicly the sentiment of mutual good-will. By public and official acts the national attitude should be made clear to the people. Diplomats are never more profitably employed than when they are expressing to one another the higher aspirations and purposes of their respective governments. It is a revelation of the tardy progress of mankind in rational living that every nation has a Secretary of War and no nation has a Secretary of International Friendship. If nations had given themselves to preparation for peace with half the zeal with which they have given themselves to preparation for war, the world would have been saved innumerable tragedies, and the outlook for humanity would be to-day immeasurably brighter. Forming international friendships and maintaining them is a business which should be pursued with great diligence and enthusiasm through the generations. Great Britain and the United States have no more momentous task before them than the task of cultivating and expressing cordial relations to each other. It is on the basis of good feeling that all co-operative enterprises must be built. Without friendly feeling all efforts to construct programs of action must prove futile. Britain and America should cultivate the art of friendly speech. Taciturnity is an enemy to be feared.

And so also is ignorance. Ignorance is a moth which chews up the purple fabric of international friendship. Because nations live apart from one another they must of necessity lack that personal acquaintance on the part of the masses of the people which is so essential in keeping the mind clear of estranging illusions. It is a singular fact that we have a tendency to dislike the people whom we do not know. One of the worst perversities of the heart is its proneness to imagine dark things of people far away. In the ancient barbaric world a stranger was always counted an enemy. We have not entirely outgrown this feature of barbarism. Because we do not know foreigners, we become suspicious of them, and picture them planning evil things against us. Our suspicions deepen into fear, and fear if allowed to do its perfect work, builds up a deep seated feeling of dislike. In a crisis the dislike may flame up in fiery hatred. Against

(Continued on page 242)

NEAR EAST RELIEF

Incorporated by Act of Congress
(Formerly American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief)

151 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

Dr. Frederick Lynch,
70 Fifth Avenue,
New York City.

February 6, 1923.

Dear Dr. Lynch:—

I have just returned from a visit with your children—boys and girls who would not be living to-day, had it not been for the work of Near East Relief, of which you are a Trustee.

I saw a thousand of them, all boys, potential leaders of a New Near East, occupying the Kaiser's Summer Palace at Corfu.

I saw another 1,400 Armenian boys at Corfu—driven out of Asia Minor—temporarily domiciled in a half-ruined, abandoned warehouse. Most of them were sleeping on the floors, but some, more fortunate, occupied bins like shelving against the wall, floor to roof, six deep.

I saw nearly a thousand boys, recently arrived from "Pontus in Asia," now sleeping on the floors of the Zappeion Exposition Hall in Athens.

I saw four hundred girls, safe from Turkish oppression, occupying the Royal Palace facing Constitution Square in the heart of Athens.

I saw another 1,300 Armenian girls, salvaged from the orphanages of Constantinople. Some of these girls I recognized as members of a school orchestra that had played for our benefit at a reception the preceding summer, now transplanted, empty-handed, to begin life anew in a strange land.

I saw sixty-seven of these younger girls, all of them suffering from conjunctivitis, crowded into one room 20 x 20 feet in size, a cold rain falling outside, with no other place of abode, eating, sleeping, working or playing, night or day.

I saw in another room, scarcely larger, sixty-six infants, most, if not all of them, under three years of age, some of them dying as a result of the weeks of exposure, under-nourishment and hardship endured during their migration in mid-winter from the interior of Asia Minor to their temporary home in Greece.

I saw a portion of the 9,000 Armenian orphans who, by the grace of the Greek Government and people are temporarily occupying summer hotel buildings, but for whom we absolutely must provide other shelter before the summer begins in April.

Where shall these Armenian orphans go?

I saw three ships in the Piraeus Harbor, crowded beyond capacity with over 10,000 refugees from Anatolia, who could not be disembarked from their long journey and unsanitary environment on account of inadequate quarantine accommodations.

I saw a single ship that had carried 27,000 refugees from Smyrna to safety, transporting the incredible number of 11,500 on one voyage.

I saw in Constantinople Harbor another ship, decks packed with refugees obliged to flee from their homes in Asia Minor, but having no place to land except—Greece, war-stricken, impoverished, over-populated, the one country on earth that can least afford to extend hospitality to foreign refugees.

I saw Premier Gonatas, who, in behalf of the Greek Government, had welcomed to safety on Greek soil tens of thousands of Armenian refugees in addition to a million refugees of his own race, and who said that the Greek nation could never forget the service rendered by American relief workers in saving the lives and evacuating untold thousands of refugees during and following the Smyrna disaster.

I saw in one ramshackle building in Constantinople 300 newly made orphans, whom Near East Relief workers had picked up in the streets and abandoned homes of the one town of Ordu, Asia Minor.

I met in Constantinople our managing directors from the Caucasus, Syria and Palestine, reviewed with them the reports of the 25,000 Armenian orphans who are dependent upon us for their daily food in the Caucasus and of the 11,000 orphans in Syria and Palestine, more than 9,000 of whom are Armenians recently driven out from Harpoot, Caesarea, Marash, Konio (Iconium) and other areas of Paul's early missionary ministry into Syria and Palestine.

In my vision, I saw my own great, rich America, "clothed in purple and fine linen, faring sumptuously every day," enjoying comforts, luxuries, wealth transcending the dreams of the ancients, surpassing anything that the world has ever known, and which no American can appreciate until he has walked through the refugee camps in the "Land of the Stalking Death."

And I saw some—yes, many—of these fortunate American citizens expressing true religion and human brotherhood by giving of their bounty to bind up the wounds of those who have been stricken and robbed by the wayside, buying bread for the hungry, clothes for the naked, and medical ministry for the sick.

And I saw in this unselfish ministry of the American Philanthropists the best pledge and guarantee of international friendship, brotherhood, and good-will to all men, binding the nations together in co-operation that will make war increasingly difficult, because men and women thus united come to love and not to hate one another.

And I saw in the dim more distant future these infant children, grown to manhood and womanhood, with the impress of American benevolence on their lives, with the lessons of forgiveness, love and unselfish service ingrained in their character.

And I saw these—your boys and girls—potential leaders of a New Near East, forgiving their enemies, serving their fellowmen, and passing on to generations yet unborn the gospel of love, good-will and service which they have received and are receiving from you and other American Philanthropists.

That which battleships and battalions have failed to accomplish the magic power of love, unselfish service and world brotherhood will yet achieve.

Sincerely yours,

Charles V. Vickrey, General Secretary.

(Continued from page 239)

ignorance then we must wage everlasting warfare. Knowledge is essential to a world which would be happy. When we come to know people in foreign lands we find them amazingly like ourselves. They are not hostile to us nor are they hatching infernal schemes against us. They want to be our friends. They hate war and love peace. They are our brothers. The habit of speaking disrespectfully of foreign nations is a habit which ought to be broken. Children in the home should be trained by their parents to speak in friendly words of every foreign nation. A sneer at foreigners should be instantly rebuked. Teachers in the schools have no more important duty than training their pupils to hold the right attitude to foreign peoples. Racial prejudices should be rooted out. National animosities should not be allowed to grow. What does the world gain by instructing the intellect in language, literature and science if the heart is allowed to remain a nest of ugly and bitter feelings? No youth is properly educated who does not look with friendly eyes on all the nations of the earth. We shall never have a warless world until our schools become nurseries of good-will.

Another foe of international friendship is a degraded form of patriotism. Patriotism is a virtue, but like all virtues it can be counterfeited and perverted. It is a noble passion, but like all passions it can become diseased and pernicious. Patriotism is love of country, and so long as it is that, it is commendable and ennobling. But when patriotism becomes hatred of foreign nations, it is degrading. The man who measures his patriotism by his contempt for some other nation is both ignorant and vicious. Men like him are a stumbling block in the path of human progress. No country has reason to be proud of a man who cares for no country but his own. It is because of this degenerate form of patriotism that demagogues flourish and that Jingoism is extolled by the ignorant as national heroes and saviours. In every national legislature the Jingo is sure to be found, and wherever he exists, he works havoc with international friendship. A group of Jingoists in two countries can, unless resisted, break all the ties of good-will and postpone indefinitely the coming of the Golden Age. The men who prate most about their patriotism are sometimes among our most dangerous citizens. An astute Englishman, disgusted by the selfishness and dishonesty of the patriots of his day, once defined patriotism as the last refuge of a scoundrel. It is worse than that. It is one of the most plausible instruments yet devised for setting nations against one another. Beware of the patriot whose stock in trade is contempt for all nations but his own!

In the list of enemies of international friendship journalists of the baser sort must be given a high place. The daily press when in the hands of men without principle becomes a firebrand for starting international conflagrations. More than once within the last fifty years war has been precipitated by the frenzied utterances of an unscrupulous press. The freedom of the press is a blessing, but it has brought with it a long procession of curses. Men cannot safely be trusted with as much power as has been granted to the modern journalist. When his heart is noble he has vast opportunity for blessing the world, but when his conscience is undeveloped and his spirit is satanic, his power to work mischief is appallingly immense. No millionaire can so defile society and blight the hopes of mankind as can a millionaire with an evil heart who owns a newspaper. By the pens of a gang of anonymous liars and slanderers and rumor mongers he can defile the wells of international good-will and inject into the minds of millions a subtle poison which works constantly for the deadening of all the friendly feelings of the heart. He can criticize with insolent speech the policy of foreign governments against which he holds a personal grudge, and can hold up to ridicule day after day the official servants of friendly peoples. Like a pagan god he can throw thunderbolts at the heads of kings and princes, of diplomats and legislators, increasing the fever of the world's heart and making all of the world's problems more difficult to solve. The world has many intricate and baffling problems, but not one of them is more difficult or more momentous than the problem of reforming the press. How to convert it from a war-making engine into an agency working constantly for peace, is one of those colossal tasks to which future generations must bend their mind. Already there are high-minded servants of humanity not a few who are devoting themselves by their pen to the divine work of drawing nations closer together and laying the foundations of a warless world.

Among the crowned mischief-makers of our generation Big Business holds a conspicuous position. It was Big Business which brought on the Boer War, and it was Big Business which caused Russia to fling herself upon Japan. It was Big Business which worked along with other forces to bring on the greatest of all the wars. Ours is an industrial age and to keep the mills and factories all running, the world must be ransacked day and night for raw materials. Oil and rubber, coal and timber, gold and silver and copper and iron, these are the treasures for which the hands of nations are itching, and to obtain them multitudes of men are putting forth all their strength. The world is manipulated to-day largely by its manufacturers and merchants, its bankers and financiers. Every nation has its promoters and exploiters, its investors and concession seekers. Markets and raw materials and cheap labor—are not these the good things the Great Powers are seeking evermore? To assist them in their quest, powerful groups of capitalists make use of the Foreign Office of their government, and thus become the dictators of national policy. It was commercial greed which piled up the colossal armaments which precipitated the World War. It is this same greed which is now at the bottom of the unrest in Europe, and which is prompting all nations to fight one another with tariffs and all sorts of trade restrictions. How can the world ever settle down in peace until this wild and insatiable greed for markets and raw products is reduced? Britain and America are rivals in the most attractive and dangerous of all fields—the field of making money. Even well-meaning and high-minded men sometimes become overbearing and unscrupulous when they are running fast for great prizes. When we begin to count the forces which work against international friendship we must not omit greed.

The ignorant man, the insolent Jingo, the unscrupulous journalist, the greedy commercial exploiter, these four are to be found in all countries, and because they exist, a fifth man becomes necessary—the military naval expert. He is the fifth finger of the hand which is crushing the world. In order that his nation may have its place in the sun, this military specialist studies the science and art of war. He works out plans of attack and defense. He invents new instruments of destruction. He computes the adequate sizes of armies and navies. He makes out the navy and army budgets, grasping as much of the national income as possible. He does not love war, but he is always thinking about war. It is his profession. Because he is always thinking war, he is always talking it. He cannot help it. When he has opportunity, he writes about it. His one theme is "preparedness." That is something which no nation has ever yet possessed. It is an ideal which ever lures us on. When he retires at an early age on a generous pension, he gives all the remainder of his life to thinking and talking war. In this way he fans suspicion, and feeds fear, and makes it more difficult for nations to be friends.

RELIGIOUS BOOK WEEK

THE third annual celebration of "Religious Book Week" will take place March 4-10, and it is therefore with great satisfaction that we draw the attention of our readers to the important business of reading religious books. By religious books we do not mean simply those on strictly theological topics or that deal with the technique of religious activity or purely devotional subjects. We mean all those books which contribute in one way or another to discovering or strengthening or guiding the spiritual life of man. We mean the kind of book that Milton described when he said: "A good book is the precious life-blood of a master-spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life."

In Dr. Dale's famous "Nine Lectures on Preaching" two are occupied with the matter of reading and the recommendation is there made that reading for preachers ought to include books even of passing popularity as a means both of keeping in touch with the general thought of our age and as a relief from studies bearing directly on the preacher's duties.

More and more ministers in active pastorates are finding it necessary to know the books of their own day in order to make wise recommendations to those who ask questions of them for instruction on certain issues and as means of spending leisure time profitably and pleasantly. Happy is the minister who can lead his congregation not only to read but to read purposefully. Especially in these days of the short sermon and of increased emphasis on the teaching function of the Church is this important. One of the greatest aids to clear thinking is the reading of good books. It is one of the vital needs of our day.

If we depended for our knowledge of life upon the events of our own lives how poor we should be! Good books provide the entrance into a wider, a fuller, a richer life. W. C. Brownell, the critic, in a little book "Standards," published some years ago, says: "Mankind . . . is wiser than any man, and its correlative in the case of arts and letters is the public, whose co-operation is quite as important as that of their professional representatives. For it is always to be remembered that the cause of letters, the cause of art, is not that of its practitioners—hardly that of its practice—but of its constituting standards. Just as the cause of mankind is not that of the men who compose it, which it is the weakness of purely material philanthropy to forget."

The Best Three Books of the Year A Symposium

In response to a note from the Editor addressed to a number of eminent men and asking for a short answer to the question: "Which three books among the publications of last year have made the deepest impression upon you and why?" the following answers have been received. The Editor wishes to express to these men, several of whom wrote letters with their own hands, the sincere thanks of THE CHRISTIAN WORK for their courteous help:

S. PARKES CADMAN,

Minister of the Central Congregational Church, Brooklyn

"The three books which I have read with great pleasure and profit during the past year are: 'The Life and Letters of Walter Hines Page,' 'British History in the Nineteenth Century,' by G. M. Trevelyan; and 'The Life of Lafcadio Hearn,' by Nina H. Kumaxid."

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES,

Minister of the Community Church, New York

"I do not dare to say which 'three books among the publications of last year have made the deepest impression' upon me. Comparative values are always dangerous I am glad to name, however, three books which made a deep impression and which I would recommend to your readers. They are the following:

"1. 'The Reconstruction of Religion,' by Charles A. Elwood, a sociological treatise on religion of great value. I regard this as one of the most important books on religion which has been published in recent years.

"2. 'Conscription and Conscience,' by John W. Graham, an authoritative history of what it meant to be a Christian in England during the period of the World War.

"3. 'Up Stream,' by Ludwig Lewisohn, one of the most vivid autobiographies ever published and a healthy corrective of the sentimentalisms of the Mary Austin School of Literature."

HENRY E. COBB,

Minister of West End Collegiate Church, New York

"Christianity and Progress," by Henry Emerson Fosdick.

"The Finality of Christ," by W. E. Orchard.

"The Safest Mind Cure," by W. E. Orchard.

HAMILTON HOLT,

Editor of "The Independent"

"The three books that have made the greatest impression on me are as follows:

"First, 'Woodrow Wilson and World Settlement,' by Ray Stannard Baker. The best account of the Versailles conference yet written, not only from the standpoint of the historian, but from the standpoint of a man who understood thoroughly the underlying fight between American liberalism and European reaction in the diplomatic contest for peace.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

"Second, 'The Life and Letters of Walter Hines Page,' by Burton J. Hendrick. The best biography of the year showing that if Walter Page did not have the literary qualities of Lowell, or the inheritance of Lincoln, or the statesmanship of Bayard, or the wealth of Reid, or the golden personality of Choate, he did know America and therefore represented the American people better than any of them at the Court of St. James.

"Third, 'The Life of Samuel Train Dutton,' by Charles H. Levermore. The most inspiring account of how a poor boy came from the rugged farms of New Hampshire and by diligence and honesty became one of the great public servants of American progress."

RUFUS M. JONES.

Professor of Haverford College

"Your request for my reaction on the books of the year has reached me just as I am sailing away for Palestine. I have only a moment for a reply. The most important book of last year for me was Sir Henry Jones's 'The Faith That Enquires.' It is a great interpretation of idealistic philosophy and a robust Christian message for the time. I should put Lily Dougall's 'The Lord of Thought' second and Dean Inge's 'Outspoken Essays' (second series third, because of the illuminating confession of faith which occupies the first sixty pages. I am sorry that lack of time keeps me from saying more."

CHARLES S. MACFARLAND,

Secretary of Federal Council of the Churches of Christ

"This Freedom," by A. M. S. Hutchinson, which in a vivid way presents a problem bound to become a real one.

"A Christian Crusade for a Warless World," by S. L. Gulick, because it indicates a new opportunity for the leadership of the Church.

"Life and Letters of Walter Hines Page," by Burton J. Hendrick, which throws light on some present problems.

ARTHUR CUSHMAN McGIFFERT,

President of Union Theological Seminary, New York

"The only two books I can recall at the moment that I have greatly enjoyed are 'Pages Letters' and John St. Loe Strachey's 'Adventure of Living.' But I might add that I have read with pleasure and profit Dr. Fosdick's 'Christianity and Progress,' Dr. Coffin's 'What Is There in Religion,' and Professor Julius Beyer's 'The Literature of the Old Testament.' Most of my reading is done in old books!"

WILLIAM PIERSON MERRILL,

Minister of the Brick Presbyterian Church, New York

"The three books which I think have meant most to me during the past year are:

"1. Ellwood's 'Reconstruction in Religion.' This seems to me the best statement I have found for many years of the problems confronting Christians at the present time. It is a valuable book that raises questions, and this book raises them on every page.

"2. 'The Life and Letters of Walter Hines Page.' This is valuable as a biography, but much more valuable as a revelation of a great soul and a brilliant mind. I recall no letters better worth reading for their vivid style, unless perhaps the letters of William James.

"3. 'The progress of Religion to the Christian Era,' by T. R. Glover. So far as I know, this is a venture in a new field; certainly I have never found a book which so clearly summed up the progress of religious thought among the Hebrews, Greeks and Romans, and which showed the connections and contrasts between these types of thought and experience."

JOHN M. MOORE,

Minister of Marcy Avenue Baptist Church, Brooklyn

"Among the significant books that I have read recently I mention:

"1. 'The Reconstruction of Religion,' by Charles A. Ellwood, for its hopeful forecast of a religious revival in harmony with the scientific spirit and the demands of democracy.

"2. 'The Science of Power,' by Benjamin Kidd, which I have read and reread as an antidote to the poison of an anti-Christian and I think anti-scientific theory of biological determinism that characterizes particularly the work of one or two authors just now being widely read.

"3. 'The Victory Over Victory,' by John A. Hutton, which is about the first and only book of sermons I wished to read from cover to cover."

JOSEPH FORT NEWTON,

Minister of the Church of the Divine Paternity, New York

"I infer that you mean religious books, and in reply would say, first, that the most remarkable book I have read during the year is 'The Life of Christ,' by Papini, the Italian critic, sceptic, and atheist, who fell in love with Jesus while reading the Gospels to the peasants. It has all the vividness of Renan, but he sees Christ more clearly, not as a gentle, charming prophet of Galilee, but as the Lord of Love and the Redeemer of our troubled and tormented race. Second, the second series of 'Outspoken Essays,' by Dean Inge, whose pessimism is clearing up a bit, though still dark enough, but his keen mind sees through sham and unreality, and whose forthright style tells what he sees. Third, 'Lord, Teach Us to Pray,' by Alexander Whyte, one of the greatest volumes of sermons in our generation; a work of genius in which there is something titanic and overwhelming—the word of a mystic. As you limit me to three books, these are the first that leap to mind, which does not mean that they are all."

HOWARD C. ROBBINS,

Dean of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York

"Of the books which I read in 1922, the one which most impressed me was 'The Outline of Science,' edited by Professor J. Arthur Thomson, especially the first volume. Nothing that I have read in recent years has so opened up new and stimulating lines of thought. The book bathes the mind in a quite new appreciation of the beauty and majesty of the world in which we live.

"The most useful little book for a pastor interested in applied psychology was 'Psychology and the Christian Life,' by T. W. Pym.

"The best novel was 'Growth of the Soil,' by Knut Hamsun; a book extraordinary in its simplicity and power."

CHARLES M. SHELDON,

Editor-in-Chief of "The Christian Herald"

"In reply to your letter asking for books that have made an impression, I send you the following:

"1. 'The Cathedral,' by Hugh Walpole, because it called attention to the significant fact that many ministers think more of the formality of their religion than they do of practising the teaching of Jesus. It is a very impressive book, for without didactic preaching leaves that impression upon one of a great church official who was more religious than he was Christian.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

"2. 'The Outline of Science,' a series of volumes which have been appearing, giving in plain language for the most part, the achievements of science, in nearly every realm of human energy. I do not agree with some of the teaching, especially on the matter of evolution, but in the clearness of diction and for the information conveyed I find these volumes exceedingly helpful as illustrating what has been done by the human race along the line of scientific discovery. I also approve the attitude taken by the scientists when this book discloses the fact that they are not dealing with the creation of matter, but with what was already in existence and plainly say so.

"3. 'The Americanization of Edward Bok.' It has been helpful because it has illustrated what needs emphasis—the environment of this country upon those who enter it, shaping them into useful citizens. Mr. Bok's case is only one out of thousands of others, which will never be published.

Religious Romances

THE SHEPHERD PRINCE: A HISTORICAL ROMANCE OF DAYS OF ISAIAH

By ABRAHAM MAPU. Translated from the Hebrew by BENJAMIN A. M. SCHAPIRO. Published by the translator at 83 Bible House, Astor Place, New York City. Popular edition, cloth bound, $2.50. Edition de luxe beautifully bound and containing besides the 29 tail pieces, 12 full page pen and ink illustrations. $5.25.

The appearance of the limited edition de luxe of Mapu's "The Shepherd Prince," translated by Mr. Schapiro calls for more than casual notice. This masterpiece of the famous Jewish novelist has long been known to all students of literature, and it calls for great gratitude that Mr. Schapiro has now brought it within the reach of the English reader. The translation has been a labor of love on the part of Mr. Schapiro and he has given several of the best years of his life to its perfection. It retains the spirit and atmosphere of the original text as few recent translations have done. The book itself is one which no student of the Old Testament can afford to leave unread. It takes the period of the Prophet Isaiah, lifts it up out of history and makes it alive and vital, throbbing with human passion; showing the customs and life of the people and giving expression to the high idealism of the prophets as few historical novels have done. At the same time there runs all through the book the ideas of the author with regard to the life, thoughts, and aspirations of the chosen people. There is also a love story which, starting with idealistic tenderness rises to the height of a dramatic climax.

Mr. Schapiro is an acknowledged master of Hebrew and perhaps no one is more eminently qualified to make this translation than he. For many years he has been a writer on the Old Testament and has so lived in its pages that he was the one man in all the world to render Mr. Mapu's Hebrew text into the English language. Bishop Manning's praise of the book is none too high. In a letter to the publisher he says:

"On its literary side this volume will be to many a revelation, and it will be a revelation also in other and still higher ways. It will help many to understand, as they have not before understood, the faith, and the life, of the great people of Israel whom God chose to be the human means of His full revelation of Himself to us, in that One Who is to-day the Light of the World and the one Hope of mankind.

"In translating this work, Mr. Schapiro has rendered a service to literature, to religion, and especially to those who, being Christians, hold with the great Apostle that 'there is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bondman nor free-man, there is no male and female; for ye are all one—one man—in Christ Jesus.'"

THEY CALL ME CARPENTER: A TALE OF THE SECOND COMING

By UPTON SINCLAIR. Boni and Liveright, New York. $1.75.

This narrative is written by a "certain rich man" who is beaten by a mob, finds refuge in a church, and then sees the figure of a man coming from one of the glass windows in the building. The man's name is Carpenter. The rich man is attracted by Carpenter and together they go through many adventures. They meet Mathes Everett, Mark Abell, Luke Korwsky and John Colver. The Carpenter wins other disciples, too. It is a very vivid story, especially those parts telling of the Carpenter's relations with a movie magnate, the Church, and organized business. At one time He tells the certain rich man to go and sell all he has and give it to the unemployed. He meets Mary Magna and Simon Kovlin. He has great experiences with the press; the ex-soldiers, and the eagles in the parade remind him of Rome. He sighs and exclaims that Rome has not died. He visits those who are in prison. Finally, a mob tries to put an end to the Carpenter and his activities. He would be glad to die for these people but he escapes and betakes himself back to the window in the church. Finally, we learn it is all a dream, as some readers will expect. Mr. Sinclair says, "It is also a literal translation of the life of the world's greatest revolutionary martyr, the founder of the world's first proletarian party," taken from references in volumes which make up the Bible, specifically, to certain portions known as the gospels. We would like to express our admiration for this remarkable story, but our disagreement that it is a "literal translation" of the life of the Carpenter, about whose second coming Mr. Sinclair writes.

List of Books for Small Libraries

The readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK will be very much interested in the following list of books published during the previous year. This list is compiled by the Western Massachusetts Library Club and consists of those books which they regard as the best, or books which should be read by the intelligent man or woman interested in the problems of the day.

The list includes all branches of literature, but we are publishing here simply those which we think would be of the most interest to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK.

RELIGION AND ETHICS

Barrie, Sir James M., "Courage" (Scribner's; 60c). The rectorial address delivered at St. Andrew's University in which Sir James Barrie calls upon youth to use courage in the great fight that seems to be coming between them and their elders, to demand their rightful share in the shaping of the new world and to demand it courageously.

Brooks, Cyrus H., "Practise of Autosuggestion by the Method of Emile Coue" (Dodd; $1.25). A simple and comprehensive statement of the principles and practise of autosuggestion as taught by Emile Coue.

Fosdick, Harry Emerson, "Christianity and Progress" (Revell; $1.50). A brilliant clear idea of progress and what it means in the Christian faith.

Patri, Angelo, "Child Training" (Appleton; $2). Concrete illustrations given in an original fashion by an educator.

Wild, L. H., "A Literary Guide to the Bible" (Doran; $2). Sections are divided into folklore, storytelling, poetry, drama, etc.

HISTORY

Bryce, James, Visc., "The Study of American History" (Macmillan; $1.50). Its avowed purpose is to bring about a better understanding between England and America.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

Hackett, Francis, "Story of the Irish Nation" (Century; $2). Popularly written with strong patriotic feeling.

Powell, E. Alexander, "Asia at the Crossroads" (Century; $3). Deals with Japan, Korea, China, and the Philippine Islands and discusses complex matters with simplicity and clearness. An enlightening book on Oriental politics for the reader unfamiliar with the conditions in the East.

Quennell, M. and C. N. B., "A History of Every Day Things in England" (Scribner's; $5). Contains hundreds of illustrations in black and white and many colored plates, showing costumes, furniture, utensils, tools and architecture of Old England.

Ribbany, A. M., "Wise Men from the East and from the West" (Houghton; $2.50). A comparison of the imaginative philosophical spirit of the East and the practical material civilization of the West.

Russell, Bertrand, "The Problem of China" (Century; $2). A sympathetic and hopeful study of Chinese affairs.

Tappan, Eva M., "The Story of Our Constitution" (Lothrop; $1.50). Clear, readable account of the making of the Constitution of the United States. Illustrated with photographs. Text of the Constitution included and a good index.

SOCIOLOGY

Dennis, Mrs. Muriel (White), "Training School of Popularity" (Doran; $1.25). The letters of Jane Willard to Peggy MacIntyre, her adoree in high school.

Hungerford, Edward, "Our Railroads To-morrow" (Century; $2.50). The railroad problem discussed clearly and simply in terms understandable by the individual whose only relation to railroads is as a passenger.

Post, Emily, "Etiquette" (Funk; $4). The most popular manual on manners of the hour, very comprehensive, but rather expensive.

Pound, Arthur, "The Iron Man in Industry" (Atlantic; $1.75). Industrial problems created by the use of automatic machinery—what they are; can they be solved?

Roberts, K. L., "Why Europe Leaves Home" (Bobbs-Merrill; $3). A true account of the reasons which cause central Europeans to overrun America, which lead Russians to rush to Constantinople . . . which coax Greek royalty and commoners into strange byways and hedges; and which induce Englishmen and Scotchmen to go out at night.

Sharp, Dallas Lore, "Education in a Democracy" (Houghton; $1.25). These four essays are a plea for the public school as a training ground for democracy.

Stoddard, Lothrop, "Revolt against Civilization; the Menace of the Under Man" (Scribner's; $2.50). An arresting study of "Can Civilization Survive?" One hope of the future is in eugenics.

Sullivan, Mark, "The Great Adventure at Washington" (Doubleday; $2.50). A vivid and dramatic account of the conference on the limitation of armaments.

Van de Water, F. F., "Grey Riders" (Putnam; $2.50). The story of the New York State troopers; a record of brave deeds gallantly performed.

BIOGRAPHY

Bradford, Gamaliel, "American Portraits" (Houghton; $3). Contents: Mark Twain, Henry Adams, Sidney Lanier, James McNeill Whistler, James G. Blaine, Grover Cleveland, Henry James, Joseph Jefferson.

Davis, James J., "The Iron Puddler; My Life in the Rolling Mill, and What Came of It" (Bobbs; $2). The autobiography of the Secretary of Labor, who began life as a poor bootblack. A typical American story of a boy who rose from obscurity to prominence.

Depew, Chauncey M., "My Memories of Eighty Years" (Scribner; $4). Anecdotes and comments on men and affairs from the time of the Civil War to the present day. Entertainingly written, and full of information.

Farquhar, Arthur B., "The First Million the Hardest"

(Doubleday; $3.50). Characteristic of the author is the manner of his start in life by coming to New York from his home farm at the age of eighteen, to interview William B. Astor, James Gordon Bennett, A. T. Stewart and others on how to make a million dollars.

Hendrick, Burton J., "Life and Letters of Walter H. Page" (Doubleday; $10). These letters make a valuable history of our relations with England during the war. Most of them are written to President Wilson or Colonel House, and show the influence and personality of Mr. Page. Those who find the book expensive, should preserve the numbers of "The World's Work," in which it first came out.

Howe, M. A. D., "Memories of a Hostess" (Atlantic Monthly; $4). Material largely drawn from the diaries of Mrs. James T. Fields, whose home was often a meeting place for the famous Bostonians of the middle nineteenth century. Gives interesting glimpses of Holmes, Longfellow, Lowell and others.

Lane, Franklin K., "Letters, personal and Political," edited by Anne W. Lane and Louise H. Wall (Houghton; $5). In these letters is contained the record of the life and friendships of the Secretary of the Interior during the Wilson Administration.

Pringle, Mrs. Elizabeth W., "Chronicles of Chicora Wood" (Scribner's; $3). A story of southern life before and after the Civil War. The scenes are laid in Charleston, and on a plantation. Good picture of old time Negro life.

NATURAL SCIENCE

Curtis, W. C., "Science and Human Affairs from the Viewpoint of Biology" (Harcourt; $3.50). The author sets forth humanistic and spiritual aspects of science rather than material transformation and conquest of physical nature.

Hale, G. E., "The New Heavens" (Scribner's; $1.50). It is hard to conceive of a better layman's primer to converse with modern astronomy.

Hornaday, W. T., "Minds and Manners of Wild Animals" (Scribner's; $2.50). Authoritative information presented in a delightful manner.

Newbigin, M. I., "Frequented Ways" (Houghton; $3.50). A general survey of the land forms, climates and vegetation of Western Europe, considered in their relation to the life of man.

Scoville, Samuel, "Wild Folk" (Atlantic Monthly; $2). Dramatic stories of animals, in forest and river settings, vividly described.

Squier, E. L., "The Wild Heart" (Cosmopolitan Book Company; $2). Appealing account of the experience of a little girl and her brother with different birds and animals.

Thomas, J. A., ed., "The Outline of Science" (Putnam; 4 vols.; $3.75 each). A fascinating book of science for the layman who takes an intelligent interest in the latest theories and discoveries. These four volumes will give the reader a better idea of present-day science than would several times as many volumes on special subjects.

LITERATURE

Burroughs, John, "The Last Harvest" (Houghton; $2). The last posthumous volume by Mr. Burroughs after he had reached the age of eighty.

Drinkwater, John, "Seeds of Time" (Houghton; $1.25). A collection of poems in which are unity of thought and ideals.

Egan, M. F., "Confessions of a Book-Lover" (Doubleday; $2). In these chapters of literary autobiography Dr. Egan writes of the books he likes and of the debt he owes to them.

Galsworthy, John, "The Plays. Fifth series" (Scribner's; $2.50). This volume includes "Loyalties."

Lewis, B. R., "Contemporary One-act Plays" (Scribner's; $2). Plays selected to meet the need of the student or teacher, who desires to acquaint himself with the one-act play as a specific dramatic form.

Richardson, W. L., "Literature of the World" (Ginn; $2). Brief sketches of outstanding literature of different countries of the world.

Shay, Frank, ed., "Treasury of Plays for Women" (Little; $3). The plays in this book contain only women characters or such male characters as can be played by women.

Sheringham, Hugh T., "Ourselves When Young" (Putnam; $1.75). A compilation of delightful sketches of child life, filled with quiet humor.

Van Doren, Carl C., "Contemporary American Novelists"

(Macmillan; $1.50). An examination of the American novel of the last twenty years in really an analysis of contemporary American civilization.

Van Dyke, H., "Companionable Books" (Scribner's; $2). Books the author loves.

Wilkinson, M., "The Dingbat of Arcady" (Macmillan; $1.75). A description of a journey in a flat boat down the Willamette river in Oregon and camping trips by boat, bicycle and Ford in this country and England.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Present Status and Tendencies in Rural Community Organizations

By Professor Walter Burr, Ph.D.

of the Kansas State College of Agriculture

[Some of our readers will not agree with Professor Burr and the correspondents whose opinions he embodies in this article. He does make, however, an interesting proposal which is significant as representing a cross-section of the thought of a group of rural leaders who are sympathetic with the Church. Professor Burr is himself a Congregationalist pastor in good standing and is at present assisting a country church. The following article was read at the fifth annual meeting of the American Country Life Association.]

A STATISTICAL study of the rural community organization situation would be quite impracticable, due to several factors. The lack of uniformity in interpretation of terms; the temporary or even emergency nature of many local organized activities; the bias with which reports are made, according to whether the reporter is favorable or unfavorable to certain projects, and the ability of the investigator to juggle his statistics for purposes of his own particular propaganda—all of these would discount the value of such statistical study.

The writer of this paper sent out a list of questions to which there could be no statistical answers, and the replies are made the basis of this paper. They are frankly the opinions of the men working in the economic or social fields. One hundred letters were sent out to directors of extension and professors of rural sociology and kindred subjects. The questions asked were:

1. Is the community movement in your State more active or less active this year than previously?
2. Is the church making progress as a community center?
3. Is the school making progress as a community center?
4. Which is making greater progress in local communities—economic organizations or social organizations?
5. What plan of local organization is meeting with the greatest success and favor? (Community Council, Community Club, etc.)
6. What are some localized organized projects that are just now especially successful?

7. What recommendation do you offer as to the future of rural community organization in the United States?

With regard to the general community movement being more active or less active, forty-one replied in the affirmative and fifteen were either doubtful or negative. In the letters which many wrote accompanying their formal replies opinions were amplified, showing a most healthy situation from the average local community standpoint. We will sum up these opinions:

From the standpoint of noticeable enthusiasm for the movement, it is difficult to judge in a comparative way, because we passed through the intensive period when the community was made the basis for every kind of mass appeal.

We now know that much of this enthusiastic action was of a war emergency nature, and in many cases might be classed as due to crowd psychology. Therefore, from the standpoint of enthusiastic response to local endeavors, comparisons of the present time with that time would be unfair.

Another consideration in this regard is that a movement often attracts while it is new. Publicity agencies feature it because of its news value. Ambitious people get their frail crafts upon the wave as it rolls in, hoping to ride to position and fame. But the ebb tide must come, carrying some of these out to sea again and leaving the wrecked barks of some upon the shore.

But the people have often incorporated the new community ideas into terms of local action, and the movement as such disappeared because it became part of the permanently organized life of the community.

This latter result has probably been secured in more cases than we imagine. There can scarcely be a school or a church or a farmers' organization or a social club in rural America that has not incorporated into its normal life some of the good effects of the rural community movement, even though the movement as such may seem locally to have waned.

The opinions with regard to the progress of the rural church as a community center are less uniform, and therefore less easily interpreted. This is probably due to the fact of a wide variance of opinion on the fundamental question of the true function of the church in society. A number of the answers, show, however, a considerable agreement with regard to the sort of church that is succeeding, or would succeed, in the rural community. It must be remembered that the opinions are from the standpoint of economists and sociologists rather than from ecclesiastics. Twenty-five cannot see that the rural church is making progress as a community center. Some of these qualify their statements with the frank admission that in isolated instances there are outstanding exceptions. The statement is commonly made that the church referred to has the entire and undisputed field. Among those who declare that the church referred to has the entire and undisputed field a considerable number base the conclusion upon the fact that church federation is gaining ground, or that plans of interchurch comity are making progress.

The rural church movement must be considered as fundamental in the entire rural organization field. It presents, however, a unique phenomenon in that field. Rural community organization proposes frankly to combat the natural independence and provincialism of the rural individual. It proposes to bring into one functioning body all local functions, so that they may work for the common welfare. The term "community center" suggests a circumference, enclosing activities functioning from the center out. But the rural church as it developed in a previous era in our history runs counter, in organization form, to this conception of the community. Obviously, when we get people converted to the community idea they will break away from their cliques and factions and be "all with one accord in one place." After crucifying the early advocates of the church as a community center the great denominations saw that rural people themselves were being won to the idea, and national bodies and leaders hastened to get into the band wagon. To an observer who was not unduly careful as to whether or not he himself were trampled upon, and therefore could go a close-up, it was at once saddening and ludicrous to see pompous dignitaries who had formerly tried to impede this progress jostle each other to get to the driver's seat.

The writer is not a physicist or an engineer, but is strongly of the opinion that there can be but one center to one circumference. To the extent that church leaders win the people to the community service idea, to that extent they destroy the idea of sectarian loyalty. So we have the anomalous situation in many a local field of a local leader sent in to build up a local denomination, with the ecclesiastical guillotine waiting if he fails to do so, and at the same time carrying a high commission and training to promulgate the very gospel of community service that will destroy the local denomination as surely as that gospel has power to convict people of the sin of useless strife and division. The writer shares with some of his correspondents the amazement at the sheer lack of logic in this sort of a community church movement.

The writer and his correspondents do not propose a definite organization solution of the problem, but venture the following statement:

There are thousands of rural communities in America where religious organization divisions are not based upon any differences in conscientious convictions on religious matters.

In these communities the people are ready to come to the parish plan of religious organization.

In many of these communities the ministers are ready to adopt a unified parish or community plan of religious functioning.

Such a plan cannot meet with permanent success as an isolated local plan of union or federation, because of the necessary world nature of the church conception. Some kind of connection nationally and universally is absolutely essential.

Six or seven denominations are all that are involved in the problem. Conclusion: The national controlling or dominating heads of these denominations, with headquarters for the most part in Boston, New York and Philadelphia, either are unpardonably ignorant of the situation throughout the entire area west of them, or have not sufficient statesmanship to make a plan that will re-establish the American parish, or else must plead guilty to the old-time indictment, "They seek their own, and not those things that are Jesus Christ." The writer believes that we need a rural church commission, with a pooling of funds now being wasted in rural home missionary work, and with a field agent who could go to a community ready for the parish plan and say: "I officially represent all of the religious bodies represented locally. Here is our plan for co-operating with you in handling your situation. We will put money back of the plan to assure its success. We will arrange matters of local fellowship and world church funds, and so on. Now let's go!"

Some time we will secure the Christian statesmanship that will dare take that step.

As for the school, suffice it to say that our correspondents who say that the school is progressing, almost without exception qualify the statement somewhat thus: "Especially in those cases where we have established consolidated schools and community high schools."

Economic organization has been dealt with elsewhere and it is only left for the writer to sound a note of warning which is sounded by practically all my correspondents—namely, that economic and social organization must go hand in hand. While it may be true that good roads, good schools and adequate social life have grown naturally out of organized economic conditions in a great Western State, yet it may just as well be true that the economic organization was made possible because that State drew a large part of its citizenship from the background of the social culture of the East, and that social intelligence trained in that eastern background made economic organization, with all the other good things mentioned, possible.

Our correspondents agree, without exception, that there is no hard and fast plan of local community organization to be advocated. Perhaps we would just as well lay that ghost now. The plan is best in any time and place that works best, whether that be community club, community center, parent-teachers' association, or what not. The important thing is that it be a unified plan, that it be true to certain principles of action, and designed to develop our all-round community life.

Finally, as to recommendations: There seems to be no doubt in the minds of our correspondents that the biggest going form of rural organization is the farm bureau. There is criticism, however, both from directors of extension and professors of rural sociology, that the county agent plan is limited in functioning for social welfare. The Smith-Lever funds were granted "for demonstration work in agriculture and household economics." Our men are trained in agricultural divisions and usually decide upon county agent work during the last six months before graduation. Their agricultural knowledge they have. They know how to handle crops and pigs and cattle. But when the young fellow gets into the job in his county he finds that his job is actually to handle men and women and children.

The director of this work in the States Relation Service stated recently that the county agent's job is economic, educational and social. But we know that social work under modern conditions is a specialty, requiring special professional training. The county agent does not have this training. Now there may be certain other kinds of training which he does not have. He is not an entomologist, for example. The college extension division therefore employs a specialist in entomology to go to the county to assist the county agent in the special need. The extension department will send him a hog specialist to help him in the specialized field of hog feeding and breeding. Very well—he is not a social specialist. Then the statement is definitely made that one phase of his work is social work. The States Relation Service and extension department co-operatively should employ in each State at least one specialist in rural sociology to go to his county and aid in the social task. Possibly there has been danger in the past in some sections in dealing with agricultural extension. We have been long on the "agri" and short on the "culture." We are now understanding that the rural people themselves are the chief part of the agricultural problem and opportunity, and that the demonstration work in agriculture properly includes the demonstration of the culture of rural people.

Very evidently, from the information of my correspondents, rural organization has gone about as far as it can go by means of special campaigns and emergency movements. Simplification within the recognized limits of certain institutions seems to be the necessity and tendency. Whatever we do from this on should be done in the interest, not of movements and facts, but of the home, the church, the school, organized business in the farm bureau, and rural government. We are entering a time when we may expect further progress only through adjusting our fundamental institutions to the known rural needs of the time.

The Wide Scope of a Small Church

ON behalf of the Home Missions Council, Dr. Lemuel Call Barnes, of the Baptist Mission Society, has prepared a little folder entitled "The Wide Scope of a Small Church." We print five of its twenty-nine excellent suggestions:

Approving wholesome amusement. Practically every young person gives the major portion of his spare time to seeking enjoyment. Whatever the church may feel compelled to disapprove, it should make itself known chiefly, not by its negatives, but by its positive sympathies with young life, smiling ten times more than it frowns. Help both silently and vocally to get good things going. Youth makes character through play.

Christianizing industry. The chief occupation of most men is earning a living or a competency. Work is a primary means of grace. How it needs to be made glad and altruistic by the Spirit of Christ! A church may not often know the complicated factors well enough to take sides in a labor dispute. But it is its business constantly to teach the principles of justice and fraternity which alone can finally settle such matters.

Making world sympathy keen. Every continent, country and island of the sea can be lifted above the horizon for study, prayer and good understanding. Pictures are useful. Many a small church has cultivated the interest of common people in far away members of the human family and become a hot-bed of universal service.

Co-operating with other churches. In the thousands of cases where there is only one church in a community a manifold program may appear inviting. Where there is more than one church a primary opportunity is that of conferring together as to the welfare of the neighborhood and planning a division of labor in endeavoring to meet certain needs, and joint action in all matters in which that is practicable.

Undertaking only such things as are adapted to the particular makeup and surroundings of your church. Two or three things steadily pushed do more good than twenty things dabbled about. It will make a great difference in certain measures whether a small city church is in a residential or an industrial neighborhood and a small village church is concerned mainly with agricultural or with manufacturing people.

THE FARMER AND HIS COMMUNITY

By DWIGHT SANDERSON. 254 pages. $1.25.

This volume is one of the series entitled "The Farmer's Bookshelf," which is being published by Harcourt, Brace and Company and edited by President Kenyon L. Butterfield, of the Massachusetts College of Agriculture. It is a very valuable series and Professor Sanderson's book is one of the most valuable of any that have yet appeared.

It is a book that more than meets expectations, and it is particularly refreshing in view of the superficial, ill-assorted material that has been coming from the press in the last year on the general subject of the community. The volume contains a fund of information, the style is easy and carries the reader along from page to page. Professor Sanderson seems to have the facility for picking out just the illustrations that will drive home his ideas, and his ideas are stated in clear-cut English. The reviewer unhesitatingly recommends this as the best book on the rural community of which he knows and one that ought to be in the hands not only of farmers, but of those who work with farmers.

The Best Three Books of the Year

The following letter from Dr. Woelfkin was crowded out of its place with the symposium which begins on page 243:

"The three books which have left the deepest impression upon me in my last year's reading were:

"First, 'The Spirit,' a series of essays under the editorship of Dr. Streeter of England. This series carries one not only into a psychological analysis of the work of the Spirit, but really has in it the pulse of spiritual quickening and revival.

"The second most impressive book was 'The Life of Louis Pasteur,' written by his son-in-law, Ribout. This biography reads like a romance and is the revelation of a devout and reverent scientist for whom science is a means of walking amid the mysteries of God, and communing with the eternal spirit.

"The third book was 'The Conquest of Fear,' by Basil King, and while one would not underwrite all the implications or theological suggestions, yet the book carries one into the prophetic spirit of both the Old and New Testaments and puts one on the clew of an inheritance in our religion.

"'The Disciplines of Freedom' is also a book which impressed me very deeply and is suggestive of studies in the religious life."

CORNELIUS WOELKIN,

Minister of the Park Avenue Baptist Church, New York.

International Sunday-School Lesson

March 4, 1923

Jesus Teaching in the Temple

LUKE 20:1-21:38.

"And it came to pass, on one of the days, as He was teaching the people in the temple," etc.—Luke 20:1.

WHAT a day that was in the life of Jesus, when he taught and preached in the temple and the keen-witted, vindictive Pharisees tried their best to catch Him in His words! Yet it was evidently one of many days, for we are told that "He was teaching daily in the temple," and again that "every day He was teaching in the temple; and every night He went out and lodged in the mount that is called Olivet."

How much we would give if we could have a transcript of all those days! It would be worth more than all the commentaries in all the world's libraries. Apparently the writer picked out one day's story as a sample of our Lord's teaching, and for this we are most grateful to him.

It is evident that the ancient temple was very different from our modern churches. It was not shut up six days in the week and open the seventh for an hour and a half in the morning. It was a place where people came and went, where they asked questions and sharpened their wits, a place for truth seekers, for honest doubters, and for skeptics who wished to show their dialectic skill and try to get the better of a disputant. It was an open forum, where question and answer, teaching and preaching, went on all day long, open to everybody who had a question to ask or an idea to communicate.

We have nothing to correspond to it in our modern religious life. It was a church, a theological seminary, a lecture platform, a classroom, combined in one. Here a new teacher could propound his views; here his opponents might catch him tripping if they could; here his followers might imbibing his spirit and learn the lessons he would teach.

This rare day, so fully recorded, tells us much concerning the methods and character of Jesus' teaching.

He was approachable. He would not keep away or retire from His most inveterate enemies. He knew that they were there to catch Him in His words. He knew in advance that they would twist His meaning, deride His views, mock at His principles; yet day after day He resorted to the temple and let any come who would.

How much more glad must He have been to meet a sincere seeker, a true disciple! Doubtless there were many such, for we read that "all the people came early in the morning to Him in the temple to hear Him." Eager anticipation and sympathy are implied in this phrase. They were not all scoffing scribes and legal quibblers that came to trip Him up and try His temper and the metal of His intellect. Among that eager morning crowd must have been many sincere seekers for the truth.

He is the same teacher now. He welcomes our approach. Our doubts will not offend Him if we are honest. Our longings for the truth He will recognize. "He that cometh to me," He says, "I will in no wise cast out."

Fellow disciples, let us avail ourselves of our wonderful opportunity. Jesus is still in the temple. Every morning and evening He is there, and He does not go away to the Mount of Olives at night. He is ever approachable, always anxious to listen to our questions, always ready to resolve our doubts.

The intellectual quality of the Master's teachings and His answers must strike every reader. His enemies must have sent their sharpest dialecticians to entrap Him. They doubtless consulted together in advance, saying, "Where is His weakest spot? How can we confuse and anger Him? What question will expose Him to the wrath of the people or the authorities?"

"First," they said, "we will try to bluff and browbeat Him out of His pretensions to authority." So, putting up a bold front, and evidently interrupting Him as He was teaching and preaching the "good tidings," they said roughly, "Who gave you a right to teach here, as though your word was law? Does any school of philosophy vouch for you, a Nazarene, a peasant from the country? Show us your credentials."

With consummate skill He parried their onslaught by asking the delicate and disputed question about John's baptism, and then turning to the people who still thronged around answer concerning His authority which He would not give to mocking faultfinders.

His authority was the authority of the King's Son whom the Lord of the vineyard sent at length to the rebellious, hateful and hating husbandmen. They turned from Him, they cast Him out, they killed Him. Did the chief priests and scribes and elders see the point? The people heard Him, and whether they fully understood Him or not they must have seen that He spoke with the majesty and authority of the King's Son. But the scribes and chief priests knew what He meant, and it angered them exceedingly so that they sought to kill Him, which they doubtless would have done on the spot had they not feared the people.

There was another trap which they might lay for Him, the old question of God and Cæsar. Surely by this they might get Him into trouble, either with the Roman authorities, or with the devout Jews who hated Him. The trap was skillfully laid, but they were dealing with one keener and cleverer than themselves, and He solved the riddle, not only for those priests, but for all time. There are duties that we owe to Cæsar, obedience to righteous law and righteous authorities.

We have just taxes to pay, duties to our community, to our relatives, to our families, but they do not interfere with our duties to God, and to our own souls. In fact, in paying tribute to the one, we are at the same time, as good citizens, good neighbors, good parents, paying tribute to God.

The scribes and the chief priests had had their turn, and now the Sadducees came to the front, on this eventful day, with the foolish question about the much-married widow. His answer seemingly convinced them. At least, so convincing was it that they durst ask him no further questions.

Our Lord's answers were not merely a matter of fencing, of parrying their blows, and closing the mouths of his adversaries. He did not simply show his sharpness and wit and his ability to outshine his opponents. With every answer he taught a lesson. We are apt to think, if we can only silence our opponent, that we have won the battle; far from it, unless we can lay down a principle or teach a lesson that will go deeper than a mere display of dialectics.

In every case Jesus did this. The parable of the lord of the vineyard taught not only the Jews but all future generations, Whom he represented and by Whose authority he spake. It may not have convinced the cavilling scribes, but it has been a source of authority for every believer since. "Thus saith Jesus," we can say, for he came from the Lord of the vineyard to bring a message to us, the husbandmen. Some have heard and heeded it. Others have crucified the Son. But the world at large has acknowledged his authority even when it has not obeyed his behests.

His parable of the denarius, and its image and superscription, taught the whole world another lesson, as we have already seen, and the reply about the seven-times married woman, told not only the Sadducees but us, much more about the future state than any ouija board can ever tell.

What glorious truths are here crowded into a few sentences: "Equal to the angels," "sons of God," and the "God not of the dead but of the living!" No wonder that even these hecklers cried out, "Teacher, thou hast well said."

Teaching was not enough, for rebuke and warning have their place with every true teacher as well as instruction. Beware, beware of hypocrisy, of long prayers uttered for the sake of being heard of men, of long robes and chief seats and salutations in the market-place, an ambition for which sucks the very life-blood of religion from the human heart.

Thus the wisest of teachers turns the tables on his wily adversaries. They came to scoff; they went away, if not to pray, at least to hide their diminished heads in shame. "They durst not any more ask him any question."

Another unrivalled gem we find in this lesson, and one to which the attention of the younger pupils is especially directed. The lesson is taught in the parable of the poor widow who cast her two mites into the treasury. This little story has consecrated for all the future ages generous poverty and has blasted with everlasting infamy ostentatious gifts that are given merely to be seen of men.

Here, if we read it carefully, we learn the difference between God's judgments and man's, the worthlessness of mere money without the heart gift; the preciousness of the mite that goes with the heart.

Thus our Lord turns to account in his teaching every little event. No one else doubtless noticed this poor, shabby woman glide quietly up to the treasury and throw in her poor offering. If they did, they gave her no thought. What is she? A nameless widow. What is her gift? A mite or two. See the rich Pharisees throwing in their gifts with a flourish and a loud clash of coins into the offering box.

We see the same parable enacted in every church. I have heard collectioneers, if I may coin a word, eulogize a silver offering, no pennies wanted. I have seen subscription papers always headed by the

Send for Booklet today!

LEARN how to make a safe investment and secure an assured income for life yielding as high as 8% with

No Anxiety
No Fluctuations
No Inheritance Taxes

A real bond with a donation feature endorsed by leading churches of all denominations

Write for Booklet No. 29

NEW YORK BIBLE SOCIETY
Oldest Bible Society in New York
5 East 48th Street New York

Tusculum

A thorough Christian-character-building College. Established 1794. Address

President O. O. GRAY, D.D., Greenville, Tenn.

CHALFONTE-HADDON HALL

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

*Quiet — Homelike — Delightful
On the Beach and the Boardwalk*

Vernon Room March Musicales

Every Saturday evening thru March, by celebrated members of the Metropolitan and Chicago Operas and other eminent concert artists:—Paul Althouse, Rudolph Bochco, Madeline Brard, Clara Deeks, Giuseppe de Luca, Beniamino Gigli, Helen Hobson, Susanne Keener, Queena Mario, Erwin Nyiregyhazi, Lucille Orrell, Paul Ryman, John Charles Thomas, Cyrena Van Gordon, Raoul Vidas.

LEEDS AND LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

Write for Folders. Make Reservations. American Plan. Always Open.

name of the richest man and the biggest sums; then come the dollars, but there is no place for the quarters and the dimes. I have heard a man boast unendingly and repeatedly of his great gifts to charity, or to an institution, but never a word about the worthiness of the cause to which he gave or the God in whose name he was supposed to give it.

Ah, if we could look at the collection place or the subscription paper with Jesus' eyes, what should we see? He alone knows.

Oh, Son of God, teach Thou us the lessons of this great day in the temple! Open our eyes to realities. Show us how to answer Thine enemies, how to rebuke the ostentatious sinner, how to appreciate and applaud the humble saint. Teach us these things, and our study of this lesson will make us forever wiser and better men and women.

REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

DR. PERCY STICKNEY GRANT:
A LAYMAN'S IMPRESSION

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

A layman may well hesitate to comment on questions of theology. Let the doctors of the law see to these matters. But when the plain truths on which are founded a man's reasons for believing in Christ are called in question he may with propriety state his opinion.

The Rev. Percy Grant has raised no new problem. Questions regarding Christ's divinity, power, etc., are centuries old. The fact of the matter is Christ is insoluble by reason alone. To deny his divinity is no more unreasonable than to deny his power to work miracles; and such a denial in turn is no more unreasonable than to deny his virgin birth, his resurrection or the fact of his existence. If we rely on reason alone, why not go a step further and deny the existence of God? Can you prove to me, by science or reason, that there is a God? You may give me very good arguments to show that there is no accounting for many indisputable facts except on the theory of God's existence. But in turn I may reply that all these facts are indeed indications of such a Being, but I want something more convincing, something definite, something that compels my reason to accede. And you are dumb. It can't be done. There is nothing new in all this—every thinking person meets this problem. Why then worry over Mr. Grant's doubts or disbelief? It is unfortunate that he should proclaim these doubts from the pulpit of a church which professes a creed quite contrary. Better taste would have led him to resign first and then to have given expression to his theories. Did he fear that he would lose the apparent advantages of an audience and publicity by such a course? Surely Mr. Grant would not stoop so low. What then was his reason? Let us be charitable and suppose he did not fully realize the position he was placing himself in. If such a supposition is not true he needs our sympathy indeed for his lack of common sense and appreciation of the opposite.

But to return to what is important: If the agnostic has reason for his disbelief, have I less reason for believing? Are not my arguments for God's existence as sound

Religious Book Week

MARCH 4-10

Place of Jesus in the Life of Today

HENRY KINGMAN 1.25
A reappraisal of Jesus for the men and the women of this generation.

Faiths of Mankind

EDMUND D. SOPER 1.15
A complete elementary handbook on comparative religion—human, vivid and readable.

Manhood of the Master

HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK 1.15
Vividly sets forth the personal qualities of the Master. Brilliantly written.

Modern Problems as Jesus Saw Them

HERMAN HARRELL HORNE 1.15
Deals with the qualities of character which Jesus showed and which must be developed in the individual for the salvation of the social order.

Meaning of Faith

HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK 1.35

Meaning of Prayer

HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK 1.15

Meaning of Service

HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK 1.25
Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick has won renown and gratitude as the author of these books. Popular theology, ethics and psychology—the deepest things of life are presented convincingly, suffused with a true religious atmosphere.
The THREE books uniformly bound in cloth, with morocco ridge, gold stamped, gilt top, with silk marker, enclosed in an attractive carton, 5.00 postage paid.

Facing the Crisis

SHERWOOD EDDY Paper Edition, .50
Dr. Eddy has poured out the very soul of the message which he conceives to be the Gospel of Christ for our age.

Social Principles of Jesus

WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH 1.15
Original and vivid studies of the social principles enunciated by Jesus.

Teaching of Jesus and His Apostles

EDWARD I. BOSWORTH 1.40
The great subjects involved in the teachings of Christ and His apostles. Thirty lessons.

Comrades in the Great Cause

OZORA S. DAVIS 1.15
This study of St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians is "especially timely now, when Christian comradeship means more than ever before in practical living."

Under the Highest Leadership

JOHN DOUGLAS ADAM 1.15
A book to make you feel the inspiration of close comradeship with Christ.

Thirty Studies About Jesus

EDWARD I. BOSWORTH .95
Dr. Bosworth throws new light on the meaning of life and its possibilities.

Meeting the Master

OZORA S. DAVIS 1.15
Our Lord's conversations with individuals, showing various traits in His character.

At your bookstore or from us

ASSOCIATION PRESS

Publication Dept. Inter. Comm. Y. M. C. A.

347 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK

Outstanding New Religious Books

God's Better Thing

ESSAYS OF CONCERN AND CONVICTION

By A. D. BELDEN, B. D. (Lond.)

THE AUTHOR'S conviction is that the evangelical faith is seriously cramped by a purely individualistic campaign, and that it must find its flowering and fruitage in the gospel of the kingdom of God on earth before it can adequately satisfy the spiritual needs of mankind and give just proof of itself.

$1.50 net

A STARTLING BOOK!

If America Fail!

By SAMUEL ZANE BATTEN

THE AUTHOR explains, in a startlingly convincing manner, the cause of the decline and fall of nations. He proves that these sinister forces are still at work, threatening the success of America's great national mission. How these may be overcome and our national destiny secured is discussed in the latter part of the book.

$1.60 net

SEND FOR DESCRIPTIVE CIRCULAR LISTING ALL OF OUR NEWER PUBLICATIONS

The Judson Press

1701-1703 Chestnut Street

Philadelphia, Pa.

THE SERMON TEST

"Preach It Again"

By BERNARD C. CLAUSEN, D. D.

THE STORY of an attempt to learn what a congregation thought about a year of preaching. The experiment made possible conclusions that cannot fail to be interesting and suggestive to laymen as well as to preachers and students and teachers of pulpit work. In five captivating chapters, Doctor Clausen sums up the results of his investigations. The sermons follow—strikingly unusual in form and content—for your judgment of them and their judges.

$1.25 net

What Jesus Taught

ACCORDING TO THE GOSPELS

By MILTON G. EVANS, D. D., LL. D.

THIS BOOK discusses, first, the sources of knowledge of what Jesus taught and outlines the background of thought against which his teaching is projected, then presents the teaching according to the synoptic Gospels, and, lastly, the teaching according to John.

$1.50 net

as his for infidelity? "You can't fool all the people all the time," said Lincoln. And to-day the vast majority of scientists and men eminent in all branches of learning are one in accepting belief in a Divine Being. Not only so, but that which is deepest and best in ignorant or wise, rich or poor, black or white, is satisfied only by such a belief and is outraged by the opposite contention. Can you question the tremendous import of the fact that the soul of man in all ages has been groping, seeking, longing after God and for a fuller knowledge of Him? Would man have been so constituted if there was no God? Just as reasonably do all the orderly processes of nature vouch for His existence. Just as reasonably do all the known facts of the material universe; the determined motions of sun and stars and all the heavenly hosts; the phenomena of heat and light and electricity; life and death and life again; summer and winter; seed time and harvest, present arguments most conclusive to the thinking, reasoning mind, not prejudiced. And yet it remains true that God's existence cannot be demonstrated by science or by reason alone. If you prefer to deny his existence, after careful weighing of the evidences, I in turn prefer the opposite conclusions. In like manner all the evidences satisfy my mind that Christ was divine. I cannot account for Him otherwise. To deny His divinity, His virgin birth, His power of performing miracles, His resurrection, leaves Him not Christ but a noble man, capable of misjudgments, errors, misstatements and many inconsistencies, such as we note in the worthies of the Old Testament. If He was not divine we may reasonably question every statement of His as we might those of Buddha or Confucius. If He was not divine we are quite reasonable in accepting such of His statements as we like and in rejecting all others. If He was not divine He was the greatest impostor who ever lived. For he alone of all the sons of men claimed most positively Sonship of God and absolute freedom of sin. Do the records of His life agree with such claims? Put out of your mind all preconceived theories and let the facts speak for themselves. A careful study of His words and deeds compels one to admit that He was unique. No one ever lived and no personality was ever conceived equal to Him. How then can you explain Him except on the ground of His divinity? It is impossible.

After all, what is so strange or so difficult in accepting His divinity? Nothing indeed except that He is not fully understandable. Since history gives us no other example of a God man, and since such a personality is outside our experience, the doubter says it cannot be true. Such a process of reasoning is not satisfactory when applied to the phenomena of nature. We know much about them, but there is much more we do not know. We accept the facts of life, death, light, electricity, etc., without question, even when we understand them but in part. Is the doubter

Don't Deny Yourself a New Religious Book

THE WORLD'S GREAT RELIGIOUS POETRY

Compiled by CAROLINE MILES HILL, Ph.D. Cloth 12 mo. 876 pages. $5.00.

"What more elevating and broadening exercise could a writer or speaker on spiritual themes desire than the habitual study of such a book? It will be of the very greatest spiritual service to people of all religions and of no religion. It meets a well-nigh universal need."—New York Christian Advocate.

"I congratulate you on its publication. It is an admirable work."—William Lyon Phelps (Yale).

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGION

By ROBERT H. THOULESS (Manchester)

The God revealed by religious experience shown to be identical with the God required by the moral consciousness and the God required to explain the world and the God revealed in historical Christianity. $2.50

CHRISTIAN WAYS OF SALVATION

By GEORGE W. RICHARDS (Lancaster Seminary)

Eight historical "ways" that Christian salvation has been successfully presented and in addition a tremendously helpful exposition of the present creed of the united Free Church of Scotland. $2.00

RELIGIOUS FOUNDATIONS

Edited by RUFUS M. JONES

How shall we think of God; of Man; of Christ; of Nature; of Human Relationships; of the Bible; of the Kingdom of God; of Evil; of Progress; of the Life Beyond!

Authors: Francis G. Peabody, Willard L. Sperry, Eugene Lyman, Rufus M. Jones, Elihu Grant, L. P. Jacks (Hibbert), Seebohm Rowan $1.00

OLD TESTAMENT LIFE AND LITERATURE

By I. G. MATTHEWS (Crozer)

Follows a good method; holds a modern point of view without becoming radical. $2.00

HE OPENED TO US THE SCRIPTURES

By B. W. BACON (Yale)

Jesus' better way of using Scripture explained and recommended to our own practice. $1.00

THE RETURN OF CHRISTENDOM

Introduction by BISHOP GORE

Advocates a return to the brotherhood really taught and lived in the early centuries of the Church, with wars between nations and between capital and labor ended for good. $1.75

THE HISTORY OF UTOPIAN THOUGHT

By JOYCE O. HERTZLER (Wisconsin)

The pictures of a better world from Amos and Hosea to Bellamy and Wells examined to discover their significance for us today. $3.00

ITEMS FOR YOUR NEXT ORDER:

Stratton: Anger: Its Religious and Moral Significance .....	$2.25
Haas: Freedom and Christian Conduct .....	2.25
Thouless: An Introduction to the Psychology of Religion .....	2.50
Pratt: Matter and Spirit .....	1.50
Beckwith: The Idea of God .....	2.50

64-66 Fifth Avenue

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

New York City, N.Y.

of Christ's divinity logical? The phenomena of nature, too deep for his intellect, or not yet fully explained, he will accept without question; but the divinity of Christ, too deep for our understanding, or not yet fully explained, he will reject.

Is this consistent?

To one believing in God it seems most natural, in fact quite in keeping with His divine love, that He should come in the person of His Son to earth to rescue mankind. For every other method of regeneration and reconciliation had been proved inadequate by the preceding centuries. Since we are God's creation it is unreasonable to believe that He is vitally interested in our welfare here and hereafter? How else could our happiness and salvation be secured? Of necessity our sin must be removed before we can be one with Him, since He is holy. Oil and water cannot mix. There can be no harmony between God and man until sin is removed. To perform this otherwise impossibility we have the divine plan stated in the Word, the divine Christ cleansing our sins by His blood. The fact that God accepts such sacrifice for us is indeed a wonder of love beyond our full comprehension, but we may rest in peace and gratitude upon His statement that it is true.

Says Bishop Francis J. McConnell

of the Methodist Church

"I regard The Christian Century as the greatest journalistic force working for social and international righteousness coming from any press of the Christian Church."

EDITORIAL STAFF

Charles Clayton Morrison
Herbert L. Willett Orvis F. Jordan
Joseph Fort Newton John R. Ewers
Lynn Harold Hough Edward Shillito
Alva W. Taylor Thomas C. Clark

The Christian Century is distinguished by its candid discussion of living issues in the light of the mind of Christ.

Mail Coupon to-day. Foreign postage extra.

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Dear Sirs: Please enter my name (a new subscriber) for a year's subscription to The Christian Century at your regular rate of $4.00 (ministers $3.00). I will remit upon receipt of bill and you will please send me without extra charge a copy of [ ] "The Reconstruction of Religion," by Ellwood, or [ ] "The Crisis of the Churches," by Leighton Parks, or [ ] "The Mind in the Making," by Robinson, or [ ] "What Christianity Means to Me," by Lyman Abbott.

Name .....
Address .....
C.W.

When answering advertisements please mention The Christian Work

Now to say that Christ is not divine, is not all powerful, is not God, is to declare disbelief in God Himself; it is equivalent to declaring that God has misled us through all the years since Christ; it is to remove the very foundation stones of faith. And then where are we? Adrift on a sea of doubt. And our drifting may easily result in the shipwreck of materialism or complete infidelity. No, indeed, let us hold fast to our faith in a divine Christ, the Son of the living God. By that faith alone can man realize the peace and happiness God intended him to enjoy while on earth, and by it alone can he secure the peace and happiness hereafter which are the inheritance of all accepting Christ as Saviour, Lord and God.

J. W. JOHNSON.

THE HERETIC

Dr. Percy Stickney Grant has been preaching beliefs of such a nature that Bishop Manning has summoned him to recant or resign, on the grounds that an Episcopalian clergyman has no right to preach from his pulpit doctrines inconsistent with the creed of the Church.

Dr. Grant seems to be getting in line with the noble army of heretics.

The world undoubtedly owes a great debt to the organized Church, and possibly an equal debt to the unorganized heretic.

John Wesley was considered heretical by the established Church of his time; yet to him is due the world-wide movement of Methodism.

Luther was a heretic, and was the founder of Protestantism.

Even Jesus of Nazareth was considered to be teaching doctrines contrary to the organized Judaism of His day and was driven out.

Socrates was so dangerous a heretic that the Athenians poisoned him.

As to the merits of the controversy between Dr. Grant and his Church, we are not qualified to speak with authority.

Upon the general aspect of the matter, however, it may be remarked that it is rather a curious thing that the churchman says to the objecting outsider: "If you don't think the Church is right or progressive enough, why don't you come into it and make it better?" And if the outsider comes in and begins to express himself too freely, it is said to him: "If you cannot conform to the doctrines of the Church, why don't you get out?"

Altogether, the heretic's lot does not seem to be a happy one.

Another point that seems to be missed in the general discussion is that neither the Episcopalian Church nor most other Churches were instituted to do good to the human race any way they can. They were instituted to do good in just one way; that is, by preaching a certain set of doctrines. Of course, it is difficult for one who is anxious to do good in his own way, or in any way possible, to keep peace with his Church.

There is a certain amount of efficiency to be achieved by organization, and there is also a certain amount of efficiency that is lost by having an organization.

The whole case is full of paradoxes. For instance, people say the Churches are empty because ministers are not sincere, but have to preach exactly what they are told; and then when a minister shows that he is sincere and preaches exactly what he believes the Church itself makes it too hot for him.

One thing remains quite sure, that such a man as Dr. Grant, with his undoubted sincerity, spirit, and intelligence, is going to play the man, and do what good he can in the world, whether in the Church or out of it. For he has that kind of faith which Dr. Fagnani quotes Kirsopp Lake as defining to be "Not belief in spite of evidence, but life in scorn of consequence."

Perhaps Dr. Grant has been reading Thoreau, and came across the two following quotations:

"Do what you love. Know your own bone; gnaw at it; bury it; unearth it; gnaw at it still."

And again: "When you travel to the Celestial City, carry no letters of introduction. When you knock, ask to see God—none of the servants."—Frank Crane in The New York Globe.

IRRESISTIBLE

JOIN OUR DELIGHTFUL "CHRISTIAN WORK" PARTY

ON THE GREAT WHITE STAR LINE "S. S. BALTIC" SUMMER CRUISE
TO THE HOLY LAND, EGYPT, TURKEY, GREECE, SPAIN, ITALY, Etc.

61 Days, $600 and up, Starting June 27, 1923
A Surpassing Summer Vacation Opportunity

FOR MINISTERS, COLLEGE PROFESSORS, TEACHERS AND BUSINESS MEN

IDEAL SUMMER WEATHER ON SHIP BOARD

With the Average Temperature on Shore lower than Boston, New York or St. Louis. Nights Cool. Practically no Humidity

Clark's 20th Cruise to the Orient

Stop-Overs in Europe

Return Tickets, first class, good on Adriatic, Baltic, Cedric, Celtic, etc.

Until January 1, 1924

Luxurious White Star Transatlantic Liner

S. S. BALTIC

23,876 tons register. Three great Promenade Decks, Sumptuous Public Rooms, 24 Suites with private bath.

The Climax of Luxurious Travel

A FASCINATING ITINERARY

Madeira, Cadiz, Seville (Cordova, Granada and the Alhambra), Gibraltar, Algiers, Athens (Corinth, Eleusis), Haifa, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Bethany (Nazareth, Sea of Galilee, Samaria, etc.), Alexandria, Cairo, Naples, Pompeii, Aome (Capri, Sorrento, Amalfi), Monte Carlo, Cherbourg (Paris and the Battlefields, London, etc.), Liverpool to New York.

D. E. LORENZ, PH.D., Author of "The Mediterranean Traveler" and Managing Director of Clark's Orient Cruise of 1922, and "Round the World" Cruise of 1923, is organizing a party of CHRISTIAN WORK readers. Why not take advantage of this remarkable opportunity and spend your vacation months visiting the most fascinating countries in the world? No travel worries—just rest and enjoyment. Rates include regular shore trips, landings, drives, guides, hotels, railroad fees, etc.—everything first class.

We Invite Our Readers to Join Our Party

ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET (70 pages) AND SHIP DIAGRAM SENT FREE POSTPAID.

Address: Cruise Department, Christian Work

--

70 Fifth Avenue, New York City

When answering advertisements please mention The Christian Work

OXFORD BIBLES

are made in so great a variety of styles and prices that there is one to suit every occasion and every purse

At all booksellers
or from the publishers

Oxford University Press
American Branch
35 West 32nd Street New York

COLLECTION ENVELOPES—8c per pack of 52, in Cartons (Also Storehouse Tithers Envelopes) write Dufold Trifold Company, Asbury Park, N.J.

THE AMERICAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY

76 Wall Street, New York
(Incorporated April, 1833)

The only American undenominational, international and national Society aiding seamen. Maintains a Sailors' Home and Institute at 507 West Street, New York City.

Places loan libraries ($25) on vessels sailing from New York.

Publishes the "Sailors' Magazine," $1.00.

Supported by contributions and legacies.

JOHN B. CALVERT, D.D., President.

GEORGE SIDNEY WEBSTER, D.D., Sec'y.
Send contributions to CLARENCE C. PINNEO,
Treasurer, 76 Wall Street, New York.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY

Its work is interdenominational evangelical and international in scope and is commended by all the churches. It has published the Gospel message in 178 languages dialects and characters. Its colporters meet the immigrants with Christian literature in many languages, and also visit the spiritually destitute. In the Spanish and Portuguese languages, chiefly for Latin America, there have been issued 16,012,098 copies of volumes, tracts and periodicals. Its literature in the native dialects has been the strong right arm of foreign missions. Its benevolent work is dependent upon donations and legacies.

REV. EDWIN NOAH HARDY, Ph.D., Gen. Sec.
WILLIAM PHILLIPS HALL, President.

Donations may be sent direct to American Tract Society, 101 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

THE HUGUENOT AND DUTCH TERCENTENARY

In addition to the European pilgrimage for this summer planned by the Federal Council's Huguenot-Walloon New Netherland Commission in connection with the tercentenary of the arrival of the Huguenots in America, the Commission suggests that in 1924 the American Churches observe "Huguenot-Walloon Tercentenary Sunday" on April 24. Local civic and historical celebrations will not be limited merely to the Dutch and Huguenot centers in the Middle States, but will be held in the South also, since a strong Huguenot-Walloon emigration went to Virginia, Florida and South Carolina. An International Huguenot Congress is to meet in New York next year, and the Huguenot Memorial Church will be dedicated in Huguenot Park on Staten Island, near the site of an early Huguenot colony which was massacred by hostile Indians. Preparations are being made to compile a series of Huguenot memorial volumes, the separate articles or chapters to be written by authorities of note.

The tercentenary celebration will carry over to 1926 in order to join in the civic commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of New York City by the purchase of Manhattan Island from the Indians by Peter Minuit. The year 1526 also marked the organization of the colony into a Protestant congregation.

HALF A CENTURY AS SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENT

Mr. N. Wayland Ayer, head of the great advertising firm of N. W. Ayer and Son, has established a New Jersey church record. He has just celebrated his fiftieth anniversary as superintendent of the Sunday School of the Camden North Baptist Church.

For twenty-five years Mr. Ayer has also been the president of the New Jersey State Baptist Convention. We join with his other friends in our congratulations.

"THE NATION'S" POETRY PRIZE

Stephen Vincent Benet's poem, "King David," has won "The Nation's" poetry prize for 1923. Four thousand manuscripts came into "The Nation's" office for consideration.

Mr. Benet is the author of "The Beginning of Wisdom" and of several books of verse.

RECENT BOOKS

Published by

T. & T. Clark of Edinburgh

Redemption From This World or, The Supernatural in Christianity

By A. G. HOGG, M.A.

The author believes that the supernatural should be the abiding note of the church; and that the world's redemption is to be accomplished, not by new methods or improved machinery but by a discovery of the unfathomed possibilities of God in Christ, both for the individual and the church. $2.75

Religion and Modern Thought

By PROFESSOR GEORGE GALLOWAY, D.D.

This book is a masterpiece. It seeks to establish the validity of the claims of Christianity as a religion that meets the demands of modern thought and that asks its adherents to assent to nothing which cannot be accepted by science. $2.50

The Epistle to the Hebrews: Its Doctrine and Significance

By PROFESSOR E. F. SCOTT, D.D.

This epistle makes a peculiar appeal to the mind of our own age. It deals with questions which are now ultimately the same as those which are now perplexing us and suggests answers which are still valid. There is need, therefore, for this new exposition. $3.00

The Christian Doctrine of Peace

Edited by JAMES HASTINGS, D.D.

Delegates from every land testified at the Copenhagen Conference that there is a great silent world of men and women yearning for peace. This volume deals in a thorough and practical manner with the whole biblical doctrine of peace and above all the question of Peace or War. At every point the truth is made clear and sent home by new and carefully chosen illustrations. $4.00

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

597-599 Fifth Ave.

New York

TEACHERS WANTED—Schools and Colleges now engaging September teachers. We have great demand to supply all departments of Schools and Colleges at attractive salaries. Write to-day for information. The Westminster Teachers' Bureau, Henry H. Sweets, Manager, 410 Urban Building, Louisville, Ky.

The Woodlawn Cemetery

Is readily accessible by Harlem trains from Grand Central Station and by subway. Small lots at reasonable prices. Write or telephone (4855 Gramercy Park) for Book of Views or representative. Office 20 E. 23d Street, New York City.

Watch for

"Hocking's" Story of Our Own Times
Soon to Start in "THE CHRISTIAN WORK"

Every mother and father of young men and women should read it from the start and pass it on to others

Don't Miss the First Issue!

JUST OFF THE PRESS

WILL VITALIZE

Congregational

Singing and Worship

DYNAMIC

in its Compelling

Lyric

Messages

Edited by

H. AUGUSTINE SMITH

Gradual growth through Professor Smith's work and personal contact with churches throughout the entire country.

Every Page Tested in Conventions, Conferences and Classes

It will be illuminated by other books:

ANNOTATIONS, LITURGIC SUGGESTIONS
PICTURE HELPS, INTERPRETATIONS,
STUDIES IN HYMNOLOGY

494 Hymns and Tunes with the words printed in the music.

30 pages of chants and responses marking a new epoch in chanting and antiphonal singing.

An outstanding series of responsive readings and services of worship, prepared by

ERNEST BOURNER ALLEN
HENRY HALLAM SAUNDERSON
H. AUGUSTINE SMITH
HARRY F. WARD
OSBERT W. WARMINGHAM

A Novel and Usable Feature

A choir selection and special hymns } If Desired
A gospel hymns supplement }

A DE LUXE BOOK

Price $135. per 100

We are glad to send returnable samples

THE CENTURY CO. - 353 Fourth Ave., N.Y.

In Preparation

(An Historical Edition)—The history and interpretation of each hymn and tune facing it.

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

A Religious Weekly Review

MAR

If Not the Sermon, What?

Frederick Lynch, D.D.

A Conference on "Faith and War"

Rev. George Stewart, Jr.

Fellowship

A. Maude Royden

Prohibition and the League of Nations

Charles Edward Jefferson, D.D.

The Two Americas

G. B. Winton, D.D.

A Great Schoolmaster

One Book a Week

Three Dollars a Year

Ten Cents a Copy

Correspondence

THE GRANT CASE

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

I am sorry to note the position THE CHRISTIAN WORK takes on the Dr. Grant controversy. Perhaps I did not read correctly. The editorial asks, "Is it to be true of the Church at large that a man may not follow what he honestly believes to be the truth and still remain in it?" The nation has deported those who deny its fundamental principles. Some of these were honest in their beliefs, but they were out of harmony with the constitution of America, and that decided their position. I am of the opinion that the Church, what it has taught for years, its creeds and dogma which are the result of years of thinking by great minds, are to be considered just as well as the individual mind and conscience. Why if a man feels that he does not believe the teachings of the church in which he serves, why does he not leave and state his reasons for doing so instead of ignoring his vow? That is the manly step to take. There is much truth in Dr. Cadman's statement. "And sometimes the Liberals manifest an intellectual snobbery which is one remove worse than intellectual bigotry." The Church is greater than a single individual.

THE CHRISTIAN WORK has in the past tried to teach men to exalt the Church. Editorials like these seem to contradict some of the former teachings. I liked the editorial of the New York World far better—even though that paper is very secular.

CLARENCE P. DAME.

HERESY AS A "BORE"

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

The many commendable things in THE CHRISTIAN WORK from week to week make more apparent the lapse in the issue of February 10. The little controversy in a sister denomination, which has been so magnified in the Press, is taken up with apparent zest in THE CHRISTIAN WORK and twelve whole pages devoted to it. One of your readers at least is not at all interested in this matter. Would it not be more courteous to our Episcopal friends to refrain from such extensive airing of their minor controversies? There is no principle involved that is of general interest to the Christian Church. Such outbreaks of personal opinion for the sake of personal notoriety are nothing at all new nor interesting. It is rather deplorable to see a journal of the high standing of THE CHRISTIAN WORK fall so easily to the lead of the daily papers in devoting half an issue to so stale a subject as a "Case of Heresy."

T. M. HUSTON.

CREEDS vs. TRUTH

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

I cannot tell you how much our family of three enjoys THE CHRISTIAN WORK. We are right with you in all that you are doing. The two articles in the last number, one by Dr. Horton on "Can the Old Faith Live with the New Knowledge?" immediately followed by the one on "The Faith of a Modern Christian," by Eddy, are remarkably good and helpful. They are statements of the truth which I have been looking for for some time.

I pray for the hastening of the day when our small-town preachers (whom I seem destined to listen to) may awaken from their creedal slumbers, rub their eyes under the glaring light of modern science and, seeing God as He is and man as he ought to be, go to preaching the truth.

"Ministerial" ministers, creeds and formalism are keeping many big-hearted, fair-minded men away from the church. Men are hungry for the truth, and they will go out of their way to hear it if it comes from an honest heart in simple language and if presented in the light of modern knowledge.

J. E. V.

An enterprising church at Bottineau, North Dakota, has recently dedicated a mammoth skating rink, designed by the pastor and in good part built by him.

THE GREAT TEACHER
taught with authority. His language was clear, incisive. It is therefore important that we know his exact thought. The American Standard Version gives the most accurate rendering of our Master's words

Nelson American Standard Bible

is being read and studied in more homes, in more institutions of learning, in more Sunday Schools and is being preached from in more Protestant pulpits than were all other versions of Scripture a century ago. No matter which other version you use, you will enjoy the simplicity, the directness and the faithful accuracy of the wonderful American Standard Bible in your study and devotion

FREE BOOKLET—A charming 36-page booklet entitled "The Wonderful Story," published at 10c per copy, telling how the Bible came down through the ages, and containing many facts of vital interest, will be sent FREE on request to any one mentioning the Arkansas Methodist.

The American Standard Bible text has been adopted by all the leading Colleges, Theological Seminaries, Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., and Bible Schools in the United States.

The American Standard Bible text is used by over 13,000,000 Sabbath School scholars from which to study the International, Graded or other Bible lessons.

The American Standard Bible is for sale by all book sellers

THOMAS NELSON & SONS

381P Fourth Ave., New York City

DEAR SIR: Kindly send me a FREE copy of your book entitled "The Wonderful Story." This does not obligate me in any way.

Name .....

Street No. ....

City .....

When answering advertisements please mention The Christian Work

REVELL'S BOOKS

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS

AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

Preaching by Laymen President Ozora S. Davis new book is a layman's manual of practical instruction, showing:

foreword by Roger W. Babson Why Laymen Should Preach; Texts and Subjects; Sermon Style; Methods of "Follow-Up," etc. $1.50

Five-minute Dr. Henry T. Sell

Sermons in Stories Author of Sell's "Ten Books of Bible Study," has prepared this book of brief, pithy addresses for boys and girls, which should be found more than ordinarily useful by pastors and Sunday School workers. $1.25

Being a Preacher Dr. James I. Vance's new volume of

A Study of the Claims of the Christian Ministry JAMES SPRUNT LECTURES is a forceful, well-reasoned plea for the honor and usefulness of the Christian Ministry. $1.25

The Fifth Horseman Robert Hugh Morris' new book wastes neither time

Foreword by Edgar P. Hill, D.D. nor space in introduction. He drives straight at the heart of his theme, and draws therefrom what he conceives to be its vital teaching. $1.25

The Gospel in the Ten Commandments Dr. J. C. Massee has a new book of Sermons delivered on Sunday evenings by the pastor of Tremont Temple in his own pulpit. An unusually fine series heard by overflowing congregations. $1.25

The Possibilities of Prayer Edward M. Bounds' new volume in the Bounds "Spiritual Life Books," edited by Homer W. Hodge, deals with the place and significance prayer has in the life of the true believer. $1.35

Mountain Scenes from the Bible William R. Polhamus' new book "helps one by its imagination and passion to feel the mountain breezes, to glory in their sunlight and behold their wide horizons. These sermons make all heights a Holy Land."—Methodist Review. $2.00

The Easter People Winifred Kirkland's new book is a Pen-Picture of the Moravian Celebration of the Resurrection.

Reading her quiet, delightful descriptions, one imagines himself transported literally to a haunt of ancient peace.

Illustrated. Paper Boards. 50c

At the Master's Feet Sadhu Sundar Singh's simple but impressive chapters on God's Presence, Sin, Prayer, Service, The Cross, Heaven and Hell. Paper Boards. 75c

Within the Gateways of the Far East Prof. Charles R. Erdman of Princeton Theological Seminary gives glimpses afforded him through some unusual openings in the "wall" during a recent visit to the Far East. Illustrated. $1.25

The New Mediterranean Traveller By D. E. Lorenz, Ph.D.

A New (re-written) Edition of the Famous Guide-Book of which a prominent reviewer said: "Proves its claim to be a most useful and practical handbook to this region." With Maps, Plans, Pictures, Etc. $3.50

A REVELL BOOK—ASK FOR IT

FLEMING H. REVELL COMPANY

NEW YORK, 128 Fifth Ave. CHICAGO, 11 N. Wabash Ave.

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

CONTINUING

THE EVANGELIST AND NEW YORK OBSERVER

Vol. 114.—No. 9.

New York, March 3, 1923.

Whole No. 3012.

CONTENTS

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY.....	259
ELITORIALS:
If Not the Sermon, What?.. Rev. Frederick Lynch, D.D.....	263
Ways to God in the Common Life: Rev. T. Rhondda Williams..	265
The Widening Chasm Between the Church and the Masses: Rev. E. Guy Talbott.....	266
EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE:
A Conference on "Faith and War": Rev. George Stewart, Jr....	267
THE OBSERVER'S LETTER:
A New Exposition of the Claims of the Christian Ministry.....	269
THE WEEKLY SERMON:
Fellowship: A. Maude Royden.....	270
GENERAL ARTICLES:
Prohibition and the League of Nations: Rev. Charles Edward Jefferson, D.D. ....	275
The Two Americas: Rev. G. B. Winton, D.D.....	277
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE:
The Meeting of the Women's International League for Peace: Louis P. Lochner.....	279
INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON:
For March 11, 1923. Jesus in Gethsemane .....	281
ONE BOOK A WEEK:
A Great Schoolmaster.....	282

The Christian Work; Published weekly; 10 cents a copy, $3.00 a year in the United States, $3.52 in Canada, and $4.04 in all other countries (postage included.)

Application made for entry as second class matter February 17, 1923, at the Post-office at New York, N. Y., under act of March 3, 1879.

Printed in U. S. A.—Published by The Christian World, Inc., Frederick Lynch, President; Henry Strong Huntington, Vice-President; Benson Y. Landis, Secretary-Treasurer.

All communications and remittances should be sent to "The Christian Work," 70 Fifth Avenue, New York.

The World of To-day

THE FEDERAL COUNCIL ON AMERICA'S INTERNATIONAL OBLIGATIONS

As a result of the Conference held by the Federal Council's Commission on International Justice and Good-will reported in these columns two weeks ago, the Commission has drawn up a noble declaration concerning America's international obligations. This declaration has received the approval of the Administrative Committee of the Churches of Christ in America. It runs as follows:

The hope that after the war the world would move rapidly towards permanent peace and a well-ordered international life has been shattered. Growing unrest, political intrigues, physical distress and suffering, a disordered economic life, increasing distrust, suspicions and hatreds, all point to great disaster. If the drift be allowed to continue in the present direction new wars may cripple still further our civilization and even carry it into eclipse for centuries.

The failure of diplomatic and financial efforts to bring about a satisfactory settlement constitutes a direct challenge to the Christian Church. Righteousness, justice, and good-will are the foundations of lasting peace. The problem is essentially a spiritual one and comes distinctly within the scope of the Church's duty.

The Administrative Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America believes that it is voicing the moral judgment of the overwhelming majority of thoughtful Christian people in making the following declaration:

First: We believe that the United States should accept its full share of responsibility for bringing about an effective settlement of international problems. There are those who think the Government has a mandate from the people to pursue a policy of aloofness. We do not thus understand the situation. The churches have declared, and must declare again, their convictions that generous co-operation among the nations is absolutely necessary to cope with the present hunger, strife, uncertainty and despair of the world. The participation of the United States is indispensable to successful co-operative action. An attitude of aloofness exposes our foreign policy to the charge of timidity and ineffectiveness. The present crisis in Europe summons us not to pass judgment on other peoples, but in a spirit of humility and self-examination to review our own attitude as a nation and to ask ourselves how we may, by co-operation with other nations, help to meet the overwhelming responsibility which rests upon the entire world.

Second: We believe that the United States should take the initiative in calling an international conference to consider the whole economic and political situation in Europe, including reparations, debts, and armaments, in the endeavor to accomplish in Europe a result comparable to that which was achieved by the Four-Power Pact in the Far East. We welcome the suggestion of President Harding in his message to Congress on December 8, when, in referring to that agreement, he said, "It might be made a model for like assurances wherever in the world any common interests are concerned. . . . We believe in the value of conferences and consultation, in the effectiveness of leaders of nations looking each other in the face."

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

In calling such a conference we believe that the United States should make it known, as it did at the opening session of the Conference on the Limitation of Armament, that we are ready to make, in common with other nations, whatever concessions, financial or otherwise, may be necessary to bring about an ordered international life. We are convinced that a sacrificial spirit on our part would evoke a willingness in other nations also to make the adjustments that may be needed. Our plans for reconstruction should include not only our Allies, but our former enemies. Bankers, economists, and business men are telling us that only the re-establishment of normal economic conditions in Europe can bring prosperity to American agriculture and industry. What they declare necessary on the basis of enlightened self-interest, we declare necessary also from the standpoint of the Christian ideal of brotherhood. The well-being of our own country is inseparably bound up with an unselfish consideration of the well-being of the other nations of the world.

Third: We believe that our Government will not be true to its ideals unless it records a definite protest against any settlement of the Near Eastern question on a basis of expediency or commercial advantage, and without some amends for tragic wrongs which have resulted in the persecution and practical destruction of the Armenian people, and the confiscation of their property. For the good of all nations wrong must be righted, or a Nemesis is sure to follow. We would urge that in any further conference on Near East problems our Government should give full power to its delegates in all matters in which the rights of humanity are at stake and share with the Allied Powers the responsibility for reaching conclusions based upon righteousness and justice. If the Lausanne Conference is not renewed, we believe that our Government should co-operate and, if necessary, take the initiative in the appointment of an international commission which would deal with the whole subject of the refugee and orphan problem in the Near East, and that it should offer to bear its share in providing whatever may be necessary financially to establish these people in some place of safety and opportunity.

We call upon the membership of the churches throughout the country to make a united appeal in behalf of this program of international co-operation, to make known their attitude to the President and their representatives in Congress, and to assure the Administration of their aid in developing a strong public opinion in its support. We especially urge Christian people everywhere to approach these momentous issues on their merits, irrespective of all partisan considerations. We make this plea on the highest moral and religious ground, believing that beneath all these problems lies the need of a great spiritual awakening and a deeper conviction that Christian principles are as binding upon national as upon personal conduct.

Individuals and churches will do a great service to the President and their representatives by letting them know their attitude on the program suggested here by the Federal Council's Administrative Committee. If the Administration is sure that the people of this country want a given policy, it will attempt to carry it out. It is for the American people to decide what that policy shall be.

SHALL WE JOIN THE WORLD COURT?

Last Saturday President Harding sent a brief message to the Senate, asking it to consent to the United States becoming one of the States adhering to the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague. The Covenant of the League of Nations provided for the establishment of the Permanent Court, but the Court itself, though related to the League, is a separate entity, and the articles setting it up explicitly provide that any state mentioned in the annex to the League Covenant may be a constituent state in the Court. The United States is listed in the annex. The eleven judges and four deputy judges of the Court are elected by the Council and by the Assembly of the League. From his sounding of the members of the League, Secretary Hughes is evidently convinced that they would be willing that the United States should have representatives in the Council and Assembly who would take part in the election of judges and in any business concerning the Court. This would not involve our becoming a member of the League. The Permanent Court deals with disputes between nations concerning the interpretation of a treaty; any question of international law; the existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of an international obligation, and the nature or extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation. Some eighteen nations have conditionally obliged themselves to refer to the Court any such disputes as come within its province. But none of the great powers have done so, and two-thirds of the nations accepting the obligatory protocol have made their acceptance conditional on the great powers doing the same. Secretary Hughes takes it for granted that the United States will not sign the protocol. That is a great pity, it seems to us. If the world is to be organized, law-abiding nations must take up all their differences before a Supreme Court of the World as a matter of course in the same way that the States of our nation take up all their differences before our Supreme Court. The present Congress comes to an end March 4 so that the Senate will scarcely have time to act on the President's recommendation. Most of the Democratic Senators have already announced themselves as favorable to the President's suggestions. The Republicans are more lukewarm in its support. Some "irreconcilables" still see red when the League is mentioned. But the sentiment of the country should drive through the President's suggestion without a question.

THE STATUS OF THE COURT

Since its organization last June the Permanent Court of International Justice has dealt with four cases and a fifth is now on the docket. The first three were small matters dealing with the jurisdiction of the League of Nations' Labor Bureau. The fourth case was of wider interest. In Tunis and Morocco the French dealt with persons claiming British nationality as if they were French subjects. When the British government took up the matter, France insisted that the questions involved were purely domestic. The two countries referred the question to the Permanent Court, which decided that the question was international. Now France and Great Britain are preparing to submit the underlying question to the Court. On the docket of the Court is a dispute concerning the passage of a vessel loaded with munitions of war through the Kiel Canal. The vessel was on its way to Danzig, its cargo consigned to Poland. Under the Treaty of Versailles the Kiel Canal is open. Great Britain, France, Poland and Germany are all interested. The question comes before the Court because it involves the Treaty of Versailles, and the interpretation of that Treaty is one of the Court's functions. While we believe that every nation should make both resort to the Court and the acceptance of its findings obligatory, the present hesitation should not trouble us too greatly. For the first fifty years of its existence our own Supreme Court had no force on which it could call to carry out its decisions. When Jackson was President, Thomas Marshall handed down a decision involving the State of Georgia, which was never carried out. Even in the present century West Virginia delayed some ten years in obeying a decision regarding her share in the public debt owed by Virginia when the two States were separated. In our own country it took a Civil War to determine that the Federal Government was supreme. We trust that it may not take a Civil War of the World to determine that the decisions of the Permanent Court are obligatory. The nations must learn from history.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

THE SANTIAGO CONFERENCE

The fifth Pan-American Conference meets on the 25th of this month at Santiago, Chile. That conference has bulked but little in the thought of the United States. In reality it presents a great opportunity for making the people of Latin America feel that the United States will deal fairly and courteously with all the nations to the South of us, even with the weakest of them. Just at present, partly on account of our failure to back up our fine words about internationalism by going into the League of Nations, there seems to be a rising tide of opposition to the United States in Latin America. Two of the topics on the agenda for the coming Conference are as follows:

Consideration of measures tending toward closer association of the republics of the American Continent, with a view to promoting common interests.

... questions arising out of an encroachment by a non-American power on the rights of an American nation.

This is Latin America's endeavor to get some definition of the Monroe Doctrine. What will come out of this discussion of an American League of Nations no one knows. It will probably be the key of all the discussion at the Santiago Conference. Two other questions on the agenda which the churches ought to be interested in are the larger development of agriculture and the measures to secure the progressive diminution in the consumption of alcoholic beverages. We should make the representatives of Latin America feel that we are interested and watching the developments of the Conference, and we should do something to impress our delegates with the importance of this meeting as we feel it. The Administrative Committee of the Federal Council passed the following resolution the other day:

We urge that in connection with the coming fifth Pan-American Conference, our nation do all in its power to cultivate amity and friendship with the Latin American nations, and so to prevent the development on our continent of the spirit of distrust and suspicion that has led the European continent into its present morass. We, therefore, urge that our delegates to the Conference make every effort to promote practical co-operation among all American countries, to dispel the impression prevalent in some Latin American quarters that the United States might use its economic or political power in impairing the sovereignty of any Latin American nation, to press for the largest possible reduction of armaments and to develop adequate machinery for the peaceful settlement of all questions that may arise between our own nation and our neighbors on the South.

The desirability of the course outlined in the resolution speaks for itself.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS QUESTION

During the war our government began a great power development at Muscle Shoals, Alabama, in order to produce the nitrate needed for the war and for the farms. We had the ambition, then, to make this country absolutely self-dependent. The government put nearly ninety million dollars into the property and its development. Since the war ended and we began to sell off such property, the leading bidder for Muscle Shoals has been Henry Ford, who offers to form a ten million dollar corporation to take over the property, paying five million dollars for it. Ford will take the property only on condition of a hundred-year lease on the dams under construction, in direct contravention of the Federal Water Power Act of 1920, which provides that no water power leases shall run more than fifty years. Neither does Mr. Ford's proposition for Muscle Shoals conform to the Water Power Act in regard to regulation, rate control, service and other details. While Mr. Ford's own record in bringing down the price of his cars and in supplying better service at a cheaper price on his railway makes people believe that it would be his policy at Muscle Shoals to supply nitrate and power at the lowest possible rate, still Mr. Ford's personal policy is no assurance that his corporation would pursue the same policy half a century after his death, nor is it any reason for altering the provisions of the law in his behalf. According to Senator Norris, who as chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture has investigated the Muscle Shoals problem, in anticipation of the acceptance of the Ford offer a vast real estate speculation has grown up, and "a wonderful propaganda is in progress. They have flooded the country with their letters and circulars, particularly among farmers, in which they falsely report that Mr. Ford has agreed to make fertilizer at one-half the present cost. They have platted the country for miles in all directions from Muscle Shoals—they are maintaining an office now in the city of Washington to dispose of their property." While Mr. Ford's corporation would agree to operate Nitrate Plant No. 2 to full capacity, making an eight per cent. profit, it would have from five to eight hundred thousand surplus cheap horse power "to do with as it pleases without any regulation from the Federal Government or . . . Alabama"—we quote the report. Senator Norris sums up the general understanding of Mr. Ford's offer and the facts of the case in the following words: "The country understands that he pays the government four per cent. interest on its investment in the two dams. He does nothing of the kind. . . . The country understands that the Ford offer provides for repayment within one hundred years the entire investment the government has made. His offer does nothing of the kind. . . . The country has been given to understand that Mr. Ford has guaranteed to reduce the cost of fertilizer by one-half. He has done nothing of the kind. . . . The people believe the Ford offer means a reduced price for electricity to the consumers. It means nothing of the kind." Senator Norris has prepared a bill for the Muscle Shoals development which would order experimentation for cheap fertilizer and would guarantee its sale at the cheapest possible price. It would also provide that the benefits of the electric power of Muscle Shoals and the rise in land values there would go, not to a single corporation located at Muscle Shoals, but to the cities and the farms "all over the States of Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, Tennessee and Kentucky, so that all the people may get the benefit of the development of the property owned by all of the people." In this connection the Canadian use of Niagara Falls power is worth noting. Twenty-three years ago the Canadians determined that when they developed their half of Niagara they would give power to all manufacturers at cost, and light and power to every consumer at cost. To-day they sell power at one-half the charge made by private concerns on the American side, and cheap power is booming Ontario. Electric light costs the people of Ontario from two to four cents per kilowatt hour, while the average price in the United States under private ownership is ten cents.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

A NOBLE ENCYCLICAL

The Consistory and the pastors of the Protestant National Church of Geneva have just sent a noble letter to all their Christian brethren in Europe and America, asking that it be read in the churches on Easter Sunday. It draws a vivid picture of the terrible conditions in the devastated, famine-stricken countries that were in the war, and the conditions in the neutral countries are not much better. Two ways now lie before the nations it says: "Either the nations dominated by egoism will refuse to help one another and will seek the satisfaction of proud dreams of grandeur and of exclusively material prosperity, and will continue to cherish thoughts of vengeance, violence and hatred, or they will listen to the call of the Saviour and welcome His message of peace, hope and life. Was it not He who said, 'Love one another. Love your enemies. Blessed are the merciful?'" The letter goes on to say that the churches must immediately in all parts of the world insist that the nations adopt the spirit of Christ in all their operations or there is no hope for the world. Many sceptics and mockers are saying to-day that the message of Christ is Utopian, a folly. Unless we, the disciples of Christ, believe and know that the world can be saved "by the folly of the cross, by the burning flame of charity, by the power of sacrifice freely rendered" there is no hope.

THE SLAV AND PROTESTANTISM

One hundred representatives of a dozen denominations recently held a conference on "Christian Work among Slavic Peoples in America." (The conference did not consider the Christian work done by the historic churches of these people.) The six million Slavs in America are by birth Roman and Greek Catholics, and Eastern Orthodox, with a few Protestants and Mohammedans and a scattering of various obscure sects. Half of the six million are Poles, a quarter of them Jugoslavs, while the Slovaks, Czechs, Russians and Ruthenians run from 425,000 to 350,000 each. The Slavs are markedly people of peace, and are "instinctively and incurably religious." So far as Protestant work is concerned, the major denominations conduct one hundred and twenty missions and churches among the Bohemians, with 8,853 members; fifteen missions and churches among the Jugoslavs, with 2,393 members; thirty-four among the Poles, with 4,049 members; thirty-six among the Russians, with 1,019 members; forty-nine among the Ruthenians, with 676 members; and one hundred and fourteen among the Slovaks, with 10,550 members; a total of 368 missions and churches and 27,540 members. In other words, less than one-half of one per cent. of these people are members of Protestant churches. One in forty of them may be in touch with Protestantism. The conference recommended that every church in the United States do its share in reaching people of foreign-speaking birth or parentage within its own community; that the evangelical denominations should form a united press for the co-operative publication in foreign languages of tracts, books and periodicals and the carrying on of an information service covering social, industrial and religious news from a Christian point of view, and that careful investigation should be made in regard to training religious workers among Slavic peoples and other foreign-speaking groups, with a view to greater interdenominational co-operation. These things are all good. But should not our Protestant churches get in touch with the great historic churches of these people? It may be vain to attempt to co-operate with the Roman Catholic Church. But the Eastern churches are in many cases showing a new spirit. No one of us thinks our object in approaching Poles or Russians or Slovaks is to turn them into Baptists or Presbyterians or Episcopalians. We have got beyond that. What we want is to bring them the fulness of freedom, the peace and purpose that there is in real Christianity. If they can get it through their old churches, well and good. Other things being equal, it is far better not to break with one's racial and personal past. May we soon hear that the evangelical churches are offering to help the Eastern churches in any way that they can. In this country there should be the duplicate of such moves as are under way in Turkey and in Egypt. There the Gregorian and Coptic churches are introducing the Sunday-school, and the Greek Church is looking with favor on a like development. The Eastern churches are beginning to recognize that we have some good elements which they lack. May we of the evangelical churches likewise share the grace of that humility which is ready to learn what others may have to teach us.

ROBERT STUART MACARTHUR

Dr. Robert Stuart MacArthur, the veteran Baptist preacher who died at Daytona, Florida, last week, was a brilliant and a useful man. He was called to the Calvary Baptist Church of New York while still a student in Rochester Theological Seminary. When he began his work in the church in 1870 it had about two hundred members. At the end of the forty-one years of his pastorate its membership was in the neighborhood of twenty-five hundred. A group of very distinguished Baptist laymen helped make Calvary Church and its pastor eminent in New York. The church gave nearly two million dollars while Dr. MacArthur was with it. Dr. MacArthur was outspoken on two political matters—his opposition to Irish Fenianism and his support of the Republican party. The success of that party was always a moral issue to him. But his political ardor did not prevent the Democrats in his church from finding profit in his ministry. He was a thorough gentleman. In decades gone by it was said of him that he "made the Baptists respectable in New York." That, of course, was by way of a joke. But the tribute which it implied to Dr. MacArthur himself was well deserved. The world is poorer for his going.

EDITORIAL

EDITORIAL STAFF

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

Frederick Lynch

ASSOCIATE EDITOR

Henry Strong Huntington

MANAGING EDITOR

Benson Y. Landis

LITERARY EDITOR

Tertius Van Dyke

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Edmund de Schweinitz Brunner

CONTRIBUTING STAFF

Henry A. Atkinson
Peter Ainslie
Hugh Black
S. Parkes Cadman

Sidney L. Gulick
Rufus M. Jones
E. Guy Talbott
T. Rhondda Williams

EDITORIAL COUNCIL

William C. Allen
Nehemiah Boynton
William Adams Brown
Howard Duffield
Sherwood Eddy
Irving Fisher
J. W. Johnson

Charles S. Macfarland
Shailer Mathews
George Foster Peabody
George A. Plimpton
Howard C. Robbins
Fred B. Smith
Cornelius Woelfkin

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS

Austria: Professor Carl Beth
Canada: Dr. J. Lovell Murray
Czechoslovakia: Professor Francis Zilka
France: Rev. Professor Wilfred Monod
Germany: Direktor A. Hinderer
Great Britain: Rev. Sidney M. Berry
Hungary: Dr. S. Szabo
Switzerland: Pastor Adolph Keller

If Not the Sermon, What?

IN a recent number of the "Yale Review," Dr. Francis E. Clark, of Christian Endeavor fame, has an article entitled "The Menace of the Sermon" which must make every Protestant pastor stop and think, and think hard, for if what Dr. Clark says is true it means what amounts to a revolution in the Protestant churches. Dr. Clark's contention is that the cause of decline in church attendance is due to the worship of the sermon. "It is the worship of the sermon instead of the worship of God, it is the sermon idolatry, which one must chiefly blame for the deplorable condition of many churches." The first question which a church committee asks concerning a prospective pastor is not about his Godliness, his helpfulness to young and old, his devotion, but, "Can he preach?" The pastor is called on the basis of his preaching—often because he pleases a few sermon tasters by two or three trial sermons; the people turn out to hear him for awhile; he brings out his best sermons; soon the novelty wears off; the few "star" sermons have been preached, and all but the few faithful (getting fewer every year) stay away: "So the neighbors go to hear the new minister, not to worship God, not to hear the Bible read and explained, not to join in the prayer and praise. Naturally, if they go for the sermon, they center their thought on the one outstanding person who for an hour is the man in the pulpit, returning home to discuss and criticise what he says and does. God is there, but they know it not. The Book of the Ages is read, but it means little to them. A minute portion of the Book is taken by the minister at least as a point of departure, but even that small section is soon forgotten. The minister's voice, his delivery, his enunciation, his thought or lack of it, his dress, even the way he handles his handkerchief, is considered and made a subject at the dinner table for approval or criticism. After a twelve-month comes the 'critical second year.' The favorite themes are exhausted, even sensational themes can no longer stir the jaded sense of expectation, or, if they do, the sermon in its sensationalism is not up to the subject announced, and a disappointed audience goes away from the church to pick the minister and his sermon to pieces more violently than ever."

Dr. Clark is careful not to say that the fault is the minister's. It is the worship of the sermon, and the minister is the victim of it, for only one pastor out of hundreds is gifted enough of God to preach two sermons a week, or even one, that will satisfy sermon worshipers, and most Protestants go to church for the sermon and not to worship God. Dr. Clark does not go far into the remedy. He hints at certain things. It is clearly evident that he thinks the churches will become emptier and emptier unless worship is emphasized rather than the sermon. He intimates that in the churches where God is worshiped, instead of the sermon, the attendance is greater, but he does not go into detail at all along these lines. Yet it is right here where light is needed. Dr. Clark has made a careful diagnosis and we are inclined to think there is much truth in it, but now the question that faces us is, What is the remedy?

We must confess that it is a perplexing problem, for the first question that arises is, If you take away the emphasis from the sermon, what have the Protestant churches got left? Outside of the few well-to-do churches in the cities, the music is no attraction. It is generally execrable, cheap music, poorly sung by amateur choirs. There is little common worship and in many churches—shall we say most of them?—people sit impatiently through the long prayer. There are some hymns and there is the Scripture reading left—hardly enough by themselves to make the service distinctive. The church buildings are, half of them, bare, having no consummate beauty such as should belong to God, and with no symbolism, no color, nothing that induces either awe or reverence, and, as Dr. Clark says, most of them built purely "to hear a sermon," many of them on the theater style, rather than built for prostration of the soul before the presence of God. This, then, is the question one has to ask Dr. Clark: You say the sermon is "killing" the churches, but what is there left for the people if you take it out? Dr. Clark answers this question briefly in a closing paragraph: "Put the emphasis in the church-going upon the idea of worship rather than upon the drawing power of the sermon." "Men innately seek a God whom they may worship. They will not go to church in any great numbers or for any great length of time if the sermon of the average minister is the chief attraction. The sermon alone has little sustained drawing power. If it is made the supreme motive for church-going, it is a menace to the Church. There is but one way to fill our churches with men and women, and to keep them full. They must first be filled with the spirit of worship. 'This is none other than the House of God' must be written on every lintel." We were interested in noting that almost at the same time Dr. Clark was writing these words one of the editors of "The Freeman" was expressing his fear of what might happen in Russia if the beautiful services of the Orthodox Church were discontinued, either by the edicts of the Bolsheviks or by some ardent reform movement which would substitute the sermon for the service. His point is that for millions of people the only beauty that ever touches their lives is the service of the church with its beautiful setting and the majestic movement of its music, and the only thing that touches them to reverence is the sense of God in His magnificent temple. This writer welcomes the liberation of thought which a reform movement may bring, but he dreads the effect upon the masses of the substitution of the dreary services of some Protestant churches for the glorious and majestic service of the Eastern Church.

EDITORIAL

We are inclined to think that while Dr. Clark has said much that is true, perhaps he has overlooked some other causes that operate for the decline of church attendance. Perhaps he attributes to sermon worship too much influence in this direction. Yet we believe he has touched upon a very vital point and is absolutely right in his final contention, that the emphasis in churchgoing should be placed upon the worship of God and not upon the sermon. The sermon should be but one incident of the service, although, of course, an outstanding part, but it should be only a part of a service which is shaped primarily for the worship of God. We believe that Dr. Clark is absolutely right in his contention that unless this is done the Protestant churches are going to lose the people more rapidly than ever. We believe that there is a great place for the sermon in an order of worship, but we believe that people will not long go to church in these days of freedom of thought, multiplicity of magazines and books discussing religious as well as secular thoughts, and widely diffused education, simply to hear the average preacher.

In view of this, what would we suggest? We dare make a few suggestions, although the whole subject deserves much fuller discussion than we can give it here. Right at the beginning we would say: The church building ought to be constructed primarily for worship, not for hearing sermons. Whatever type of architecture is most conducive to worship, reverence and awe should be followed in the main structure, and window, wall and furnishings should be ordered by the law of highest beauty rather than for convenience in hearing a man discourse. We are glad to say that this is being done more and more. Protestant congregations are departing more and more from what Dr. Clark calls theaters, built with acoustics in mind. We are building worshipful buildings more and more. If the preachers only knew it, a building which produces a sense of the Divine upon the worshippers is of the greatest help to his preaching. Our first suggestion, then, is this: when planning a new church, think of it as God's house, not the minister's.

Our second suggestion is that much more attention be given to our Protestant orders of service. They should be made much more services of a "common order," that is, services in which the whole congregation participate. They should not be shaped looking toward the sermon; never should they be "preliminaries," as they are still thought of in some places. They should deal with the great religious aspirations and emotions, always directed toward God. The great trouble in many of our Protestant churches is that the minister is more prominent than God. He does all the praying, reading and speaking, and in some places even most of the singing. The whole service should be planned so that from the first moment the worshiper is conscious of God and prostrates his soul before God as much as the average Protestant can, for he has had little training in this direction. It would be a great help if the people did more of the praying. They need not be bound by a prayer book, but there are hundreds of beautiful prayers available from the Church's treasure house of devotion of all ages which express the praise and needs of the whole people much more effectively and reverently than can the average preacher. So, too, much more attention should be paid to the music. This, again, never should be sung as at a concert, to be listened to by the people, but should be the common voice of the people raised in praise. We believe it would be a great gain toward worship if Protestants knew the words of what the choir was singing and took part in praise instead of settling down to be entertained. This, then, is our second thought: The service to be worshipful, reverent, common, toward God from beginning to end.

The third suggestion we would make is that the sacrament of the Lord's Supper be made to mean much more than it does in the average Protestant church. Some Protestant churches treat it in such a casual and perfunctory manner that they might as well abandon it altogether. In many churches it is an appendix to a previous service that has had no particular relation to it. In perhaps a majority of Protestant churches it is thought of as merely a memorial service. We believe the Protestant churches are missing a great opportunity to reach the real depths of the souls in their charge by not making the sacrament of the Lord's Supper a real sacrament of the presence of the Lord, and observing it with all solemnity, holiness and awe. Do not put it in as an appendix to another service. Make it the whole service and the most solemn service of the month. Above all, make the people who are to come to it feel that they are coming to meet the Holy God, the Living Christ. Why are we Protestants so afraid of believing what Christ himself said, that where his few people, his little flock, were, there He was in the midst of them? Are we not sometimes in danger of cutting out the very vitals of our whole faith by too much talk about Christ not being present in the church any more than anywhere else? Why have a church, then, or why have common worship, if the very act of common worship does not bring God near? And how does a church differ from a concert hall or auditorium if it is not God's house? And why should not Christ be nearer to us when we sit at His table and all our thought is of Him and all our souls are reaching out for Him than He is at other times and places? Sometimes we think that if we had to choose between the error of the Roman Catholic who localizes God in the flaming chalice on the altar and some Protestants who say He is no more at the Lord's Supper than in the restaurant across the road, we would choose to believe the Catholic. We like the story of the old Scotch minister who always put one chair at the communion table for the Lord. But we Protestants are failing to reach and minister to thousands of souls by not making this great, holy service of the Church a splendid festival of the Lord's real presence.

Finally, the sermon, except in certain churches in large cities that have become preaching centers, should be made more a part of the service of worship and less of an individual expression of the preacher's opinion on every topic under the sun. There are many things Catholics have to learn from Protestants; there are some things Protestants might well learn from Catholics, and one of them is the observance of the Christian year. There is something overwhelming in the fact that on a certain Sunday in every one of hundreds of thousands of Roman Catholic churches throughout the world the preacher is instructing his hearers on the theme set aside for that day. The Lutheran Church in Sweden uses the same text in every pulpit in the land every Sunday. Thus the sermon becomes an integral part of the worship. And we cannot help feeling that there ought to be much less stress put on the sermon as the discussion of a topic and more stress put upon it as instruction in the teachings of the Scriptures and the doctrines of the Church. The test of the new minister would then be as it should be, not how interesting and striking sermons can he preach, but how deeply versed is he in the Bible and the doctrines of the Church; how thoroughly does he understand music and all that goes to make for a beautiful and reverent service; how deeply is he conscious that he is called to shepherd all the people in his parish and reveal the tender heart of God to them. Sometimes we think the most outstanding sign of the decline of the Protestant churches are the sermon advertisements in the Saturday papers.

EDITORIAL

F. L.

Ways to God in the Common Life

RARE natures may get experiences of God. Ordinary natures may get exceptional experiences of God. Mystics tell us that such experiences, though temporary, deposit great assurances in the soul, and settle great questions. This is true. Such experiences, however, are not at command; that wind bloweth where it listeth. Many people of strong religious character go through life without them. For the majority of men and women, though it is well for them to hold themselves open to any rapturous discovery, any divine surprise that life may bring, it is necessary to point out other and humbler ways to the heart of divine reality. Such ways lie about us in our common life; the homeliest experiences are full of gates which open out upon heavenly lands. If we knew the gift of God, the gift of divine insight, the gift of discerning the meanings of things, if we knew who it was that is speaking to us in the common occurrences of life, we should find ourselves at once at the secret source of every precious thing. It is not necessary to ascend into heaven to bring Christ down, nor to dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea to find God; the center of the spiritual universe may be discovered just where we are in the familiar earthly home, in the humble occupation, in the social relations of every-day life, in the sort of experience which every day brings.

There was nothing special about the place which Jacob "lighted upon;" it was the opened eye which found the place to be the house of God and the gate of heaven. But Jacob might have had the same vision without leaving home, if his life at home had been lived in a different spirit. When he used the home as a place of selfish privilege, regarded a brother as the man to be got the better of, enjoyed selfishly the indulgences of a none too wise mother, and failed to regard even his old father with enough respect not to deceive him, the ancestral home could not become to him the house of God. If he had had the gift of God and discerned the real meaning of childhood, brotherhood, parenthood, he might have found the gate of heaven under his father's roof, and the foot of the celestial ladder on the hearth. The way to God for each one of us starts at our feet on the very spot where we are at any moment of life.

Take a few illustrations. The love of children is a common property of human nature. It is no monopoly of any nation or any class. Here is a word nigh unto us, in our heart and in our mouth. And what a word! The thought of the eternal is expressed in it, the heart of God is conveyed through it. The love of a child—follow the rill to its source, and you will find yourself at one of those "bubbling springs that feed the world." The "Luck of Roaring Camp" was the luck of having a little child in it who softened the hearts of the most hardened, discovered virtue in the sinful, and tenderness in the roughest. For many in the camp that love of the child was a shining track out of the quagmire of degradation and worldliness leading to the White City on the hill. If we knew the gift of God, and who it is that is speaking to us in the voices of the children, in the appeal of their lives, we should ask Him and He would give us living water. To discern the meaning of our relation to the child is to discern infinitely more than that. It means getting at the secrets of the universe, penetrating the heart of things, reaching the Eternal. To receive a little child in Christ's name is to receive the child in love; to receive the child in love is to receive Christ—it means getting at the meaning of Christ! not only so, but it means receiving God, getting at the divine reality of the universe. Here is a homely way to God. You do not even need to be what society calls respectable. In spite of many defects, and very serious defects of character, a man may find in his heart the love of a little child. And if so, the doors of the kingdom of heaven are opened to him, provided that he will not just leave that love as an isolated fact in his life; if he insists upon bringing other things into line with that love of the child, he will find himself to be a striving disciple in the Kingdom of God.

The same may be said concerning family feeling. Not knowing the gift of God, many people have misused family feeling, and made a selfish thing of it towards outside society. But to discern its divine meaning is to be led out to the great truth that God meant the whole world of men and women to make one great family. The early Church caught some of that meaning. The man who wrote those wonderful words in Ephesians must have caught it: "Ye are no longer strangers and sojourners," he said, addressing himself to those whom he had considered aliens, "but fellow citizens with the saints and the household of God." Christian discernment, the gift of God, had shown him the wider implications of the meaning of family. If we only knew who it is that speaks to us through the strength and the beauty and the tenderness of family life we should see that no part of the world is to be left out in the cold. Aliens must be made fellow citizens, outcasts must be brought home, and men and women must realize themselves as members of the family of God. Here is the starting-point in homeliest experience towards that great truth which ought to be encircling the world to-day. If we had the divine insight into the meaning of family life we should see how the strife and contention of nations, how war and destruction, are an outrage on child love and family life. We should find in every home the training ground of the wider brotherhood.

EDITORIAL

But outside the family there are many other common ways to God. The woman of Samaria found a tired man sitting at the well who asked her for a drink of water. That led to a conversation, the conversation to a discovery; she found a prophet, she found the Messiah. We never know what we are going to find when we begin to deal with a human soul. And dealing with a soul may often be made possible through appeals and responses relating to the physical life. Such appeals are numerous and poignant in these days when so large a part of the world is submerged in want and woe, and helping man is a very good way of finding God.

But I must mention what is perhaps the outstanding fact which, if interpreted by divine insight, would bring us the richest treasures of knowledge and assurances—I mean the fact of the spiritual values of life. Think of the claims that beauty, goodness, truth make upon us. They may be despised, neglected, rebelled against, but they remain recognized values of existence. They must be regarded as the essential characteristics of the world-order. They are no artificial creations of ours, but are rooted in the very character of our universe. There is a rational conclusion from the existence of these values towards God. But, apart from that, there is an experimental way of realizing them as belonging to the very heart of the eternal order. These values are immanent in personal and social human life, and to see their implications is to discover the ways of the Spirit, and to become aware of the presence of the Highest. Now if we knew the gift of God in regard to all these things, child love, family feeling, the social appeal, the spiritual values, if we knew who it is who is speaking to us in all these, what would happen? We should ask of Him and He would give us the living water. We should let child love lead us to the footstool of the Father; we should be drawn by family feeling to the altar of God; we should find Christ in our brethren; and in the demand of the mind for truth, and in the longing of the heart for beauty and for love, we should recognize the luminous way to assurance through all the darkness and disorder of the world.

Why do so many people not take these paths to God? These ways which God has laid within their reach? Perhaps because as paths, as ways, they are partly hidden. As facts, as experiences, they are clear; everybody knows them. But the power of a fact to kindle a faith, and the power of an experience to yield soul-truth depend upon spiritual insight. You may love a child and deny God, because though you know the fact you do not know its meaning; because you have not seen its implications it gives you no lead to anything further. You may have worthy feelings towards your family and draw no inference from them as to why God brings you up that way. You may encounter appeals from the lower places of human misery, and you may or may not respond to them with some amount of generosity, but you go no further into the meaning of that experience, and do not discern the reason why the appeal is made and felt. You might even be a little shocked to think it was made because the man who makes it is conscious of precisely the same manhood as belongs to you, and his appeal is just a testimony that whatever artificial distance there may be between you, you belong close together. To show things in this light is the function of divine insight. The common ways to God are often like paths in a wood, leaves partly conceal them, straying growths partly hide them; there is a little clearing to be done very often before they are seen. But be sure that power to perceive the real meanings and connections of our common life will bring us the rich places in religion.

T. R. W.

The Widening Chasm Between the Church and the Masses

A LITTLE group of nationally known religious leaders were discussing the present serious situation confronting the churches. Two of these men were former church board secretaries who had practically been forced from their positions as board secretaries because they were not acceptable to the money interests in their respective denominations. One of these men, who had been a pioneer in the movement twenty years ago to bring the Church closer to the workingmen, said very frankly that the chasm between the Church and the toiling masses was wider to-day than it was twenty years ago.

The other said he would go much further and say that the Church was powerless to bridge the chasm, and that the breach was permanent. Another well known religious leader, who had been forced by the money interests of his denomination to leave one of its universities, said that the Church to-day was facing a greater crisis than the Church of the sixteenth century faced. He said that if the Church to-day cast in her lot with the forces of reaction there was no hope for the future of civilization at the hands of the Church.

There was general agreement that there was widespread religious feeling and passion in millions of people outside the churches, and that these people longed for a voice of authority and leadership from the Church. All agreed that the Kingdom of God must be established in the earth. There was great unbelief as to the Church of to-day measuring up to the responsibility of the task of establishing the Kingdom of God on earth.

Each of these religious leaders has written many books concerning the relation of the Church to society and its complex problems. Each has been recognized as a prophetic voice by thousands of earnest seekers after truth within the Church. To what extent have they correctly interpreted the present attitude of the Church toward the world's workers and toward the problem of saving society? Is it true that the chasm between the Church and the workers is ever widening, and that the Church as an institution is failing in her divinely appointed task of bringing in the Kingdom of God?

These are questions that should cause pause and answer by the leaders of the Church. The statements of sober judgment by such men as have been quoted cannot be lightly brushed aside as of no consequence. These men are in a better position to know the pulse of the workers and the masses than any present-day leader in any of the churches. They are loyal to the Church and long to see the Church take her rightful place of leadership in the establishment of the Kingdom of God on earth.

In recent years the churches have passed many glowing resolutions in their highest ecclesiastical bodies, expressing sympathy for the workers and their aspirations for better lives. They have all declared in favor of collective bargaining, and minimum wages, and co-partnership of labor and capital both in owning and managing industry. All these high-sounding phrases have been lightly considered until just recently. Now the churches must take their stand. Are they going to make action conform to resolution? If not, then the churches invite the charge of hypocrisy.

EDITORIAL

The employers' associations all over this country, most of whose members are pillars in the churches, are calling on the churches to repudiate these resolutions. This is not an over-statement of fact. Such associations are asking their members to refuse financial support to religious bodies professing such heretical economic doctrines. The Young Women's Christian Association recently passed through such an experience at the hands of the Employers' Association of Pittsburgh. The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and the Interchurch World Movement have had the same experience.

The time has come for the Church to stand by her resolutions and not try to explain them away. The so-called Better America Federation has raved against a religious teacher because, forsooth, he taught that the Sermon on the Mount should be applied to business. The Gospel of Jesus has at last got to come out in the open in the field of industry. The battle royal is now on between human rights and property interests. All the resolutions passed by the Church place the Church on the side of human rights.

A great labor leader has said that the best friend labor has to-day is the Church. This statement should be placed over against the gloomy picture painted by the religious leaders. The labor leader was thinking of the resolutions passed by the Church, and the way the big business interests were putting the screws on certain interdenominational religious organizations because they stood for social justice.

The Church in the year 1923 has before it the greatest opportunity in history to demonstrate that the resolutions of the past ten years are more than scraps of paper. To stand loyally by these resolutions in time of industrial war will be far harder for the churches than it was for them to stand by their resolutions against war and for peace during the World War. Everyone knows how those resolutions were forgotten while the war was on. Will it be so with the resolutions in favor of industrial peace?

The Church faces her supreme trial at this hour. The future of civilization and the destiny of many generations are in the balance.

E. G. T.

A Conference on "Faith and War"

[EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE]

ON January 10, 1923, in response to the challenge sent out to the Church of Christ throughout the world by Dr. Jowett, of London, a conference on "Faith and War" was held in the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York City. When the notices were given out that such a meeting would be held a great many letters came in response. Most of them were favorable, some were not.

A soldier responded as follows: "As I have devoted my best efforts for nearly forty years to preparedness, and am now a lieutenant colonel of staff, specialist in the Reserve Corps of the Army, I could probably with consistency only be classified as a preparedness advocate. Yet, always, from the beginning, I have regarded this as an ugly duty which I chose because I was fitted for it, and because all history and experience convinced me of its necessity. No one can so well value peace as the man who knows at first hand the horror and futility of war. What I know of mankind makes me long for the ideal of peace, while regretfully I contribute my best efforts toward war because it is inevitable."

Another soldier, in writing about the proposed meeting, remarked: "Permit me to say that the subject seems to me an unfortunate one. Our nation went through so much pacifism, and so on, before at last it found its own soul that it seems a pity to revive a topic which cost over a million lives by our delay in entering the war and ruined poor Russia."

Another person writing remarked: "I believe most heartily in all honest and honorable effort to educate people away from war."

Still another wrote in: "I shall be interested to hear how far an 'out-and-out pacifist' is willing to go."

A lawyer wrote: "I have read Dr. Jowett's articles with interest. I think he is absolutely right, and I believe that the time is ripe for the organization of a third party on the distinctly and frankly Christian basis."

Another lawyer replied: "I take very little interest in an academic discussion of the kind you plan. Every sane man deplores and should use his best-effort against war, but there are times when it is not an academic question and every country should be prepared to defend itself and every good citizen should try to do his part if necessary in carrying a war successfully. It seems to me that it is largely a practical and not an academic question, and I doubt if any good is done by airing such views. I must ask you to postpone my invitation until the subject to be discussed is one in which I am more in sympathy."

The response to the announcement of the meeting was, however, overwhelmingly in favor of a thoroughgoing discussion of the whole matter of faith and war. A great many expressed themselves as to the importance of discussing the matter at this time in an era of comparative peace, pointing out that in time of war it is impossible to carry on such a sharing of views. Four speakers consented to speak for ten minutes each, with the understanding that questions could be asked after the conclusion of all four talks.

The first speaker was Mr. George Hornblower, a member of the New York bar and an officer in the Reserve Corps of the United States Army, who is a member of the Madison Avenue Church. Mr. Hornblower began by saying that he did not wish Christ made out a pacifist, as his reverence for Christ was based on his manly human resistance to wrong. "We should seek for right, justice and mercy for others, not for ourselves. The only excuse for war is as a means of establishing the right. We should remember that sometimes we have to go into war to achieve that right." He discussed the question of whether war could be avoided by unpreparedness, taking up the wars in which this country had participated. "Unpreparedness has been tried out with failure. People and nations have vanished from history as soon as they adopted the idea of being unprepared or have prepared at the last minute. The Greeks lost their independence because they didn't stay prepared. The American colonists tried to solve their troubles with the Indians by showing a non-warlike attitude by not carrying arms, but it did not work and armed resistance became necessary. The Revolution could never have happened if we had not been so unprepared. The King of England thought he could trample on us, but as soon as we began preparing for war the king began acquiring respect for our rights. The War of 1812 was one of the most just causes we ever championed, and the striking thing about it was that we went into it reluctantly, even when England and France were trampling on our rights and committing outrages on the high seas. The Administration tried to avoid war by making no preparation for it. Before the outbreak of the Civil War the South thought the North afraid to fight, if they seceded, because there were no signs of warlike preparation. Untrained troops were sent to fight without proper weapons, discipline and organization. The Spanish War found us fully prepared on the sea; but, looking at it from the other standpoint, Spain was unprepared and was unable to avoid the war, although, as shown by the dispatches of our minister, General Woodford, Spain was ready to grant practically all our demands. The war with Germany was declared too late to accomplish what should have been accomplished, and it was declared with a nation unprepared. The Secretary of War boasted that the country was unprepared before the committee of Congress. Unpreparedness did not avoid that war; it merely made us unable to prevent the ruin of Europe. As a result, we spent months and months training men while other nations fought our battles, and the war dragged on until Europe's collapse became almost irreparable. It would have saved Europe two or more years of suffering and exhaustion if we had been ready. The most successful wars our country ever fought were not declared and involved no bloodshed. One occurred when we drove Emperor Louis Napoleon out of the Western Hemisphere by sending Sheridan's army of veterans to New Orleans. The other occurred when President Roosevelt called a bluff of Kaiser William by sending a well armed fleet to the West Indies. In both instances we won without striking a blow, because we were prepared."

EDITORIAL

The second speaker was Leroy Baldrige. Mr. Baldrige was a newspaper correspondent with the German army on its way through Belgium. He was with the American Army on the Mexican border and was a year in the French army, and served with the American forces in France. He was a cartoonist on the "Stars and Stripes," and made some of the war posters for the Liberty Loan campaigns. On rising to speak he declared his thesis, "I would not join any army of any nation for war for any purpose whatever." Mr. Baldrige declared that after seeing war first-hand with so many different forces he had come to the conclusion that war in any sense meant the same thing, the breeding of hate. The closer he came in contact with war the more he saw how war stirs up hate that can never be undone.

Regarding the atrocities, he mentioned 250 men who were shot because of civilian resistance in Belgium. On the other hand, he cited the execution of fifty French girls at Rheims who were supposed to be spies of the Germans. Having talked with people on both sides of the fighting lines, he was convinced that the atrocities were about equally balanced, and that the several peoples had swallowed a propaganda of lies about each other. He said: "I saw the government turned into lying organizations during the war. The further away from the trenches I got the greater was the hate for the Germans. It was greater in Paris than at the front, greater in London than in Paris, greater in New York than at London, and greatest of all in San Diego, where my home was, the furthest point away from the lines."

He thought he would go to China and think the matter over. There in the village where the missionaries had worked hard for many years fifty per cent. of the men had gone to work as coolies in France. When they came back they dug their old idols out of the dust heaps and said that they would worship the old gods rather than participate in a Christian civilization which could bring on such a war.

The third speaker was Nevin Sayre, editor of "The World To-morrow." Mr. Sayre is an out-and-out pacifist. He said in part: "If people are going to fight, then the proper thing to do is to prepare." His only question was, "Can you gain righteous ends if you use unrighteous means?" Modern warfare cannot be fought except through a wholesale destruction of life, the destruction of the innocent as well as the guilty, the destruction of the civil population of both sexes by poison gas, by a propaganda of lies, by the use of every conceivable method of stirring up hatred, and by the employment of any means whatsoever to gain the victory.

The fourth speaker was Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, who said that he could not agree either with the advocates of unpreparedness, whose ideas he thought might lead to a lack of effort in such critical cases as the Near East problem, nor could he coincide entirely with the view of the preparedness advocates, whose demands for armies would be a constant burden to all peoples.

It must be remembered that these sketches do not give all that the speakers said, and that it was almost impossible for them to make their case completely in the time allowed them. After the speeches an hour and a quarter discussion was held by the different people from the floor. Mr. Sayre said that in the settlement of the Turkish situation most people remarked that the pacifist took the position of being willing to do nothing in the face of the gruesome facts. He said that they were ready and eager and willing to do many things, the first one would be to start a propaganda of truth to counteract the lies which were being told on behalf of both sides. There would follow commissions of teachers and doctors and other sorts of advisers, and that the last thing the pacifists would advocate doing would be to sit back and do nothing.

At the close of the meeting there was an almost unanimous feeling that the whole discussion had been helpful, many looking forward to a repetition of the meeting in the near future. It is extremely difficult for the local church to gear into the complicated international situation in which we find ourselves, but it seems in small local conferences like these where the people of the church themselves discuss the matter much good can be done in finding ourselves in the difficult problem of Christian faith and war.

I pass our experience along in order that it might suggest to other ministers a solution of similar problems.

GEORGE STEWART, JR.

Within the last three months three measures have been introduced into Congress to take all possibility of private profit out of war. A plan "for drafting all the resources of the United States, human and material, so that not one penny of war profit shall inure to the benefit of private individual, corporation or combination," after the nation's experience with war profiteers and "cost plus" contracts, would meet with very great popular favor.

THE OBSERVER

A New Exposition of the Claims of the Christian Ministry

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

I HAVE just been reading a delightful book, "Being a Preacher" (The Revell Company, New York), by my good friend, Dr. James I. Vance of the First Presbyterian Church, Nashville, Tenn. The book consists of a series of eight lectures on preaching, or rather on preachers, delivered on the James Sprunt Foundation at Union Theological Seminary at Richmond in 1923. The lectures were, of course, delivered to young men who are studying for the ministry, and are shaped with their life work in view, but others besides the divinity students evidently heard the lectures, for all through them there is the appeal to the young man who has not yet made his decision to enlist in the greatest life work in the world. It is this thought in the book which interests me most. It is a long time since I have found such an exalted statement of the minister's calling. The first lecture deals almost entirely with this one point. Its note is that while the ministry may be a poor business from the point of view of earning a living, yet from the point of view of living a life it is the greatest calling a young man can achieve.

Dr. Vance is right, preaching is a great calling, and he is absolutely justified in claiming that not only does it offer one the greatest opportunity of serving his fellow man, but perhaps brings more real joy in life than any other walk men follow. Some of the points Dr. Vance makes are very striking. He says, for instance, that in business the effort is to see how much you can make, whereas in the ministry the effort is to see how much good one can do. In a business one is trying to see how much he can get out of the world, but in this calling he is trying to see how much he can put into the world. In business he is thinking of profits and dividends, whereas in the ministry he is thinking of service. In business one may leave everything behind him when he dies and be a pauper forever, but the man who has served in the ministry, or anywhere else, takes everything with him when he dies and is rich forever.

Dr. Vance admits that one may make a calling out of any vocation, business or anything else, but it still remains that the minister is the one man who dedicates his life purely to service, therefore to him comes the great opportunity, the great joy, and the great riches.

Dr. Vance sums up most strikingly the big, happy, enriching life that belongs to the really devoted minister. For instance, he is dealing all his life in the biggest things; he is dealing with great spiritual, intellectual and moral values. Thus he continually moves through the vast spaces of the universe and lives in touch with the deepest, the highest and the broadest things. Great thoughts are his companions, great souls his inspiration, and his life is spent in calling forth the best in the lives of men. What joy, what opportunity greater than this?

Another point which Dr. Vance brings out splendidly is that the preacher is dealing with eternal values. He is not dealing with values which last only twenty, forty or sixty years; his values are of eternity rather than time. He offers in his ministry a gospel that treats the soul of man as an immortal thing and the thought and aspiration of man as belonging to eternity and the universalities. The laws with which he deals are as much a part of the unending universe as gravitation. He deals with great moral principles which, as Sophocles said, are not made by man and cannot be destroyed by man, but are a very part of the soul of the universe.

Again Dr. Vance calls attention to the fact that the preacher has the message that will transform society. He is endeavoring to lift all of our commercial, economic, racial and national suspicions and hatreds up onto a new plane where the Golden Rule will be not only the maxim of man, but the foundation principle of all the ongoings of the world. He believes in brotherhood; brotherhood both of man and nations, and he believes his message can bring brotherhood if only men will take it and abide by it. The minister starts out to make a new world. Who else dreams such a dream? The preacher believes that the tabernacle of God can be brought down from heaven and set up in the earth. He is the prophet, he is the man of all men who holds the key to the future. He really has the only social order that will ever make mankind satisfied. "This is the work of the preacher, of an humble and unpretentious preacher of the Gospel. His stipend may be a mere pittance, barely enough to keep soul and body together. His family may need to practice the sternest economy to maintain appearances before a congregation that is often more critical than considerate. He may never be known beyond the confines of his little parish. He may be neither eloquent nor profound. But he is a man who has harnessed his ability to the greatest calling on earth and is moving the world uphill."

The other chapters are devoted more to the work of the preacher and deal with such topics as what the message of the preacher should be and what the man behind the message should be and on methods of thought and action. There is a very interesting chapter on the drab and the gold in the minister's life, but the gold predominates, and in this chapter Dr. Vance makes a very interesting point of how rich the ministry is in friendships. Perhaps there is no profession in which the camaraderie is more beautiful than it is in the ministry. In almost every town in the United States the ministers foregather on Monday and deal not only with their common problems and talk not only on the great themes which occupy their minds, but open their hearts one to the other, and probably there is no more delightful company in the world than these Monday groups of men.

Dr. Vance is in thorough sympathy with the modern activity of the Church and realizes that the message of Christ is for institutions, organizations, groups and nations as well as for individuals, and yet he is somewhat alarmed at the tendency of ministers to run off on current events, and one thing and another, whereas fundamentally their mission is to preach the Gospel. He thinks that one reason so many churches are half filled, or, if they are filled, filled with a curious crowd of people who have no thought of God before them, is this very fact that so many ministers forget that they are the ambassadors of God and should go into the pulpit Sunday morning to preach the great things of God. Neither is the Gospel the simple thing we make it seem. If it is simple, it is simple only as the sunlight is simple, or the stars in the vast heavens. He even intimates that there are preachers who feel the sermon will be dull if it is religious. It has been his experience through many years of preaching that the one thing that will bring the people to the church, take it year in and year out, is the preaching of the Gospel—and big truths for big men. He thinks the Church inevitably encounters failure when it goes out on side issues. He says if the Church is engaged in entertaining people, the theater can easily put it out of business; if it is trying to give the news of the day, the press can easily outdistance it; if it is merely a goal of social reform and civic righteousness, there are reform clubs that can achieve these things much more efficiently and sooner; “but when it comes to the message that shows the lost soul how to get right with God, the Church stands without a competitor. The Church has the Gospel, and its sole and supreme task is to proclaim the message.”

FREDERICK LYNCH.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Fellowship

By A. Maude Royden

Preached at Eccleston Guildhouse, London

[Miss Royden preached the following sermon just before leaving England for her present tour in America. Miss Royden is now so well known as the foremost woman preacher of her generation that she no longer needs to be introduced.]

“Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.”

OUR Lord said, “Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.” I believe that the fellowship which all men desire is one of “these things” of which this is specially true. It used to be said in the middle ages that the reason why the devil was so anxious to ensnare souls was because he dreaded to be lonely in hell. To most of us loneliness is hell. To be loved and to love, to be understood, to be with people who are congenial and sympathetic, to have consciousness of common feeling, common interest, and common aspirations, is heaven. Fellowship is heaven, and lack of it hell—certainly to-day just as much as when John Ball said it. The desire for fellowship sometimes leads us a little astray. We think that if we seek fellowship all other things will be added unto us; whereas, as a matter of fact, we must seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, and then fellowship is added unto us. Merely to wish for fellowship, to long for friends, to desire congenial companionship does not always bring them; sometimes it even seems to send them further away; the very intensity of our desire almost repels the thing we want, because the converse of what our Lord said is also true, that unless we seek the Kingdom of God and His righteousness first the other things are taken away from us. It is when people are seeking something which is to them the Kingdom of God that they find fellowship. In every great struggle, in the face of great obstacles, in the presence of a great aspiration, you find fellowship without seeking it; you have sought the Kingdom of God, and fellowship, with many other things, has been added to you. So long as your motive is good and your object is one that you hold in common and your difficulties fairly great, you are practically certain of fellowship being born without any definite effort on your part. It is a commonplace that even the horrors of war have not prevented some soldiers from missing the comradeship of the trenches. Sir Philip Gibbs, who will not be thought to underestimate the horrors of modern war, speaks in one of his books of that feeling of loneliness which often attacked soldiers when they first came back from the war, that sense of something missing which was worth almost anything else in the world, that comradeship and sense of fellowship with people who were, like themselves, in the face of a tremendous enterprise, in a common danger, with a common object. You find it always wherever there is a common aspiration. Not only the soldiers, who were up against a great and powerful enemy, but the conscientious objectors who were up against public opinion, had this intense sense of fellowship with one another. You find it in some great movements. The charm of the stories of the pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood is chiefly a charm of friendship. People who know nothing about art and perhaps do not care very much about it can enjoy the story of that movement because of the sense of human fellowship in it; just as in the Oxford Movement people who are not in the least interested in the ecclesiastical theories that were there fought and struggled for are fascinated by the story of such men as Newman, Keble, Pusey and Hurrell Froude, because of this sense of human brotherhood and fellowship which we all love so much and desire so greatly.

Fellowship is part of the charm of the great Polar expeditions. They have the exhilarating sense of conquest, of danger and of the unknown, but there is also the extraordinary charm of the relationship to one another of those who take part in them, their loyalty to their chief, their common subordination to a great end. Here, in a little way, at this Guildhouse, we have had a great sense of fellowship with one another; not that we are in any great danger, but simply because on the whole we are united by a certain desire to be useful to our generation, to rediscover and reinterpret our Christianity, to do our part to set the world in order. There has been among us from the beginning a sense of very real and—so it seems to me—a very beautiful fellowship. I think the friendships that have been formed here by people who did not know each other a few years ago have been one of the loveliest things that have happened at the Guildhouse; over and over again people have written to me that the thing that struck them most here was the friendliness of every one here when they came for the first time. For the feeling of friendliness which you have created many people are grateful to you. I suppose Christians do love one another. Do they? They do not always show it very graciously, especially if you happen to go into their pew.

If this sense of fellowship is to last it can only be by taking more care than was needed to create it. Fellowship does not come by observation; it is born. When people are linked together in some effort or aspiration or common work, fellowship comes without their working for it or noticing it. Seeking first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, fellowship and friendship are added to you. But over and over again it has happened that the spirit of fellowship which has been born in a great endeavor has vanished after a year or two, or has been darkened with such suspicions, fears, jealousies, such squalid quarrels that one asks oneself in amazement how such and such a movement ever succeeded at all—how human beings could be at once so lovely and so base. When, for instance, you read the story of the great fight for freedom in Italy, one of the most romantic and heroic stories in the pages of history—the story adorned by the names of Mazzini, Garibaldi, Cavour and others, whose names are written in gold in the book of life—when you have seen the romance and glory of it, and then get a little closer to the movement, are you not appalled by the mean, squalid quarrels, disloyalties, rivalries, jealousies which disfigure it, so that the romance and glory seem to be almost a sham? They are not a sham; they are far more real than that other side; yet it is mournful that there should be another side; but it is so common in great movements for this to happen, so easy for those who are in them to lose the sense of the romance and the greatness of the thing they are striving for in the friction and difficulty of human beings working together.

Why is it that again and again the spirit of fellowship has been so weakened as to be almost lost in the great movements of the world? I think it is just because that spirit has been born unawares, when people are on the heights; they forget that it cannot live without some care, some pains, some labor. In the first instance, like all good things from God, it comes without observation. You are lifted in the first impulse of some great inspiration, and you find with joy that there are others who believe and think as you do and are prepared to fight by your side, and in the joy of that discovery you are raised to a height of inspiration and happiness, from which you can overlook all the little things of life; they disappear for a time; you take them in your stride; you are going so fast and so far that from the heights—and it is given to all of us at some time to be on the heights—the little ups and downs of the plain beneath seem all flattened out and not to matter. But it is not given to human nature to live always in that state of mind. It is possible—more possible than we realize—to live in the great deeds and the great severities, but it is not possible always to be on that prophetic peak, always to be on such a height that the little things of life do not really matter. When you come down a little the little things seem to rise up and sometimes you can hardly see over them; you become aware that some of the best human beings have all sorts of trying ways. Sometimes the fact that the joy of fellowship came so spontaneously makes you expect to keep it with the same unconscious ease as that with which it was born, and that is not given to human beings. We have to exercise, to take some pains, if we are to preserve that spirit of common loyalty, that sense of fellowship, that gift of creating friends, which is the very salt and beauty of life. On the lower levels we need to practise the virtues that are obtained on the heights; we need to remember that what really matters is what we saw on the heights; that people should care for the same great truth, as we conceive it; that they should be working for the same end; that their value in that work is the thing that matters and not whether you find them congenial or not. The greatest lesson I learned in the Suffrage movement was that persons counted for what they were worth to the movement, and not for their virtues and qualities that made them congenial to oneself, or the reverse. People who were temperamentally uncongenial to each other learned to work together, as they have done in all great movements, for the sake of the common object.

This experience makes one a wider and a larger person. The common human instinct is to hold on to some particular piece of work as though one were the only person in the world that could do it. What a miserable little ambition! The great thing is to engage in some work that is too big for any one person to do alone, something so great, so much above the ordinary human level that all human beings can take a share in it. In that way you lose your individual way of looking at things; not that you have lost your individual point of view, but that you have seen a greater and wider one. That is the reward that comes to those who are always thinking, not whether they themselves are doing the work or getting the credit for it—that is even worse—but whose only concern is that the work shall be done in the best possible way. That does make one more spacious; it does in the truest sense of the word liberate the spirit.

In friendship it is just the same. One must not hold too tight even to one's friends, and perhaps that is where some movements have failed. The first little band of friends may have had a sense of fellowship so intense that it satisfied them completely, and they were not able to open out and make room for others. Do you remember that passage in Mr. Cherry-Garrard's book, "The Worst Journey in the World," where he speaks of the passion of rage that suddenly seized his little party when they heard that they had been anticipated at the South Pole, that Amundsen had got there before them? He said a sudden, unreasoning, savage fury possessed them, and they wanted to go and destroy those people who had been there before them. It was because their co-operation was so perfect, their spirit of subordination to a great aim so absolute, that when suddenly they came up against competition, it seemed like a kind of descent into hell.

I remember a very successful mistress of a household who, before she was married, had been thought to be one of the last persons in the world to make a success of running a house, and that she would never be able to keep her servants. When I asked her the secret of her success she said:

"I realized that I should never get perfect servants because I am not a perfect mistress, and I made up my mind to try to be as little disagreeable to them as I possibly could."

Our desire to find people perfect, our very reverence and love for them perhaps, sometimes make us unjust and exact-

(Continued on page 274)

The Horrors of Famine in Russia

Is all that is Told True?

By SIR PHILIP GIBBS

HUNDREDS of times, since I came back from Russia, I have been asked: "Is it true—this about the famine?"

There seems still to exist a certain doubt regarding the tales about the famine. A newspaper has even gone so far as to deny completely the existence of the tragedy and derive the "rumors" from a deceitful propaganda from Bolshevik quarters in order to save the Soviet Republic through an appeal to the charity of foreign powers.

It would be unbelievable, if one did not know it to be true, that in this year of grace and "civilization" many millions of people are threatened by famine and that the rest of humanity does not hasten to their assistance, but leaves them remorselessly to their fate, if one disregards works of charity from a few private persons and a few philanthropical associations, which are impotent before such suffering.

I wish I could say that the famine does not exist. It would be the best news and would calm the conscience of many. But my happiness is spoiled by the thought of the men and women whom I saw in Russia who had only food for a day or two more, and after that no hope to get more or even food for one or two days, nothing at all, not a crust of bread, not a crumb between themselves and death of starvation, which crept nearer to them, slowly, too slowly, but steadily.

People ask me: "How many millions are going to die?" How can I tell? I do not know the power of resistance of these Russian peasants, these peasants who can exist upon next to nothing; nor do I know the number that is carried off by typhoid, before starvation begins its work; the quantity of food which in one way or another will reach them, carried on sledges over frozen fields from British or American relieving expeditions or from the Soviet's stores. It took sixty days for an Irish hunger-striker to die, although he refused to take any nourishment whatsoever. It will perhaps take ten times sixty days for a Russian peasant to die, if he eats some dusty leaves or some blue clay which he digs out of the ground, or some rotten cabbage stalks, which was all I saw in some of the huts.

There were twenty-five millions in the district which had been ravaged by the drought, but it would be wrong, a dreadful exaggeration to say, as I think it has been said, that all these millions should die of hunger. It would be a sixth part of the entire population of Europe, and would give birth to such pestilential diseases that all Europe would perish thereby. It is not quite as bad as that. Of these twenty-five millions some have enough to eat, if not in abundance, others can barely support life, and the remaining millions—Nansen puts them down at ten—have no more than what delays an inevitable death. Many of those I met must now be dead.

WAITING FOR DEATH

In a small house in a little Russian village at the other side of the Volga I saw a family await death, and they had not long to wait. There was no bread, nothing green, no cabbage stalks, none of the blue clay, which, dug out of a hill, is sold as human food. The housefather tried to rise from the wooden sofa where he was sitting. He was bleeding from his mouth and resembled a living skeleton with his yellowish skin drawn tightly over the underlying frame. The mother was lying upon the big stove which is the usual sleeping place of the Russian peasant. Close by and with her arms around her was a fourteen-year-old daughter, both were dying. At the window at the end of the room was sitting a beautiful boy, dressed in rags. He was all but dead; his strangely staring eyes seemed to look into another world. It was very quiet in the room. The father whispered some hardly audible words. Once the mother groaned, but the boy and the girl did not utter a sound. Death was at the door.

The neighbors could not help. When afterwards I visited one cottage after another, I understood why. Some of the inhabitants had a little food, which they showed me. An old woman came with a wooden bowl containing a handful of chopped leaves. It was the best she had and she wept when she showed it to me. A tall, broad-shouldered peasant, a fine looking fellow, but so enfeebled that he must lean against a chair when he was standing up, showed us half a bun, made of straw and leaves. His wife was also there, and a little daughter with big eyes in a flower-like face. The man said some words in Russian, which were translated to me by one of my companions: "We have only this left, we must perish." A woman drew me with her into her cottage. She seemed a little deranged. There was a child standing in a ragged shirt, and she tore the clothes off it and pointed at its swollen stomach. It is strange that the children do swell when they die of starvation.

"Here everybody is starving," said a peasant in another cottage, "some are nearer to death than others." He was the representative of the local Soviet, an important person in the village. He had a cow, which had given his family milk. But now he must kill it in the absence of fodder. He would send the meat to the market (Moscow is full of meat just now, as the peasants must kill their cows) and buy bread and perhaps a little potatoes for the money. It would perhaps last a few weeks. And afterwards—he shrugged his shoulders. My interpreter translated his words to me. The shrug of the shoulders spoke for itself.

A girl was alternately laughing and weeping. She was a typical peasant girl from the neighborhood of the Volga, with a broad face and eyes set wide apart. She spoke to me several times, but as several persons were speaking at the same time, the interpreter could not give an account of all. "What is she saying?" I asked. "She says that her little child is dying."

I was a stranger, who came to these villages driven over the snow widths by two ill-conditioned horses. The news of my arrival spread wide about. They thought I might be able to help them, but God knows I could not do it otherwise than through the words I am now writing. Into the cottage where I was sitting came other people, crossing themselves in the door, according to Russian custom. They came to tell me of their misery, ask for help for their children. A woman seized my wrist and tried to draw me along with her. I could not understand what she wanted. She was wild in her desperate efforts to get me with her, somewhere. At last I found out that she also had a dying child. I could not do anything to save it, as little as any of the others. Ashamed, I offered them money, this almost valueless Russian paper money. In these villages it is quite without value, one cannot buy anything with it. Nobody has anything to sell. The nearest trading place was at the other side of the snow fields, and there was not much. Here money was of no use.

These village inhabitants seemed already dead, when we drove out through the gates of the high enclosures which surround all villages. Hardly a living creature was to be seen, only a white child's face was flitting here and there behind the wooden shutters.

ICE PREVENTS SUPPLY

I protest that I cannot understand how some of the inhabitants in these villages could still be alive. I could not discover any possible means for them to get food, any way of escape. Some of the children got one meal a day from the American Relief Work, but in one village it was only forty out of three hundred and fifty, and in the others in the same proportion. Everybody else must starve; the parents did not have anything. I dare not say, though, that they were all dying or soon dead. It is possible, although hardly probable, from the information I have got, that some potatoes or bread or meal can be brought them from the government. Here and there along the Volga there were vessels carrying potatoes from the government stores. But the Volga was freezing when I left the district and the landing-places were deserted. My boat was the last one going between Kazan and Simbirsk. The potatoes were in a stage of rotting, for the only means of transportation was sledge, and the horses dropped down in the absence of food. Perhaps some of the peasants have small hidden stores which can keep them alive. Perhaps others can come to the trading places in Kazan, Saratoff and Samara, and struggle back home with the trifle of food that the barter with hides and furs has brought them. Perhaps some may have the luck to procure something to eat in some strange way that I do not know of. I do not know. I cannot imagine in what manner, and from all I saw and heard such a supposition seems fantastic, but I do not want to paint with too sombre colors or exaggerate the inevitable mortality. Like those who put the question to me, "Is it true, this about the famine?" so I remain almost suspicious, refuse instinctively to believe that there is no hope of escape for millions of courageous, patient, nice people, whom I have learned to like during the short time I spent among them, as do all who have got to know them. One's head swims at the thought of such a distressing prospect.

There are even in Russia, in Moscow, for instance, where much food is brought, persons who doubt the existence of the famine. This amazes me, for at the frontier, along the railroads and at the stations there has been for months a perpetual stream, with many flowings to, of human wretchedness, fleeing from the famine-stricken districts.

THE FLIGHT FROM STARVATION

People do not leave their houses and villages for fear of imagined dangers. Peasant people with the family feeling deeply rooted in them, good-natured, as I found the fugitives to be, do not desert their offspring with an easy heart and without regret. In the homes for these deserted children I saw much unmeasurable suffering and could guess at the agony that underlay this desertion. The children in these establishments now get a little food, generally from English and American relief expeditions, but they are for the most part half-naked. Without bed clothes they are lying on the uncovered floor and their grey-white faces, sunken eyes, little withered bodies and precocious monkey-like appearance tell the story of the starvation from which they have escaped. They have at least a chance of escaping alive, although typhoid, dysentery and debility, with all their consequences, claim many victims in these places with their want of food, clothes, beds and medicine. In Petrograd I saw the camp of fugitives to which so many had struggled through the whole of Russia. "The end of the journey," I called it to myself, and before my memory appears a dreadful vision of long, bare rooms, damp, cellar-like dwellings, where whole families were lying on the floor, swarming with vermin, without other warmth than the one produced by their own bodies, although the thermometer pointed to twenty degrees under the freezing-point in Petrograd, without other food than the miserable rations which the government gave them and that could only keep the flame of life flickering in their bodies, marred by fever, till at last, in the weakest, it went out. I saw the harvest of death in two days in their mortuary, a room full of corpses, a rubbish-heap of dead. The end of the journey!

RELIEF ACTION IN TRAIN

The English and American Relief Action does what it can in order to save at least the children, although it cannot yet do more than superficially help this human misery. The members of the English "Save the Children" hope to be able to keep two hundred and fifty thousand children. When I left Russia they fed sixty thousand. The Americans, who have greater resources, have undertaken to feed two hundred thousand. The Quakers feed about forty thousand. But there are at least six millions of children who suffer from want of food in the hunger districts, and still more live very poorly, in other parts of Russia.

Fortunately, the management of the English and American Relief Associations have sent out as many depots as possible to the districts around, and the "Save the Children" people, who work in Saratoff under Nansen's co-operation, have had great success. The American Relief Committee has also established big depots as far East as Ufa, Orenburg, and Tsaritsin, and have sent supplies to many village centers. To the persons at home who fear that the food does not reach the starving children properly, and who suspect that the Soviet officials and the guardsmen will derive advantage of their charity—a conception which was generally spread when I left England—I can give the absolute assurance, founded on my own observation as well as on the statement of other participants in the relief work, that no such thing is to be feared. Now and then a few boxes of provisions may be stolen. It is impossible to prevent, as the unloading often takes place in the dark at railway stations or landing stages, and by men who are underfed and whose families are starving. But this is the exception, and the Soviet government must pay for all losses of this kind. At least, according to the contract the Americans have drawn up. They do not take any risks.

Persons who pity the Russian children, these victims of an unhealed catastrophe, who have not been guilty of bloodshed or cruelty or deeds subversive of society, but are innocent, as much as the other children in the world, who may sit down to a good meal, these persons need not fear that their gifts serve to fatten the leaders of the Soviet or add fuel to the cruelty of the Red guard. In reality these Red guardsmen look thin and pale, a lot of narrow-shouldered boys in the uniforms of grown-up men.

INTERNATIONAL EFFORTS ARE NEEDED

Although I am convinced that Russia can only be saved through a great international relief action, under the full guarantee of the Soviet as a return of the aid, I would sooner cut off my right hand than in any way try to prevent the energetic relief work, the appeal to the general charity, the zeal and the inexhaustible struggle to save the starving children, which I have witnessed here in Russia by expeditions from different countries.

Hundreds of thousands of children have been saved from certain death and that is a great gain, although others perish. I have been among them and seen their joy, and then one knows that the work is worth while.

(Continued from page 271)

ing. Yet we should always err, if err we must, on the side of generosity in judgment. It is only the very great saints who can be perfectly just, and those of us who are very far from being saints do well to err on the side of generosity. Yet how seldom people do that! Too often when people disagree with us we attribute bad motives. During the war if a man refused to fight it was almost universally assumed to be because he lacked physical courage; and if a man did fight it was assumed almost as readily by some persons that it was because he lacked moral courage. Might it not be more just—it would certainly be more generous—to assume that each of them did what he believed to be right? Often people who disagree with another point of view find in it something not only intellectually mistaken but morally base. I am reminded of an absurd account I heard some years ago when I was staying in Italy of the behavior of people during an eruption of Vesuvius. Some scientific men who went so near the stream of lava that they were scorched were commended for their courage, but of certain women it was said that most of them were too frightened to approach the lava stream but in a few of them curiosity overcame fear, and they also were burnt! Uncharitable judgments poison the springs of human love and affection, yet some of the most Christian people habitually make them. If we must err let it be on the side of mercy, and let us not forget that we are all equally human.

Then between friends is there not the same need for courtesy as between strangers? In the lovely freedom of intimacy, in that exquisite sense of ease which comes when one is in friendship or fellowship with people who understand and sympathize and share, we ought not—though sometimes people very easily do—to lose the grace of life, to treat one another with a certain roughness that amounts almost to discourtesy. It is hard sometimes, perhaps, to distinguish between these things, the happiness of being quite at ease, and that kind of ungraciousness which does destroy the beauty and grace of fellowship. It is difficult always to judge between these two, and yet we must judge; for there is nothing so beautiful as the grace of courtesy between those who are friends, those who work together in fellowship. Loyalty to a fellowship is very much like loyalty to a friend. Those who find difficulty in being loyal to a movement or a fellowship or any other organization should think of it very much as they would of a friend. Love is not blind; that is an illusion. No one sees with such far-seeing eyes as a lover; the very intensity of his love makes and should make him deeply sensitive to any defect in the one he loves. Those who love best are most profoundly sensitive when we fall beneath what they expect of us. The most acute pain that can be inflicted on a loving soul is that one who is loved should be ignoble even for a moment. Love is not blind; love sees with the swiftness of understanding; but it sees with a difference; it never forgets and becomes cruel; it always makes the best possible construction of the actions of the loved one. If a friend acts in a way that you absolutely can't understand, you will not, like an acquaintance or stranger, condemn; you will simply say, "I do not understand; I know it must be all right; it is simply that I have not understood." That is loyalty, is it not?—not to deny the facts when they are there, not to deny the truth, or to dress one's friends up in some fantastic guise, but to see them as they are, but at their best, and to believe even against their own signature that they are better than perhaps they seem. That is the essence of love and friendship; that is what makes one at home and at ease with people who love one. And I think that such loyalty can be shown even to an organization or a movement; to believe the best of it, to regret, to be indeed sensitive to its failures, but in the same spirit as one is sensitive to the failures of a friend; and all this to be based on understanding and on love and gentleness and grace, and above all the sense of one another's value.

So we come back, as always, to our Master, Christ, in whose dealings with men and women there is such an amazing, such an infinite sense of the value of every human soul, such an exquisite understanding of their human weakness and limitations. The quality in our Lord that perhaps strikes one more than any other is precisely this: His profound reverence for the individual soul and His understanding of its value. Perhaps the best love of all is the love created by a common hope, fellowship born of a common work and aspiration, but cared for, deepened, and developed by the ordinary courtesies and grace and beauty of everyday life.

After all, are we not all committed to a great adventure, all who are in any active movement or any particular fellowship? All of us are committed to the magnificent adventure of being a human being; we have all had the terrific adventure of being born, we have to pass through the joys and shadows of life, and we shall all embark on the further glorious adventure of passing out of this world into a greater, wider, and more glorious sphere. Is it not a romance to belong to humanity, with its far-off and small beginnings, and its glorious pattern in Christ, its amazing goal, now already in view? If we are bound by that tie of our common nature, can anyone be beneath our courtesy or outside the range of our friendship? Shall not the fall of any of us be the grief of all of us, and shall not the nobility of any one be to us all an uplifting and an inspiration?

Where'er a noble deed is wrought,
Where'er is spoken a noble thought,
Our hearts in glad surprise
To higher levels rise.

That surprise is an exquisite experience. How often have you given it to me, my people, especially during the last weeks. You are sending me with a good heart to another land. I go to a very generous and warm-hearted people. While Europeans sneer at America for her detached attitude to the sufferings of the Old World, while we scorn at her worship of the almighty dollar, America has poured out her millions upon suffering nations. It is because of American generosity, it is through American gifts, that nations have been saved from perishing, and this almighty dollar has been needed to save from utter destruction the people of Austria, to push a little further off the threat of famine in Poland and in Russia. When you hear America criticized for her remoteness from European troubles, do not forget—it is so easy and so cheap to forget—that where there have been no political questions involved America has been generous beyond the measure of ordinary nations. She has poured out her money, and we have returned her a torrent of good advice. The United States are a singularly patient people, and most patient in their tolerance of all those who have advised them for their soul's good. But it is easy always to give advice; it is not easy always to be wise. During the next three months, when I shall be speaking in many of the great cities of America, it will be my business to help those, and there are many in America who desire that their country should give a spiritual lead to the world. It is in the power of America to do that at this moment in a greater degree than any other country. She is in a unique position for realizing the spiritual unity of all humanity. I ask you to pray that God shall make possible by His grace that which by nature would seem impossible, that I may always speak both with wisdom and with courage. In going to that great and prosperous country in the spirit of fellowship to preach the Gospel of Fellowship, I go to do your work, and therefore I ask you to send me out with your blessings and your prayers.

I do not need to ask you to keep up the spirit of fellowship here. I only commend to you the truth that fellowship needs watering, as plants need human care, though its roots are based deep in a great aspiration and a great faith. God be with you till we meet again!

Prohibition and the League of Nations

By Rev. Charles Edward Jefferson, D.D.

Minister of the Broadway Tabernacle Congregational Church, New York

BRITONS are keenly alive to the fortunes of prohibition in the United States. Every reporter who asked me for an interview had prohibition at the top of his list of questions. The British papers give more attention to our Eighteenth Amendment than to any other feature of our American life. Many papers exploit daily the failure of prohibition. They could not do it more zealously if they were paid for it. Sad stories of the havoc which prohibition has wrought in the morals of the youth of America, especially the young women, are spread broadcast. The leading evening paper of London last June had a reporter in New York who made a practice of visiting the haunts of our fast set, sending home long accounts of what he saw and heard. The paper was considered decent, but it was engaged in an indecent piece of work. Similar stories of vulgarity and excess could be cabled every night from London, where prohibition is unknown. But how can humanity be helped by the recital of what the coarsest and lowest are doing? The British press is on the whole anti-prohibition. In the journalists of Britain the liquor hierarchy has its most devoted and influential defenders. British brewers and distillers are longing for the failure of prohibition in this country, and they diligently parade every word spoken against it in our American papers. They know that if prohibition succeeds here, the liquor traffic in Britain is doomed. An increasing number of Britons every year awaken to the fact that Britain is sorely handicapped in her struggle for a place in the sun by her love of drink. She is an industrial and commercial nation. She lives on her manufactures and commerce. If she falls behind in these, she is forever undone. To keep alive she must successfully compete with her most formidable rival—the United States. We have adopted the policy of prohibition. That policy we are not likely to change. We are going to stop the enormous waste in energy and efficiency which the liquor traffic annually entailed. We are going to roll off the stupendous burden which we have carried for over a hundred years. We cannot do it at once, but we are going to do it. Our workers, freed from the poison of an enemy which befuddles the brain and curtails the strength of the arm, will through the next generations work with augmented vigor and effectiveness. Britain, half drunk, will be no match for America sober. Britain must become sober. She must overthrow her liquor dynasty. The public house must be abolished. It will be done, but not now. The British take their time to accomplish great undertakings but in the end they conquer.

There is a rising sentiment in Britain against alcohol. I found it everywhere. The contrast between public opinion to-day and what it was twenty-five years ago amazed me. Total abstainers have multiplied. At all the dinners and banquets I was impressed by the numbers who did not drink wine. From thousands of homes liquor has been banished. Many organizations are energetically working to create a public sentiment which will in this generation overthrow the liquor Goliath. The foes of alcohol in high circles are numerous and outspoken. To move in the best society it is not necessary to drink. Even the health of the king can be drunk in water.

But anti-alcohol sentiment is not so far advanced in Britain as it is in our country. There are various reasons. The liquor traffic in the United States gradually drifted into the hands of foreigners. Many of them were reckless and unsavory. In Britain the liquor traffic is in the hands of Britons, and some of them are representatives of ancient and noble families. This fact has a vast influence on popular feeling. Moreover, the public house in Britain has never become quite what the American saloon became. It is low, but not so low as our saloon was. In many places our saloon had become the rendezvous of thugs and harlots, a center of political propaganda, a vicious force in civic administrations, and a scourge in community life. It had become not only a disgrace, but a peril. There was nothing to do but to abolish it.

The Church of England has never taken the aggressive and radical attitude to the drink evil which has been taken by thousands of our churches. The clergy of the Anglican Church have in large numbers always had ale and wine on their tables. The people as a rule do not move faster than their leaders. Liquor dealers have never fallen under the disapprobation of the English Church, and large gifts from them are freely and openly accepted.

Finally, there is an ingrained conservatism in the Briton which compels him to go slow in making changes. He clings tenaciously to customs which are old, even though they be a handicap and burden, and he is loth to overturn institutions even though they have been outgrown. All these constitute a bulwark of protection for the liquor traffic against which the forces of the new age will for a long time yet beat in vain. But the ultimate outcome is certain. Drink has been for centuries the besetting sin of the Anglo-Saxon race. The annual consumption of alcoholic drinks in Britain is appalling. It was Mr. Gladstone who once declared in the House of Commons that the ravages of drink equalled the combined ravages of famine, pestilence and war. During the great war Mr. Lloyd George stated in public that the most dangerous enemy of Britain was not Germany, but drink. I was told more than once that prohibition is sure to come in Scotland, and that it will come sooner there than in England. The Scots are aroused, and when they once get their eyes on a foe they fight with grim and deadly determination. Common sense will finally save both Scotland and England. A nation which has a debt of over forty billion dollars, and an annual budget of six billion dollars, and an annual interest account of two billion dollars, cannot afford to spend two billion dollars a year on alcoholic drink. The apologists for alcohol may fool all of the people some of the time, and some of the people all of the time, but they cannot fool all of the people all of the time. Some day Britain and America will walk side by side in the procession of nations emancipated from the ancient curse of drink.

While Britain lags behind us in prohibition sentiment, in her international thinking she is far ahead of us. She has the international mind, the international heart, and the international conscience in a high stage of development. We are yet in the juvenile period of growth. At the third meeting of the Assembly of the League of Nations, held in Geneva in the month of September, 1922, Britain was represented by Earl Balfour, Lord Robert Cecil and Professor Gilbert Murray, while the United States was not represented at all. Britain sent her best, we sent no one. A company of American tourists sat in the gallery looking on. A group of American newspaper reporters sat at the press tables reporting what the nations were doing. They could not tell the world of anything their own country was doing. Before the Assembly met for business it listened to a sermon preached by the Archbishop of Canterbury. Britain sent to Genoa her foremost ecclesiastical leader. Not long before her Prime Minister, Mr. Lloyd George, had declared in public that the hope of the world lies in the success of the League of Nations, and that if it fails civilization is doomed. I found the leading clergymen in the Anglican Church ardent supporters of the League, and the leaders of the Free Churches were not a whit behind them in loyalty and zeal. At a great demonstration for the League on Saturday afternoon in Hyde Park I heard representatives of all the churches voice their adherence to the League. Among the speakers were Lord Robert Cecil and the Archbishop of York. It was raining, but the rain did not dampen the earnestness of the speakers or the enthusiasm of the audience.

One of the unfading pictures of my life in Britain is the picture of the Archbishop of York extolling the League of Nations in a park to a crowd of Englishmen under umbrellas. Englishmen had said during the Great War, "This shall be the last war," and this accounts for their fiery zeal for the success of the League. Unless the nations of the world are leagued for peace another world war is inevitable. This conviction lies deep in the British heart. Wherever I went I found this flame of enthusiasm burning. All over England there are local unions of the League of Nations, organizations created for the purpose of educating the people in the purposes and possibilities of the League. When I went into the homes of prominent laymen I often found the whole family enlisted in the work of advancing the League. To a Briton the League of Nations is a solid and glorious reality.

I felt I was in a new world. I had come from a land where it was commonly reported that the League was dead. The rumor had never reached England. I had often read in our papers that the League was a failure. These papers had forgotten to announce that fifty-one nations were members of it. In my country the preachers were for the most part dumb, not daring to mention the League either in sermon or prayer lest they should lay themselves open to the charge of meddling in politics. It seemed strange to be among Christians who steadfastly believed that the League is an instrument in the hands of Heaven for securing the establishment of the Kingdom of God, and that it is a plan to which all Christians are by their profession of faith implicitly committed. I had lived in a land where many intelligent and noble men were entirely indifferent to the League, and where others equally noble and intelligent found it impossible to discuss the League with their friends without losing their temper. The stone which our American builders had rejected, I found British builders making the head of the corner. So contemptible and perilous had the League become in the eyes of my countrymen that many of them preferred to stay out of the League with Mexico and Turkey rather than enter the League with Great Britain and France. Internationally we are a belated people.

There are reasons why Britain should be ahead of us. She has been in school for a long time. Her far-flung frontiers have compelled her to think in world terms. She has been obliged to carry on her mind India and Canada, South Africa and Australia, Egypt and Ceylon, and this has given the Briton range of sympathy and wide horizon. Moreover, she is nearer to Europe than we are. When Europe catches fire, her own edifice is immediately in danger. This compels the thoughtful Briton to give to Europe continuous attention. Europe is always in his eye and ear. We Americans are geographically remote. We lie behind the barriers of two mighty oceans. Our neighbors to the north and south are small, and we have leisure to concentrate our mind on our own internal affairs. We are a world in ourselves. Our territory is vast, our resources are incalculable, our problems are many and urgent, our domestic difficulties vexing and baffling, and the average American has not yet come to feel that he is under obligations to concern himself seriously with the problems of people who live far away. He is always ready to send money contributions to any nation in distress, but beyond this his education has not carried him. His heart is sound, but his experience has given him no training in international thinking. He is a citizen of America, but not of the world.

It is the glory of Britain that in this great time she has given the full weight of her power and prestige to the only practical scheme thus far devised by the genius of man which offers possible deliverance from the tragedy of another world war. Without the support of Britain the scheme would inevitably have failed. The League of Nations is an experiment, difficult and fraught with peril. Only men of visions and heroic mettle can be expected to commit themselves to so hazardous and beautiful a hope. Britain in her statesmen and prophets has declared to all the world that she is willing to take the risk and to bear her full share of the burden.

---

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America during 1923 will give special attention to its Committee on Mercy and Relief because it believes that America can best exercise its influence for international good-will through works of serving love. The Committee is continuing its service to the Russian clergy, constantly sending food parcels for their relief. It is making every possible effort to impress the afflicted Russian people with the reality of our friendly feeling. The Federal Council will also continue its policy of commissioning Friendly Visitors to Europe this summer.

The Two Americas

By Rev. G. B. Winton, D.D.

Editor of the St. Louis "Christian Advocate"

[Dr. Winton spent twenty years of his life in Mexico as a missionary of the Southern Methodists and is perhaps the best posted man on Mexico in this country. When the Dabney Committee a few years ago studied the proposition for a union Christian university in Mexico, it was Dr. Winton who wrote the committee's report. He is a member of the Committee on Missionary Co-operation in Latin America.]

THERE are two Americas, not primarily as geographical units but as representing two cultures, two groups of racial heritages. Mexico in that sense is further from the United States than it is from Patagonia. In three hundred years the gap widened. Spain and Portugal had started their colonies on one continent; Great Britain hers on another. A hundred years ago, when the Latin colonies followed the Saxon into national independence, feeble efforts began to bridge the gulf that had been opened. They continue, but are feeble still, and their effects to date negligible. North America—north of the Rio Grande—and Hispanic America still go their separate ways.

Four years ago a new and strong impulse was given to the mutual approach. There was a revelation of idealism in the entrance of the United States upon the World War that burst upon Latin America like a sunrise. It was to those people something new in the "Yankee." Our money-grabbing commerce, our cold official imperialism in dealing with weaker neighbors had made them cynical. They did not believe that any good could come out of the land of Uncle Sam. Before, they had admired but feared and hated us. Now they almost loved us.

Our business people rushed into the breach which had been left when commerce from Europe stopped. Our bankers spread their organizations over South American cities. Our exports and imports took a sudden bound. We were at last going to be really united—the two Americas—into one great and imposing continent of free republics. The capital of North America hurried southward to explore and exploit the hidden riches of oil, of minerals, of orchard and farm. But since, the wheel of commerce has become clogged. The ineffective economic organization of the twenty struggling Latin republics proved unequal to the pressure which a wrecked world has everywhere exerted. European exports crept back again, aided by a depressed currency and starvation wages. The big returns which North American business had counted sure did not materialize. With its usual impulsiveness business quit, the bankers closed their branches, the magazines closed publication, the new steamship lines ran empty steamers back and forth. North America is once more about to forget South America. The chasm has proved wide and deep.

But there is one group of citizens in our country that still work stoutly for a united Western continent. They are the Christian missionary boards. They have an agency in which they have joined forces, the Committee on Co-operation in Latin America. It is a bureau of information, a clearing house of missionary endeavor, a reservoir of international good-will. The Committee has just held in New York its annual meeting. Its secretary is the best informed man living on relations between the two Americas. With intelligent and sympathetic understanding of both he labors at the task of bringing them together. It is plain to him, as it is coming to be to those of us who make up the Committee—which has more than fifty members representing thirty mission boards in the United States and Canada—that upon this Committee and the agencies which speak and work through it, has fallen the burden of interpreting to Spanish-America, Catholic in religion and Latin in culture, the ideals and idealism of Protestant North America. It is no small undertaking, but who else is laboring at it? Our commerce is frankly selfish. Our Government adheres to the tradition that one nation in dealing with another is to think only of self, to act only in self-interest. If the impact of our nation upon our sister nation is to be left to these two channels, then we may be sure that those nations will continue to misunderstand and to dislike our own.

It may strike some as a new development of missionary endeavor to assume responsibility for interpreting our national life to another. Perhaps it is. But it has become inevitable. So free and so universal are the channels of international communication to-day that every part of the world is becoming acutely conscious of every other part. A missionary is no longer an isolated individual with a religious message. He cannot, and should not, divest himself of his nationality. He goes now to people who are full not so much of doubt as of questioning. What has this doctrine done for your own people? he is asked. What kind of a people are they, what kind of a nation? If he is preceded by judgments that are unfavorable, by interpretations that put his nation in a bad light, his evangelizing will be to no purpose. The nations of the world have adopted with sudden vehemence the dictum of Jesus. By their fruits ye shall know them. We are in no position to enter protest. Our own Lord said it.

The Christian missionary organizations know the idealism that marks America—our part of America. They are the creature of that idealism. In asserting it they are very bold, though often in Latin America they encounter a stiff-necked and gain-saying audience. For the past three years the Committee has been issuing in Spanish a magazine. This is becoming the moral voice of North America to South America. And it is meeting with acceptance as a vehicle by which our friends of another speech may speak to us their mind. Its editors are in touch, as no other men in the United States, with the sentiments that are stirring the thought of our neighbors to the South.

This is illustrated in the discussion now going forward in regard to the fifth Pan-American Conference. These international conferences, begun more than twenty years ago under the auspices of our own Government, were held at regular intervals up to the period of the World War. The fifth, now to meet at Santiago, Chile, in March, has been postponed from year to year, and is already long overdue. These conferences have hitherto been play conferences—much gold braid and parading, many meaningless speeches by polite diplomats, much ceremonious feasting—only that and nothing more. A few conventions as to business matters, the handling of mail, the facilitating of commerce and exchange, and so on, have been concluded. But anything like burning questions, the things, for example, that we do from time to time which vex and try the souls of these other American nations—all disagreeable matters, in other words, have been taboo. Now it transpires that our southern neighbors, having been received into full fellowship in the League of Nations, and having developed a considerable sense of self-determination, feel strongly that there are some shady matters that ought be dragged out into the light. Why did we occupy Haiti? Did we really force an unwelcome "treaty" on her? What are our Marines doing in Nicaragua? Why do we not recognize a stable government in Mexico? Why did we interfere with the Central American Union Movement? and so on, and so on. These are burning questions south of the Rio Grande. Does anyone in this country, Government or people, know or care anything about them? I doubt if most of my readers will have so much as heard of the coming conference. Yet it might be made a momentous occasion for the welding together of the Americas.

The Committee's annual report is full of good quotable matter. As illustrating some of the things I have been talking about here are the opening lines of the West Indies section:

From the viewpoint of the rights and duties of small nations the Caribbean District is the most important part of the world for the United States. Lack of order and progress in these countries, so very near to the United States, has led the latter country to extend more and more its influence among them. While economic, strategic and sanitary reasons are easily found for this extension, yet the very fact that their government has assumed financial or military control over most of these countries makes the Christian forces of the United States especially responsible for their spiritual life and for seeing that these small and weak countries are treated justly by their great neighbor.

The past year of the Committee's work has been marked by the rapid and successful extension of the book sales department. After working diligently for several years in the production of books in Spanish and Portuguese, the Committee found itself somewhat reluctantly forced to go into the business of the distribution of literature. A central depository was established in New York, and local centers are being developed in Havana, Mexico City, Buenos Aires and other distributing points.

Steps were taken looking to the holding in 1924 of a great missionary conference for South America; similar to that which met in Panama in 1916. It will meet in Montevideo and will be for Continental South America alone, excluding the West Indies and countries north of the Panama Canal, for which a similar meeting at a later date is planned. A sub-committee gave a half day to the study of co-operative effort in Mexico, where a union press, a union paper and a union seminary are already in operation. Preparation for a college and a hospital were carefully gone over. The evangelical work in Mexico is progressing as never before in its history. This is the fiftieth anniversary of several of the missions there, including that of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

The numerous board representatives present in the meeting, after hearing full reports of the Co-operation Committee's work and scrutinizing the plans for the future, gave a unanimous vote in favor of continuing it and its work with the same budget and personnel as last year. Mr. Inman, the executive secretary, will visit South America soon, attending the International Conference in Santiago as an "unofficial observer," and laying plans for the Missionary Conference of next year. Thence he will pass to Spain, where the Committee has important interests, and Great Britain, where he will represent the Committee at the meeting of the International Missionary Council and give such aid as may be needed in the formation of a European section of the Committee on Co-operation in Latin America. A number of European boards, British, especially, have important work in that section of the world.

Making Church Advertising Pay

BY REV. CLINTON WUNDER.

Minister of the Baptist Temple, Rochester, New York

CHURCHES are to-day advertising in great numbers, as are Y. M. C. A.'s and other religious organizations, but much of this advertising is ineffective. For example, on a recent Sunday night a count was made of the attendance in several large churches in a city of this State. All of these churches advertised to about the same extent, but with what result? The churches studied were of about the same membership, but the attendance record shows in one church seventy-seven, in another sixty, in another two hundred, in another three hundred, in another 350, then 450, and finally one thousand. All advertising, how do we account for the difference in attendance?

It is with direct advertising that we are especially concerned. For this we can largely control, whereas indirect advertising is usually beyond our control. I have found by checking my own experience with others that the following forms of direct advertising are of value in about the order stated. I would put first the space secured in the newspapers, particularly when it appears among the local news items. Next to this I would put newspaper display paid advertising, both of the individual church and of a co-operative nature. Third, street car advertising, interior and exterior. I have found that the cost of this is usually prohibitive. Next, bulletin boards of the large and commanding type, easily read at a distance. Electric signs I would include under this head.

Direct mail campaigns by postcards, letters and specially printed matter, booster cards given to individual members of the congregation to distribute to friends and strangers boosting your services, window posters, bulletin boards of universities, schools, Y. M. C. A.'s, hotels, parking stations, gas stations, nearby corners, and so on.

We need to have our attention called to the value of internal church publicity. The monthly church paper, if properly managed, is a tremendous asset for direct advertising propaganda to your stockholders, and the weekly calendar should be converted from a stilted, stale, never-changing piece of type to a weekly newspaper. I would mention the unique value of co-operative advertising splendidly demonstrated by Baltimore. By this plan a half-page of the paper is devoted to a paid advertisement containing active propaganda, usually in the field of the social gospel. To my mind, a good deal of co-operative advertising by churches has been wasted money and effort. Such trite slogans as "go to church" have about as much effect on the non-churchgoer as the mere repeated appeal of the half-fearful lover who says over and over again "marry me."

Foreign Correspondence

The Meeting of the Women's International League for Peace

SOMETHING less than eight years ago, in the spring of 1915, while such slogans as "Durchhalten," "Jusqu' a bout," and "Fight to the finish," were filling the air of a war-torn continent, the women of the world, uniting under the leadership of our Jane Addams, dared put forth a new slogan, "Peace by negotiation." The meeting was held at The Hague, where humorous postcards showing the Peace Palace hidden behind a maze of cobwebs were sold on every bookstand.

In 1919, while the statesmen of the world were in session at Versailles to write the first of a series of iniquitous treaties, the International Women's League for Peace and Freedom again met, this time at Zurich. And, examining the product of the Versailles conclave, they were the first to speak out boldly and to say that the Treaty of Versailles was not just, and that in the end it would prove a boomerang.

From December 6-10, 1922, the Women's International League rallied its members for still another most important gathering. Europe is rapidly steering for the abyss. The world is sick as never before. Help must come speedily if it is to come at all.

So the League called an emergency conference for a new peace at the self-same Hague, and again the women spoke out boldly, not for a revision of something they believed to be inherently bad, but for a new peace. Nothing less than that. A new peace will be their slogan henceforth; for a new peace they will work by every means within their command. As they put it in the general resolution that summed up the discussions the four days, "This conference demands a new peace based on new international agreements, and its members resolve to work unremittingly by every means in their power to bring about the convening of a world congress through the instrumentality of the League of Nations, of a single nation, or of a group of nations in order to achieve a new peace."

So important did this issue seem to them that the conference was not limited to members of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, nor to the female sex. All societies in general sympathy with the demand for a new peace were welcome to send delegates.

The response was most gratifying. Twenty national sections of the League sent delegates. They came from Bulgaria and from the Ukraine, from Hungary and from Poland, from Czechoslovakia and from far-away New Zealand, not to speak of the western European countries and the United States. They came amid difficulties that forcibly reminded one of the congress of 1915. Then it was easy to understand why there should be passport difficulties and hardships at the frontiers. Now, however, the difficulties encountered by some of the pacifist women, especially from eastern Europe, were a sad commentary in themselves upon the "peace" which the statesmen of Versailles were able to establish.

Other societies responded equally well. Not less than one hundred and ten other bodies were represented. I mention but a very few of them: Movement Pacifique Chretien, Pax, of France; Society of Friends, Great Britain and America; Deutscher Pazifistischer Studentenbund, Germany; International Federation of League of Nations Unions, Belgium; International Roman Catholic League, Hungary; Fight-the-Famine Council, England; Christian International, Great Britain; Women of Manitoba Labor Churches, Canada; La Ligue des Femmes contre la Guerre, France; Bureau International de Sociologue, Italy; Women's Christian Temperance Union, Sweden; Fellowship School, Switzerland.

It was conservatively estimated that the total number of human beings directly represented through accredited delegates at this gathering numbered twenty millions.

For three and a half days, in morning, noon and night sessions, the peace treaties were searchingly examined into and an attempt made successively to trace their general, political, economic, military and psychical effects. So unflinching was the criticism, so numerous the iniquitous provisions exposed, that one lone male of the species, a distinguished Belgian professor, was moved plaintively to remark that, after all, there were some things worth preserving in the present treaties—such as the League of Nations Covenant and the provisions for an international labor office—and that there were some good diplomats among the bad. If, he argued, the existing treaties were indiscriminately condemned, then the good diplomats in question would be discouraged at the very start from drafting new treaties. To which, amid the enthusiastic applause of the overwhelming part of the assembly, the ever youthful though white-haired and venerable Professor Paul Otlet of Belgium, general secretary of the Union of International Associations, replied that it was not the intention of the women nor of any forward-looking men that the old crowd of diplomats which had brought the world into this mess should have anything to do with drafting the new treaties.

The fear of the Belgian fraternal delegates lest the women might not want to retain the League of Nations was entirely unfounded, it should be noted in passing. Indeed, if there is any one thing about which the congress was concerned it was that a real League of Nations should evolve from the proposed new peace conference. Precisely because the delegates felt that the present League is encumbered by the fact that the League Covenant forms part of the larger treaties, did they want to see this instrument of progress freed and made independent. As Jane Addams put it in her opening remarks, "The League of Nations is hampered by the fact that it is born of war-time hysteria. Many of the provisions of the peace treaties with which the League of Nations Covenant is bound up are like so many millstones around its neck."

This point was further developed with great clarity during the first day of the conference by a brilliant referat on the political effects of the peace treaties by Mrs. H. M. Swanwick, of London, well-known journalist of the "Manchester Guardian" and founder of "International House."

"The most surpassing injury done by the treaties," she argued, "is the injury that has been done to the noble conception of a society of peoples." The present League, she said, is not universal, for it divides the world into victors, vanquished and neutrals, this fact in turn resulting in the ruin of credit and of currency; in the taking of unjust decisions epitomized by Eupen, Malmedy and Silesia, and in the fostering of hatreds through the armies of occupation. The League is undemocratic, she contended, because the countries adhering to it are for the most part undemocratic. It is ineffective because Article X, providing for the territorial integrity of nations, is being and has been violated; because the mandate system is not being applied as though a mandate were a sacred trust, but rather as though it were part of the spoils of war, and because the settlement of disputes is made impossible, since the treaties provide for such instrumentalities as the Supreme Council, the Reparations Commission, the Council of Ambassadors—all of which tend to take authority and power from the League.

On the question of the effects of the peace treaties upon the peoples in the occupied areas, the Women's International League had appointed a special commission consisting of Miss Marie Fox of the English Friends' Relief Committee and Fru Ellen Wegner of the Swedish Relief for Germany, to go through the occupied area and to gather facts and figures. Their report constituted a moving document of human suffering and of the total loosening of morals under the influence of militarism.

Forty-five per cent. of the German children in the Palatinate, occupied by French troops, are tubercular, according to their findings. This appalling condition has largely been made possible by the fact that housing conditions for the Germans are abominable because so much room is demanded by the army of occupation, and because the milk, fats and other necessities go to the armies of occupation.

Hand in hand with this suppression of the native population goes the wholesale introduction of brothels and the waste of much needed building materials on barracks for the occupying troops. The committee produced figures to show that the commanders of these troops insist that in towns of only two or three thousand population one or two brothels must be erected. Venereal disease is consequently spreading in an alarming manner. In the area occupied by the French alone it has increased three hundred per cent., they charged, since 1917.

One of the most regrettable things to be noticed in the occupied area now, according to the committee, is the growing spirit of revenge, which was entirely absent immediately after the ending of the war.

It was significant of the spirit of the congress that the initiative for demanding facts such as these came from the women in the so-called victor countries. (Incidentally, it was the British and French delegations, too, which moved the resolution for a new peace.) It was they who were desirous of first-hand information. It was they who declared that they were kept in ignorance of the facts by their governments and their press. The German and Austrian women spoke of their sufferings only when directly called upon to give testimony, and then only with hesitation. They were anxious rather to say what their people were ready to do for the creation of a better world.

It would be impossible within the compass of a single article to give even the gist of the many interesting addresses given—by Jane Addams, by Prelate Giesswein of Budapest, by the Dean of Worcester, by Lord Parmoor, Professor Charles Zueblin of Boston, Sir Worthington Evans, Dr. Marie Lueders, member of the German Reichstag, and others.

One address, however, deserves special reference—that by Sir George Paish, financial adviser to the British government. His gloomy picture of the world bankruptcy impending unless something immediate be done impressed itself indelibly upon all who listened to him. This impending chaos, he pointed out, is the result of the fundamentally wrong economics underlying the peace treaties.

By way of remedy he suggested that an international loan of two thousand millions sterling be floated, to be used for the sole purpose of restoring Europe economically. This, he contended, was sufficient to set up the world economically within five years, if made available in five installments of four thousand millions per annum. Such a loan could only be floated, however, he said, if the financiers of the world were persuaded that no new war was impending, and if some nation with potential credit were to underwrite the interest (four per cent. interest plus one per cent. for sinking fund).

That nation, in Sir George's opinion, is Germany. "Give Germany a chance, and within a few years she will again be a wealthy nation," he pleaded. Germany, in his opinion, should be approached with the proposal that instead of the present reparations payments she pledge herself to raise one hundred millions sterling per year as interest on the loan.

As a result, then, of the many discussions a resolution was enthusiastically adopted amid a demonstration lasting several minutes, the conclusion of which—the demand for a new peace—I have already quoted. Suffice it here to insert the specific charges against the existing treaties in the words of the resolution:

"The present terrible state of Europe and its reactions on the rest of the world are the result not only of the World War, but also in a large measure of the existing peace treaties.

"These treaties are contrary to the armistice terms (e.g., President Wilson's Fourteen Points). They are inconsistent with the spirit of the League of Nations as expressed in the Preamble of the Covenant, and do in fact 'endanger the peace of the world' (Article 19 of the Covenant). They have proven disastrous alike from the political, economic, military and psychical aspects. They have (a) prevented economic reconstruction on a basis of international co-operation and the satisfaction of international interests by treating this matter as one to be settled by those nations alone which achieved military predominance in the World War; (b) recognized and created animosities and suspicions which make disarmament by land, sea and air increasingly difficult and the abolition of chemical and bacteriological warfare practically impossible; (c) retarded the establishment of a League of Nations universal, democratic and fully effective."

The Women's International League for Peace and Freedom proposes to go at it energetically to translate its slogan of a New Peace into actuality. The women will therefore organize mass demonstrations in co-operation with other bodies with similar aims, especially with the trade unions (to whose international peace congress, opening December 10, they sent a message of co-operation besides appointing twelve delegates) and the organizations of ex-soldiers. They will initiate a press campaign for a new peace. They will try to make the question of a new peace a burning issue in political discussions and elections, and will send deputations to governments, parliaments and political parties to win them for their ideas.

A solemn warning was issued to the Allied statesmen against sanctioning the military occupation of the Ruhr. The Allied premiers meeting in London December 9 were memorialized to find a sane solution of the reparations problem. Disarmament was enthusiastically endorsed. The withdrawal of the armies of occupation was demanded by various speakers, and the British, French, Belgian and American sections formed a special sub-organization for the purpose of jointly bringing pressure to bear upon their governments to achieve this withdrawal as speedily as possible.

LOUIS P. LOCHNER.

International Sunday-School Lesson

March 11, 1923

Jesus in Gethsemane

LUKE 22:39-48, 54.

"For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit."—1 Peter 3:18.

IN an ideal world no one would suffer because of well-doing, and of course no one would suffer for evil-doing. Suffering would be entirely eliminated because each would be as much concerned for the welfare of others as for his own welfare. No one would interfere with the happiness of another, or lessen his own happiness by doing that which was wrong. But in a world like this, which is not yet ideal, but only headed in that direction, all this would be changed, and no one would realize it more keenly than one whose character fitted him for membership in an ideal world. This was the experience of Jesus. He suffered for well-doing, and it was the will of God that he should—not because God wanted Him or any one else to suffer for well-doing, but because there was no help for it. A good man could not live in a world which was only partially good, and escape suffering. Jesus had to endure the contradiction of sinners, that is, He had to pay the price of His own virtue because He lived among those who did not prize virtue as He did. Yet, as Peter tells us, it was better that He being innocent should suffer for well-doing than to suffer, as others who were guilty, for evil-doing. Jesus suffered through no fault of His own, but precisely as God suffers when he contemplates the failure of His children to do that which is right. And God will never be free from suffering until men cease to inflict suffering upon themselves and others by the choice of evil instead of good.

The mistake which we have made when thinking about this matter was to suppose that in some mysterious way the sufferings of Jesus, because He was good, enabled God to be gracious to His wilful and wayward children, towards whom He could not otherwise exercise forgiving grace. But that idea made God defective, because dependent upon Jesus in reference to forgiveness, God's hands being tied unless and until Jesus was willing to suffer. But God had exercised forgiving grace before the advent of Jesus through all the ages of the past. "He made known his ways unto Moses, His acts unto the children of Israel. The Lord is merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy." The truth is, is it not, that Jesus, living in a world which was not yet ideal, suffered just as God always has and always will until men cease to do evil and learn to do well?

The Lord our God, then, is a suffering God, and suffers because men are not what they should be, and He will continue to suffer until they become what they ought to be. Suffering is the price which God pays for giving us the opportunity of becoming like Himself. In bestowing upon us the power of choice, without which we never could attain the great end in view, he made it possible for every one of us to go wrong—as we all have.

Sin was incidental to the achievement of character, and forgiveness was essential to that end. The exercise of forgiveness was guaranteed by the nature of God. God was "waiting to be gracious" from the first. Otherwise men would have had no chance. The returning prodigal would have found no welcome—no father, but a stern and pitiless judge.

Coming into such a world as Jesus found here, and coming for its uplift and betterment, it was inevitable that he should suffer for well-doing, as God had suffered before Him.

The climax came in Gethsemane and Calvary, and by no means could he escape that climax if He remained true to his principles. Yet He never thought of turning away from them. He steadfastly set His face towards Jerusalem, though He knew that that meant collision with the authorities, and His own death. But He saw that He could accomplish more by dying than by living and uttered those prophetic words, "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto myself." Nevertheless it was a terrible ordeal, and our hearts are filled with anguish as we follow Him into the garden of Gethsemane, and onward to the cross. But let us not confuse the issue. He suffered for well-doing, not for evil-doing; not for His own sins, but for the sins of those who refused to accept His leadership and adopt His principles. There was no alternative. If He were to be the spiritual leader of mankind and make an appeal to all sorts and conditions of men throughout all time He must be faithful even unto death. The sufferings of Gethsemane prepared Him for Calvary, and through it all He suffered alone so far as human sympathy was concerned. For His own disciples were as yet too immature to understand why such a one as He should be obliged to suffer. They slept during His agony in the Garden. Still less did His enemies understand. So He prayed, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." The same spirit of forgiveness which was in God here appears in Jesus—so perfectly did Jesus understand God.

Luke gives us a condensed account of what appears in the other Gospels, yet with new and striking details, such as the distance to which Jesus withdrew, the angelic assistance, and the physical results of the suffering in the bloody sweat. He had come out from the upper chamber where he had eaten the Passover with His disciples, and as His custom was, went unto the Mount of Olives, where Judas easily found Him, because He resorted there each night for prayer. And the disciples also followed Him, "walking under the full Paschal moon/amid the deep hush that falls over an Oriental city at

(Continued on page 283)

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

A Great Schoolmaster*

THERE could hardly be a more encouraging book to put into the hands of young men than this. Here is the story of a man who by his almost unaided efforts worked his way off a New England farm, through the academy and through Yale College. He was expecting to enter the ministry, but being desirous of repaying immediately some of the money he had borrowed for his education, he took up teaching. He immediately became so successful as a teacher and administrator that he was never able to leave the educational field until, in the later years of his life, he became identified with great international movements.

The story of his career as an educator is very fascinating. He made so much of the educator's opportunity. He was almost immediately called to be superintendent of schools in various cities because he was so progressive and so full of plans for making the schools real homes of light, centers which both pupils and teachers would love. For many years he served as Superintendent of Schools in New Haven, Conn.; then in Brookline, Mass. When Columbia University opened Teachers' College, with its great attached school, the now famous Horace Mann School, they picked him out as the best man in the country to develop the new work. He was called to become superintendent of the new venture and at the same time was called to be Professor of School Administration and was made a member of the philosophical faculty of the University. He enjoyed teaching so much that he never let his varied administrative tasks interfere with his meeting various classes from week to week. For many years he conducted the chapel exercises of the Horace Mann School simply because he loved to face the fifteen hundred boys and girls every morning and talk with them. Many were the wise words of counsel he uttered from year to year. He had a delicious sense of humor which immediately placed him en rapport with the pupils.

During all these years he was teaching a much vaster audience than Columbia afforded. Summer schools all over the country wanted him. He was always being invited to lecture before universities and teachers' institutes on the theory of education. He was continually writing articles for the various educational journals and the influential monthlies and quarterlies. The bibliography in the back of the book shows that these various articles were read all over the country. During this period he also published several books, some of them dealing with the more technical aspects of education, others with the larger aspect, showing its relation not only to schools, but to the people in general. One book, "Social Phases of Education in the School and in the Home," published by the Macmillan Company, had a very wide reading and attracted much attention. Dr. Dutton also edited and published many text books for schools. The one thing he hated in educational methods was artificiality and formality. In the classroom he was on the friendliest footing with the pupils and was more like a parent than an instructor. In one of the chapters in "Social Phases of Education . . ." he deals with the educational aspect of the Church. His remark that it might be a good thing sometimes if the pastor would come down out of the pulpit and walk among the congregation, talking to them as he strolled around among them, is an index to the feeling that was always in his heart.

SAMUEL TRAIN DUTTON

He was always endeavoring to perfect himself in his subject and when a new educational experiment was being tried anywhere in the world he would hurry to study it and would be among the first to master it. For instance, when the Sloyd System was introduced into Sweden he was almost the first American to go over and investigate the whole sub-

(Continued on page 283)

*Samuel Train Dutton: A Biography. By Charles Herbert Levermore. The Macmillan Company, New York. $2.50.

A GREAT SCHOOLMASTER

(Continued from page 282.)

ject. He was always trying to relate education to character and to life. He believed in education for vocation, but his life interest was education for character and culture. It is not exaggerating to say that during the course of his long career he revolutionized educational methods in America. One thing he was always endeavoring to do was to link the parents to the school. He was continually inviting them to come with their children and was always holding functions of one sort or another that would make them feel that the school was theirs as well as their children's. He believed in bright, sunny, well ventilated buildings, and some of the schools which he designed and helped to build are still models of their kind. He was always in demand as counselor when new schools were being founded. Many of the best private schools in the country to-day were organized largely along the lines of his views.

After he came to New York he began to get in touch with larger interests than those even of school and college. He was among the first to believe that war did not belong to a civilization that made any pretense of being Christian, and he was one of the first men in New York City to throw all of his influence into the new peace movement. His enthusiasm was fanned greatly by his annual pilgrimages to the Lake Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration. He was one of the founders of the New York Peace Society. He afterwards became secretary of the World Court League and the League of Nations Union. He was a trustee of the World's Peace Foundation of Boston (the Ginn endowment), and was one of those who was most instrumental in advising Mr. Carnegie when he established his great $10,000,000 peace endowment. He was the prime mover of the great national peace congress which was held in New York City in 1898 and which brought hundreds of delegates from all over the United States. Hardly anyone in America has had more to do with fostering the movement which has eventuated in the League of Nations and the world court than he. He became so interested in this great movement that he journeyed to different countries of Europe to attend the annual international congresses and came home to lecture from town to town, spreading the new gospel of world organization which would take the place of war in the settlement of international disputes. When Niels Paulsen endowed the American-Scandinavian Foundation, Dr. Dutton was made one of its trustees, and he was the second man to be sent to the Scandinavian countries as exchange lecturer from the United States.

His international activities brought him into touch with many peoples and with the great world needs. When Miss Patrick founded her famous school for girls just outside of Constantinople he became one of its chief supporters and for years devoted himself not only to securing the best teachers for it, but to raising its annual budget. So interested was he in this school that he journeyed to Constantinople to visit it and to lecture to its pupils. When the Armenian massacres broke out it was his interest in the Armenians he had met, the Armenian girls he had seen at Scutari, that led him to organize, with one or two other men, the Near East Relief Society. Many millions of dollars were secured through his efforts and those who have taken up his work. He was one of the Americans who gave much time and thought to the success of the Canton Christian College. His interest and his influence reached like diverging lines to the uttermost parts of the earth.

When these great international interests began to absorb so much of his time and attention he retired from his educational work at Columbia University and devoted all of his energies to these larger things, but he was glad of the opportunity which came to him to join the editorial staff of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, and for several years its columns carried both signed and unsigned contributions from his pen.

The testimonials which are added at the end of the book are a striking revelation of how wide his interests were because the tributes come from all sorts and conditions of men. We note here such names as Professor John Bates Clark, Hamilton Holt, Professor W. H. Schofield, President Hadley of Yale, George Foster Peabody, Dr. Charles H. Levermore of the New York Peace Society, George A. Plimpton of the World Peace Foundation—the list is long.

Again we cannot help remarking as we close this review what a fascinating story it is of what an American boy can make of himself. The story is told with real charm by Dr. Levermore, a friend of many years and an associate in many endeavors.

X.

JESUS IN GETHSEMANE

(Continued from page 281.)

night." And when he was at the place—Gethsemane—he said unto them, "Pray that ye enter not into temptation," for he realized what was before them, and wanted them to prepare for it by prayer, which was the best possible preparation. It was not that by prayer they could avoid it, but that by prayer they could rightly meet it when it came. And separating himself from them by a stone's cast, he also prayed, and was heard by them to say before they fell asleep, "Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me: nevertheless not my will, but thine, be done."

If such a one as he needed to pray we certainly do, and we need to pray, as he did, in complete trust in the divine goodness, and absolute reliance upon the divine wisdom. For prayer is not a method of escape from some fearful but necessary ordeal, but the means by which we may so face it as to emerge from our Gethsemane, as Jesus did from his, with that wonderful calmness and composure which he maintained till the end. That is the amazing thing about the experience of Jesus from the moment of his arrest until he drew his last breath on the cross. He moved steadily forward, meeting each event as it came, in the most ideal way, enduring the shameful treatment to which he was subjected with quiet dignity and perfect poise because his soul was stayed on God, and he had anticipated what he was called upon to suffer. Gethsemane prepared him for Calvary, just as the temptation in the wilderness prepared him for his public ministry. For there in the wilderness in communion with God he shaped the plans and adopted the program which he followed later on, refusing in advance to compromise with evil or to make use of unworthy means to accomplish noble ends. He doubtless hoped to win the nation to his leadership, but failing of that he would bear his testimony to the truth, make his appeal to mankind, as he did both by word and deed throughout his life, but especially by a spectacular appeal on Palm Sunday, and then await the result. It was necessary that he should suffer, but the necessity lay in the attitude of men, in their refusal to accept his leadership and be governed, as he was, by the righteous will of God. As he could not adopt their program, and lead them against their enemies, the Romans, and as they would not adopt his program of spiritual leadership of all mankind, they put him to death, thereby turning away from the greatest opportunity which ever came to any nation. It was impossible that a small nation like Israel should conquer the world, succeeding where Egypt, Assyria, Chaldaea, Persia, Greece and Rome had failed. But it was not impossible, nay, it was inevitable, that under the spiritual leadership of Jesus, had they accepted him, the Jewish people would have achieved a higher distinction than has ever been won by any other race. They would have put the whole world in their debt, and nations would have come bending to Jerusalem, as Isaiah predicted, not for political but for religious guidance. This was the great tragedy of history, that Jesus Christ came unto his own and his own received him not. Yet the manner in which he bore himself, through life and in death, under trial and disappointment, gave him the place which he holds in the hearts of men to-day, and the greater place which will be his, when every knee has bowed and every tongue confessed him Lord to the glory of God the Father. His future glory is sure. And we earnestly hope that it was so real to his faith as to give him the strength and courage which he needed while here on earth. For certainly he was sorely tried, not only by the hostility of his enemies, but by the dullness and defection of his friends. "Could ye not watch with me one hour?" "Rise and pray, that ye enter not into temptation." This was not so much a rebuke as a kindly caution given by one who knew what was before them, and the best way to meet it. But the shock was too great for them. Judas betrayed him, and they all forsook him and fled. Peter crept back under the cover of the darkness and drew upon himself, through timidity, the fate which he doubtless would have escaped had he gone boldly forward and stood by the Master who had previously so signally honored him. Jesus would do nothing in his own defense. He would not speak the few words which might have helped the wavering Pilate to defend a prisoner in whom he found no fault at all. Still less would he use force to save his life or conquer the opposition of his enemies. Here again he was in harmony with God, who constrains no one to do his will but waits for time and experience to produce the desired results. But if Jesus would do nothing in his own defense, he was not destitute of resources in behalf of others. If he could restore the ear of the servant of the high priest, and promise paradise that day to a penitent thief, he could have protected Peter had he been brave enough to deserve protection. But Peter's repeated denials that he ever knew him made it impossible for Jesus to render him any assistance.

It is a sad and distressing story of unmerited suffering unselfishly borne, not to vindicate God's justice and turn away his wrath, because God suffered just as Jesus did and for the same reasons, for light had come into the world instead of darkness, yet men loved darkness rather than light because their deeds were evil. Ideally there ought to be no suffering for well-doing. But practically there is no escape from suffering for those who are wise enough

Don't Deny Yourself a New Religious Book

THE WORLD'S GREAT RELIGIOUS POETRY

Compiled by CAROLINE MILES HILL, Ph.D. Cloth 12 mo. 876 pages. $5.00.

"What more elevating and broadening exercise could a writer or speaker on spiritual themes desire than the habitual study of such a book? It will be of the very greatest spiritual service to people of all religions and of no religion. It meets a well-nigh universal need."—New York Christian Advocate.

"I congratulate you on its publication. It is an admirable work."—William Lyon Phelps (Yale).

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGION

By ROBERT H. THOULESS (Manchester)

The God revealed by religious experience shown to be identical with the God required by the moral consciousness and the God required to explain the world and the God revealed in historical Christianity. $2.50

CHRISTIAN WAYS OF SALVATION

By GEORGE W. RICHARDS (Lancaster Seminary)

Eight historical "ways" that Christian salvation has been successfully presented and in addition a tremendously helpful exposition of the present creed of the united Free Church of Scotland. $2.00

RELIGIOUS FOUNDATIONS

Edited by RUFUS M. JONES

How shall we think of God; of Man; of Christ; of Nature; of Human Relationships; of the Bible; of the Kingdom of God; of Evil; of Progress; of the Life Beyond?

Authors: Francis G. Peabody, Willard L. Sperry, Eugene Lyman, Rufus M. Jones, Elihu Grant, L. P. Jacks (Hibbert), Seeborn Rowntree, Clutton-Brock. $1.00

OLD TESTAMENT LIFE AND LITERATURE

By I. G. MATTHEWS (Crozer)

Follows a good method; holds a modern point of view without becoming radical. $2.00

HE OPENED TO US THE SCRIPTURES

By B. W. BACON (Yale)

Jesus' better way of using Scripture explained and recommended to our own practice. $1.00

THE RETURN OF CHRISTENDOM

Introduction by BISHOP GORE

Advocates a return to the brotherhood really taught and lived in the early centuries of the Church, with wars between nations and between capital and labor ended for good. $1.75

THE HISTORY OF UTOPIAN THOUGHT

By JOYCE O. HERTZLER (Wisconsin)

The pictures of a better world from Amos and Hosea to Bellamy and Wells examined to discover their significance for us today. $3.00

ITEMS FOR YOUR NEXT ORDER:

Stratton: Anger: Its Religious and Moral Significance .....	$2.25
Haas: Freedom and Christian Conduct .....	2.25
Thouless: An Introduction to the Psychology of Religion .....	2.50
Pratt: Matter and Spirit .....	1.50
Beckwith: The Idea of God .....	2.50

64-66 Fifth Avenue

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

New York City, N.Y.

EASTER FREE

HALL-MACK CO.
MUSIC

A postal from Supt., Pastor or Committee will bring a set of sample services. FREE.

* EASTER HELPER, NO. 9, 20c

Book of Songs, Recitations, Drills, etc.

FLAVIA, or THE MARTYRS, 25c.

A Song Story of early Christian Era. This and others sent for examination on request.

* PAGEANTRY

Two Easter Pageants and a Play—25c.

* These are not sent for examination.

SPECIAL—30c.

3 Services, regular edition, value. . . . . 21c

Pageant. . . . . 25c

Helper No. 9. . . . . 20c

All for 30c in stamps. 66c

HALL-MACK CO., } 21st & Arch Streets,
ADAM GEIBEL MUSIC CO. } Philadelphia, Pa.

Start an Adult Bible Class with

SELL'S Bible Study Text-Books

A QUARTER OF A MILLION SOLD!

Just Out { No. 10—Bible Studies in the Four Gospels

No. 9—Bible Studies in Vital Questions

1. Supplementary Bible Studies 5. B. S. in Life of Christ

2. Bible Studies by Books 6. B. S. in Life of St. Paul

3. B. S. by Periods 7. B. S. in Christian Life

4. B. S. by Doctrines 8. B. S. in Early Life

Send for circular showing how to use them.

Each, cloth, 75c.; paper, 50c.

F. H. REVELL CO., 158 5th Ave., N.Y.; 17 N. Wabash Ave., Chicago

Pulpit Gowns

and Choir Vestment
Custom Tailoring
FOR CLERGYMEN

Pulpit Hangings and Bookmarkers

Cox Sons & Wining

131-133 East 23rd. New York City

COMING!
A new "Hocking" story will be a feature of "The Christian Work's" program for this year.

Watch for It!

Says Bishop Francis J. McConnell

of the Methodist Church

"I regard The Christian Century as the greatest journalistic force working for social and international righteousness coming from any press of the Christian Church."

EDITORIAL STAFF

Charles Clayton Morrison

Herbert L. Willett Orvis F. Jordan

Joseph Fort Newton John R. Ewers

Lynn Harold Hough Edward Shillito

Alva W. Taylor Thomas C. Clark

The Christian Century is distinguished by its candid discussion of living issues in the light of the mind of Christ.

Mail Coupon to-day. Foreign postage extra.

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Dear Sirs: Please enter my name (a new subscriber) for a year's subscription to The Christian Century at your regular rate of $4.00 (ministers $3.00). I will remit upon receipt of bill and charge a copy of [ ] "The Reconstruction of Religion," by Ellwood, or [ ] "The Crisis of the Churches," by Leighton Parks, or [ ] "The Mind in the Making," by Robinson, or [ ] "What Christianity Means to Me," by Lyman Abbott.

Name .....

Address .....

C.V.

When answering advertisements please mention The Christian Work

An Open Letter to Presbyterians

No religious body in America or elsewhere, so far as we know, has taken a higher or more advanced position on social questions than the Presbyterian Church, U.S.A.

On Temperance and Prohibition, at home and abroad, past, present and prospective, it is second to none and equalled by few.

Its work in behalf of Family and Juvenile Welfare, Social Hygiene, Prison Reform, Humane Education, wholesome Amusements and spiritual care of disabled Soldiers and Sailors has commanded respect and confidence.

Its efforts against harmful Narcotics, Gambling, Divorce, Profanity and unsocial and anti-social practises generally, have been constructive, consistent, persistent, dignified and influential.

If you approve this program and believe our Church is right in trying to further these ends in an orderly, systematic way, then provide for it in your budget and send your contributions to the

Presbyterian Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare
Columbia Bank Building, Pittsburgh, Pa.

MISS ANNA M. WYCOFF, Assistant Treasurer

CHARLES SCANLON, General Secretary

and good enough to be workers together with God for the transformation of this world into the kingdom of God. One recalls the word of the Lord to Ananias concerning Paul—"He is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel: for I will show him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake." If it were necessary for Jesus to suffer to make atonement for the sins of the world, that atonement, which was a Jewish rather than a Christian conception, was clearly inadequate, since precisely the same kind of suffering is laid upon each of his disciples. We too must suffer for well-doing. The world is not yet ready for reform, partly because it does not want reform, and partly because it does not realize its necessity. Our perfect comradeship with Jesus is seen in our willingness to suffer as he did, not to placate God, but to make the world better. "If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you." This is the meaning for us of Gethsemane, not as a place in which to fall asleep while some one else suffers, but to prepare ourselves for what lies before us. But let us not paint the picture too dark. Good Friday is followed by Easter, and the life in the flesh by the life everlasting.

SAMUEL CLARKE BUSHNELL.

5,000 CHRISTIAN WORKERS WANTED

To sell Bibles, Testaments, good books and handsome velvet Scripture Mottoes.

Good commission. Send for free catalogue and price list.

GEORGE W. NOBLE, Publisher
Dept. No. 10, Monon Bldg., CHICAGO, ILL.

UNIVERSITY BIBLE EDUCATION at home. Prepare for fall and winter study. Finest books. Best courses. Hundreds studying. Catalogue free. Lose no time from your regular work. Write Prof. C. J. Burton, Bible University, Eugene, Ore.

COLLECTION ENVELOPES—8c per pack of 52, in Cartons (Also Storehouse Tithers Envelopes) write Dufold Trifold Company, Asbury Park, N.J.

The Woodlawn Cemetery

Is readily accessible by Harlem trains from Grand Central Station and by subway. Small lots at reasonable prices. Write or telephone (4853 Gramercy Park) for Book of Views or representative. Office 20 E. 23d Street, New York City.

Quick Relief to BRONCHIAL SUFFERERS

Coughs, nasal and bronchial colds are relieved promptly by the vapor of Cresolene—the standard drugless treatment with forty years of successful use its guarantee. The most widely used remedy for whooping cough and spasmodic croup.

Introduced in 1879 Vapo-Cresolene "Used while you sleep"

Send for Descriptive Booklet 63C For Sale by Druggists
VAPO-CRESOLENE CO. 62 Cortlandt St., New York

PRODIGAL DAUGHTERS

Joseph Hocking's latest novel will be run serially in the CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with a March number. It is a real tale of to-day, a story with great dramatic reality—dealing with a pair of modern butterflies. It is a daring book with a remarkable solution.

So much interest has been aroused in America over Prodigal Daughters that it has been screened. Famous Players announce it among their April releases

You can see Prodigal Daughters on the screen and follow the story in THE CHRISTIAN WORK.

The Christian Work
70 Fifth Avenue
NEW YORK CITY

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR

Or $1.00 for a Five Month's Trial Subscription During the Run of the Story

When answering advertisements please mention The Christian Work

The book of the year for the pastor and layman
WHAT IT MEANS TO BE A CHRISTIAN

By Professor Edward Increase Bosworth

The beloved teacher of theology at Oberlin combines an open and fearless mind with a loving devotion to evangelical Christianity. In this book he has translated the very essence of the historic evangelistic message into clear and simple speech for the man of today.

A thoughtful business man has said after reading it, "It is the first time in my life that I have been able to follow this vital subject through to the end without becoming bewildered by mysticism and confused by dogma."

Price $1.25. Postage 10c

At all Religious Bookstores

The Pilgrim Press Boston
New York
Chicago

Tusculum

A thorough Christian-character-building College. Established 1794. Address

President O. O. GRAY, D.D., Greenville, Tenn.

THE FOREIGNER ON OUR WAR- OPINION PRISONERS

Sixty-one American citizens are still confined in the prisons of this country because of their refusal to support the World War. Groups of citizens of other countries as well as of America are protesting against this situation. Thousands of Mexican working men and women have pledged themselves to buy no more American products until we have freed these war-opinion prisoners. This boycott was put into effect following mass meetings in Tampico and Monterey, held under the auspices of the Mexican General Confederation of Labor.

The Marine Transport Workers' Industrial Union of London, England, has sent out a call to the workingmen in England and other countries to declare a boycott on American ships and products while these sixty-one men continue to be prisoners.

Charles Nagel, President Taft's Secretary of Commerce and Labor, a leading member of the St. Louis bar, said, after

NOW READY

a New Song Book
"RODEHEAVER'S GOSPEL SONGS"

For Church, Sunday School, Revival, and all religious services.

Singly 45c cloth (Quant. 40c)
Post- 35c limp not prepd. 30c paid 30c manilla prepd. 25c

Ask for returnable copy for examination.

We also publish Victory Songs, Songs for Service and Awakening Songs at the same prices.

Most of our songs are obtainable on
RAINBOW RECORDS, 75¢ each

Ask for our catalog of music and records

The Rodeheaver Company

668 McClure Bldg. Dept. 12 814 Walnut St.
Chicago, Ill. Philadelphia, Pa.

MOTION PICTURES

for churches. No danger from fire with Safety Standard Film and the Victor Safety Cinema $195—Splendid subjects for church and school. 1235 in our libraries at low rental. Pictures suitable for evening services, missionary societies, men's clubs, young people, children.

Write for "The Picture and the Pulpit" and demonstration.

WRITE for Free Booklet
ENTERTAINMENT INSTRUCTION SAFETY STANDARD FILM
UNITED & FILM PROJECTOR CORP.
Address Dept. I
69 W. Mohawk St. Buffalo

CHALFONTE-HADDON HALL

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

*Quiet — Homelike — Delightful
On the Beach and the Boardwalk*

Vernon Room March Musicales

Every Saturday evening thru March, by celebrated members of the Metropolitan and Chicago Operas and other eminent concert artists:—Paul Althouse, Rudolph Bochco, Madeline Brard, Clara Deeks, Giuseppe de Luca, Beniamino Gigli, Helen Hobson, Susanne Keener, Queena Mario, Erwin Nyiregyhazi, Lucille Orrell, Paul Ryman, John Charles Thomas, Cyrena Van Gordon, Raoul Vidas.

LEEDS AND LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

Write for Folders. Make Reservations. American Plan. Always Open.

VICTOR Portable STEREOPHON

THE PERFECT
LANTERN SLIDE
PROJECTOR
SHIPPED ON APPROVAL
THOUSANDS OF SLIDES FOR RENT OR FOR SALE

VICTOR
ANIMATOGRAPH CO. INC.
276 VICTOR BLDG. DAVENPORT, IA.

FOR YOUR EASTER COMMUNION

Individual Cups

Over 40,000 churches use
the Thomas Service.
Clean and sanitary. Write now for Catalog and Special Trial Offer.

Thomas Communion Service Co. Box 432 Lima, Ohio.

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y.
AND
220 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY
BELLS

McSHANE BELL FOUNDRY CO. BALTIMORE MARYLAND

Church, Chime and Peal BELLS

Memorials a Specialty

ROCHE'S HERBAL EMBROICATION

The external remedy for CROUP or WHOOPING
COUGH that several generations of mothers have used successfully (since 1802).
Roche's loosens the phlegm—relieves quickly and safely.
Equally effective for bronchitis and colds on the chest.

Always keep a bottle handy. All druggists or

E. FOUGERA & CO., Inc.
90-92 Deekman St., New York

the failure of President Harding to free the twenty-eight I.W.W. war-opinion prisoners, "It is clear that these men were convicted under the law as a war necessity. The sentence should cease with the satisfaction of that necessity."

Mr. Nagel believes that many of these men would be acquitted if tried under present conditions, or if convicted their sentence would be of short duration. He is at a loss to know why we should be less magnanimous than England.

He goes on to ask: "What would Lincoln have done? Read his pardon record during the Civil War. 'Those men have given the highest proof of conscience and courage. These are virtues so precious I shall save them where I can.'"

A WOMAN'S CLUB AWAY FROM MAIN STREET

The woman's club movement has spread with other American institutions into the Near East. The first Woman's Civic Welfare Society of Armenia has been organized in Karakliss, according to the Near East Relief.

The program of the club includes the planting of trees and gardens, the improvement of the streets and public fountains and sewer system of the city. Through the efforts of the club members Karakliss is becoming the cleanest community in the Caucasus.

Two churches that are Wilson equipped throughout.
Note partitions used even in galleries.

For the Saving of Light and Heat

RIGHT now there are many church buildings where light and heat are wasted. Perhaps yours is one. Great big rooms meant for great big meetings, but not a small easily heated or lighted room in the church. And as you well know, it costs a lot to heat and light big rooms for the little meetings so often held in all churches.

Thousands of churches are equipped with Wilson movable partitions just for the saving they afford. What we have done for them we can do for you.

Let us tell you how or send you a catalog full of suggestive ideas on the subject of movable partitions.

The J. G. Wilson Corp'n
17 East 36th St., New York City

Shall the Church Bless War?

It has in the past. Today Some sections of it are sounding the call to war in the Near East.

The World Tomorrow

discusses the question in its March issue

E. D. MOREL, famous English publicist.

"The Enemy in the Near East"

HENRY ATKINSON, of the Church Peace Union.

"The Defense of Christian Minorities"

HENRY HODGKIN, of the National Christian Council in China.

"When Missions Fall Back on Guns"

JOHN HAYNES, noted New York preacher.

"The Pacifist Alternative to War"

JOHN NEVIN SAYRE, of The World Tomorrow.

"The Love and Cruelty of Jesus Christ"

G. M. L. DAVIES, member of the English F. O. R.

"In Forma Pauperis"

KEMPER FULLERTON, of Oberlin School of Theology.

"A Civilization of the Unwalled Town"

BRENT DOW ALLINSON, just returned from France and Germany.

"The Ruhr"

Verses, book reviews, a story

15 cents a copy

396 Broadway, New York

Yearly subscription $1

IRRESISTIBLE

VACATION PLANS!

JOIN

The "Christian Work" Party to the MEDITERRANEAN and EUROPE

Summer "Baltic" Cruise and Winter "Baltic" Cruise

Both Round Trip Cruises on the Palatial White Star S. S. "Baltic" (23,884 tons), one of the Finest Trans-Atlantic Express Liners afloat, representing the Highest Standard of Service Throughout.

ITINERARY

Madeira, Cadiz, Seville (Cordova, Granada and the Alhambra), Gibraltar, Algiers, Naples, Athens, Constantinople, the Bosphorus and Black Sea, Haifa, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Bethany (Sea of Galilee, Nazareth, Samaria, Jericho, the Jordan and Dead Sea), Alexandria, Cairo, Heliopolis, Monaco, Monte Carlo, Cherbourg (Paris and French Battlefields, London), Liverpool and New York—a wonderful travel program.

On Winter "Baltic" Cruise special side trips to Damascus and up the Nile to the First Cataract can be included.

Stop-overs in Europe with return trips included on the "Majestic," "Olympic," "Adriatic," "Baltic," "Cedric," etc.

SUMMER "BAL TIC" CRUISE

61 Days, Sailing
June 27th, 1923.

WINTER "BAL TIC" CRUISE

65 Days, Sailing
February 2, 1924

COST

First-Class, $600 and up, according to size and location of stateroom.

GRANADA, FROM THE GENERALIFE

NINETEEN ANNUAL CLARK CRUISES

on such steamers as the Rotterdam, Celtic, Arabic, Laconia, Empress of Scotland, etc., insure perfected and satisfactory arrangements. 61 or 65 days, $600 and up, including the regular shore trips, landings, carriage drives, guides, hotels, first-class railroads, fees, etc.—everything first-class.

OUR "CHRISTIAN WORK" PARTY

is being organized by D. E. Lorenz, Ph.D., Author of "The Mediterranean Traveler" and Managing Director of Clark's Cruises.

THE SHIP—24 Imperial Suites and Chambres de Luxe with private bath. Two Great Promenade Decks, largely devoted to sumptuous Public Rooms. All B and C Deck Rooms have beds, windows, running water, etc.

Inspiring. Services and Lectures, Travel Club meetings, Concerts, Entertainments, Deck Sports and Contests, and delightful social life. Unexcelled Cuisine of the highest White Star Standard. Musical Program—Orchestra of Selected Musicians at Lunches and Dinners.

Mostly Steam Tenders for quick Landings; Staff of Trained Directors for Shore Trips; two Lady Chaperons; Physician, Nurses and Ship Hospital.

Illustrated Booklet (100 pages) and ship diagram sent free upon request. State which Cruise preferred.

\ Write and Make Reservations at Once.*

Cruise Department, THE CHRISTIAN WORK
70 Fifth Avenue New York, N. Y.

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

A Religious Weekly Review

MARCH 10, 1900

Public School of Religion Library
2223 Atherton St
Berkeley Calif
38225-92 1900

The United States and the World Court

Frederick Lynch, D.D.

Bags That Wax Not Old

Rufus M. Jones, LL.D.

The Free Churches and Reunion

W. B. Selbie, D.D.

Is There Hope in the Factory?

Professor H. A. Overstreet

Prerequisites of Union

Arthur J. Brown, D.D., LL.D.

Human Nature and Conduct

One Book a Week

---

Three Dollars a Year

Ten Cents a Copy

PROFESSIONAL EVANGELISM

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

During the past twelve months we have made it a point in mixing with laymen and clergymen of various denominations to ask this question: "What do you think of professional evangelism?" Almost everyone interrogated has answered negatively. We have summarized these opinions and we are convinced that the thought is growing away from professional evangelism. We think that the people are losing interest in this form of getting men and women into the kingdom. We are confident that eighty per cent. of the congregations the country over in all denominations would vote for the pastor to do his own preaching in a revival, or at least get some help other than a regular evangelist.

We are aware of the much good that is being accomplished by professional evangelists. We know that often they can draw large crowds that a regular pastor cannot get. And, too, we know that they are able to reach many that pastors do not seem to reach.

Professional evangelism has one besetting drawback that has brought, and is continuing to bring, it into ill repute. That besetting feature is the money display. It is a great pity that many engaged in this work do not have some way of financing their work other than the big show of public collections and offerings. People do not mind paying an evangelist a reasonable amount, but we are sure that many laymen are growing tired of seeing their pastors starved to death on a small salary and some evangelist come to the community and take away more than is paid the average pastor for a whole year's work. We are aware that the compensation of the evangelist must be more in proportion to time than for the pastor the same time, because of the time that the evangelist is not engaged. However, this remedies the situation only in the minds of the few.

We are of the opinion that pastors as a whole get no big results from the meetings held by some professional evangelists. Great crowds gather and a general upsurge prevails, but when you begin to count numbers added to the churches in the community the comparison is very small. And again we are aware that results cannot all be counted in numbers or even in things visible. The most difficult that the pastor has to overcome is the relapse after a big revival meeting in his church or community. As a rule the people do not continue to pack the house to overflow.

Conditions are sad in a church when it cannot, with its own membership and its own pastor, create a revival. Our observation is that the pastor who works constantly and earnestly among his people can accomplish far more than the work of the average professional evangelist.

C. B. RIDDLE.

Burlington, North Carolina.

Dr. Harry Emerson

FOSDICK

was the only author who had more than two books mentioned in The Continent's list (February 1, 1923) of 63 helpful religious publications. Dr. Fosdick has won renown and the gratitude of countless thousands of readers for the help that he has given them. Popular theology, ethics and psychology—the deepest things of life are presented convincingly, suffused with a true religious atmosphere. Five of his books were listed:

Christianity and Progress - 1.50

Forceful, brilliant and direct in its presentation.

Manhood of the Master - 1.15

Vividly sets forth His personal qualities.

Meaning of Faith - 1.35

Meaning of Prayer - 1.15

Meaning of Service - 1.25

A life that rightly conceives of prayer, that is dominated by faith, must be serviceable. This is a call for complete expression of the Christian life through service.

The THREE books uniformly bound in cloth, with morocco ridge, gold stamped, gilt top, with silk marker, encased in an attractive carton, $5.00 postage paid.

Have You Ordered Your Copies?

At your bookstore or from us

ASSOCIATION PRESS

Pub. Dept. Inter. Comm. Y.M.C.A.

347 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK

UNIVERSITY BIBLE EDUCATION at home. Prepare for fall and winter study. Finest books. Best courses. Hundreds studying. Catalogue free. Lose no time from your regular work. Write Prof. C. J. Burton, Bible University, Eugene, Ore.

COLLECTION ENVELOPES—8c per pack of 52, in Cartons (Also Storehouse Tithers Envelopes) write Dufold Trifold Company, Asbury Park, N.J.

THE AMERICAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY

76 Wall Street, New York
(Incorporated April, 1833)

The only American un denominational, international and national Society aiding seamen. Maintains a Sailors' Home and Institute at 507 West Street, New York City. Places loan libraries ($25) on vessels sailing from New York. Publishes the "Sailors' Magazine," $1.00. Supported by contributions and legacies. JOHN B. CALVERT, D.D., President. GEORGE SIDNEY WEBSTER, D.D., Sec'y. Send contributions to CLARENCE C. PINNEO, Treasurer, 76 Wall Street, New York.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY

Its work is interdenominational and international in scope and is commended by all the churches. It has published the Gospel message in 178 languages dialects and characters. Its colporters meet the immigrants with Christian literature in many languages, and also visit the spiritually destitute. In the Spanish and Portuguese languages, chiefly for Latin America, there have been issued 16,012,088 copies of volumes, tracts and periodicals. Its literature in the native dialects has been the strong right arm of foreign missions. Its benevolent work is dependent upon donations and legacies. REV. EDWIN NOAH HARDY, Ph.D., Gen. Sec. WILLIAM PHILLIPS HALL, President. Donations may be sent direct to American Tract Society, 101 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Says Bishop Francis J. McConnell

of the Methodist Church

"I regard The Christian Century as the greatest journalistic force working for social and international righteousness coming from any press of the Christian Church."

EDITORIAL STAFF

Charles Clayton Morrison
Herbert L. Willett Orvis F. Jordan
Joseph Fort Newton John R. Ewers
Lynn Harold Hough Edward Shillito
Alva W. Taylor Thomas C. Clark

The Christian Century is distinguished by its candid discussion of living issues in the light of the mind of Christ.

Mail Coupon to-day. Foreign postage extra.

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Dear Sirs: Please enter my name (a new subscriber) for a year's subscription to The Christian Century at your regular rate of $4.00 (ministers $3.00). I will remit upon receipt of bill and you will please send me without extra charge a copy of [ ] "The Reconstruction of Religion," by Ellwood, or [ ] "The Crisis of the Churches," by Leighton Parks, or [ ] "The Mind in the Making," by Robinson, or [ ] "What Christianity Means to Me," by Lyman Abbott.

Name .....

Address ..... C.W.

When answering advertisements please mention The Christian Work

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

CONTINUING

THE EVANGELIST AND NEW YORK OBSERVER

Vol. 114.—No. 10.

New York, March 10, 1923.

Whole No. 3013.

CONTENTS

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY.....	292
EDITORIALS:
The United States and the World Court: Frederick Lynch, D.D.	294
Protestantism and the World's Necessities: S. Parkes Cadman, D.D.	295
Bags That Wax Not Old: Rufus M. Jones, LL.D.....	295
EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE:
Round the World and Back Again: Nehemiah Boynton, D.D....	296
THE OBSERVER'S LETTER:
The Passing of a Great Scholar.....	297
THE WEEKLY SERMON:
The Free Churches and Reunion: W. B. Selbie, D.D.....	299
GENERAL ARTICLES:
Is There Hope in the Factory: Professor H. A. Overstreet.....	303
Prerequisites of Union: Arthur J. Brown, D.D., LL.D.....	307
In Praise of Heresy: Professor Charles Proper Fagnani.....	311
INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON:
For March 18: Jesus Crucified.....	312
COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT:
Notes from the Field: Rev. Edmund de S. Brunner, Ph.D.....	315
ONE BOOK A WEEK:
Human Nature and Conduct.....	316

The Christian Work; Published weekly; 10 cents a copy, $3.00 a year in the United States, $3.52 in Canada, and $4.04 in all other countries (postage included.)

Application made for entry as second class matter February 17, 1923, at the Post-office at New York, N. Y., under act of March 3, 1879.

Printed in U. S. A.—Published by The Christian World, Inc., Frederick Lynch, President; Henry Strong Huntington, Vice-President; Benson Y. Landis, Secretary-Treasurer.

All communications and remittances should be sent to "The Christian Work," 70 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Printed by Birkle & Glaser, 103 Park Place, New York City.

The World of To-day

THE SENATE ON THE WORLD COURT

The Senate's answer to President Harding's proposal that our country become one of the States adhering to the Permanent Court of International Justice was a series of questions. Did the President favor making submission of international questions within the Court's scope obligatory on all nations adhering to it? If he did, would he ask the other powers whether they were willing to obligate themselves thus? Did adhesion to the World Court involve our acceptance of the Labor section of the Treaty of Versailles? What reservations, if any, have been made by countries adhering to the protocol which establishes the Court? According to the Washington press correspondents, the Senate's questions were simply for the purpose of gaining time. They reckoned that the President would not be able to answer them before the present session of Congress ended on March 4. Secretary Hughes, however, supplied Mr. Harding with his answer immediately. The President would not attempt to negotiate a treaty making the jurisdiction of the World Court obligatory on the United States, not because he might not be inclined to do so, but because the record of the United States Senate showed the great disinclination of that body toward any such provision. We of America are much inclined to pat ourselves on the back for our unwarlike spirit. We like to tell how often we have arbitrated disputes with other nations. But the record of the Senate for the last quarter century, from the time of President Cleveland down, shows that the Senate has never consented to an arbitration treaty which automatically referred international disputes to arbitration. The Senate's record is not pretty reading to those who believe in the development of settled international procedure in dealing with differences between nations. American adherence to the Court would not involve our recognizing the Labor section of the Treaty of Versailles. (Nevertheless we ought to share in the international labor organization of the League). So far as Secretary Hughes knows no nations have made reservation in signing the protocol which established the Court. In spite of Secretary Hughes's clear answers to the Senate's questions, that body did not consider that it had time to take up the question of entering the World Court in the two remaining days of the session. So from now until next December the country can come to a conclusion on the question. Public sentiment already appears almost unanimous for our entry into the Court.

THE REPORT OF THE CARNEGIE FOUNDATION

Since 1913 there has been an extraordinary rise in the salaries of college instructors and professors. In 1913 the average median salary of instructors aged thirty in the colleges and universities associated with the Foundation was

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

$1,250. That median rose to $2,000 at the age of forty, at fifty it was $2,500, and at sixty-five it was $2,750. In 1921 the thirty-year-old college teacher was receiving more than twice what his elder brother had at the same age, eight years before. His salary was $2,700. The median professor, aged forty, received a salary of $3,500; the fifty-year-old received $4,100, and the man of sixty-five, who had reached the age of optional retirement received $5,100. This is a most fortunate development. It represents a rise in salary considerably greater than the rise in the cost of living, so that the college professor to-day is very really more comfortably situated and better able to bring up a fair-sized family than he was ten years ago. The Foundation is at present conducting a study of dental education. The first dental school in the country—and in the world—the Baltimore College of Dental Surgery, was founded in 1840, "when authoritative spokesmen for medicine declared it to be beneath the dignity of the medical profession to include instruction in dentistry in the system of medical education." To-day there are forty-seven dental schools in the United States and five in Canada, with nearly thirteen thousand students in attendance. Thirty-eight of the fifty-two schools are part of or are intimately associated with universities. Dental schools are steadily raising their entrance requirements. In time they may approximate the standards set by the better medical schools. The Carnegie report also notes the educational requirements demanded of law schools by the American Bar Association and by the Association of American Law schools. The latter association will not admit to its membership any school which conducts night classes in law for students preparing for the Bar, nor will they admit a school which is connected with a university conducting such classes. Only thirty-eight of the 147 law schools of the country comply with the standards set by the American Bar Association. No wonder the Carnegie Foundation considers that there is need of stimulating the law schools of the country.

THE CHURCH CAMPAIGN FOR PEACE

The World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches, the Church Peace Union, the World Peace Foundation, of Boston, and the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America have undertaken to hold more than two thousand conferences and mass meetings throughout the United States for the purpose of urging more effective American co-operation in organizing the world against future wars. Among the speakers who will take part in the campaigns are: George W. Wickersham, formerly United States Attorney General; Professor Irving Fisher, of Yale University; William P. Merrill, minister of the Brick Presbyterian Church of New York and chairman of the World Alliance; Hamilton Holt, formerly of "The Independent" and chairman of the Woodrow Wilson Foundation; Nehemiah Boynton, formerly moderator of the National Council of the Congregational Churches; Herbert S. Houston, publisher of "Our World" and formerly president of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World; Major General O'Ryan; Henry A. Atkins, executive secretary of the World Alliance; Everett Colby, the Rev. Harry Emerson Fosdick and Bishop Luther Wilson, all of New York; the Rev. Edward Cummings, of Boston, secretary of the World Peace Foundation; Linley V. Gordon, associate secretary of the World Alliance; Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, and the Rev. Samuel Eliot. The meetings begin this week in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Detroit Ann Arbor, Dallas, Wichita, Scranton, Boston, Concord, New Hampshire and Portland, Maine. Later meetings will be held in Sioux Falls, South Dakota, March 12, 13; Philadelphia, March 13; Omaha, March 14, 15; Baltimore, March 15, 16; Salt Lake City, March 16; Denver and Springfield, Massachusetts, March 18, 19; New York, March 19, and Cheyenne, March 20. At these centers arrangements will be made for other meetings and conferences in outlying cities and towns during March and April. The meetings will give an opportunity to the Christian people of this country to make themselves heard in behalf of our entering the World Court and taking part in every good international development that shall help put an end to war.

THE ORGANIZATION OF A TOWN FOR WORLD PEACE

The name of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches has become very familiar in the last three years. Most of us do not yet realize, however, that the Alliance is so organized that through it any community can make its international good-will felt. New Brunswick, New Jersey, is setting an example of what may be done. An enthusiastic meeting of New Brunswick ministers and laymen, a few weeks ago, voted to form a New Brunswick branch of the World Alliance. The meeting appointed a double committee, one of ministers and one of laymen, a constitution and a splendid platform were written on the spot and a big mass meeting was planned for the Sunday after Easter. The New Brunswick leaders purpose to enlist every man and woman in New Brunswick who believes that the United States is called to serve the world, promote good-will and mediate between the nations. If New Brunswick's example is followed widely enough all question of America's entry into the World Court will be at an end. Not only so, but the following of her example would insure that our country would go on step by step to accept her international responsibilities. With such an organization in every town in America it would be as certain as the rising of the sun.

THE RUHR SITUATION

It looks more and more as if the difficulties between France and Germany would scarcely be ironed out without some sort of mediation. France is tightening her grip on the Ruhr day by day. Already the French journals are beginning to talk of the permanent holding by France of all the occupied territory. (The occupied territory grows larger with each week.) Meantime in Germany bitterness is growing everywhere. The whole situation is fraught with greatest danger. From England and the neutral countries of Europe voices are demanding that the matter go to the League of Nations, where it belongs. France objects to this—indeed, the more firmly entrenched France becomes in Germany the less she welcomes any outside interference. Meantime, the most significant development is growing impatience in England with the policy of benevolent neutrality and the insistence that the British government make an open protest. The British Labor Party and the small but influential group headed by Lloyd George demand the withdrawal of the British troops. The British Cabinet is split over the issue, Lord Curzon insisting that the

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

English troops remain, and others, mindful of the growing menace to Great Britain and Europe in general, showing more and more restlessness at Bonar Law's policy of watchful waiting. The "New Statesman," a by no means radical weekly, protests in vigorous terms that "the deliberate destruction of German industry is something which Great Britain cannot and will not tolerate. . . . France must abandon her present purpose or we shall be forced definitely to . . . oppose her by every means in our power short of actual violence." The French are claiming that their policy of insisting on strict obedience in the occupied regions is bringing results. They report that German business men of the occupied regions are going to Berlin to urge the Berlin government to come to some accommodation with France. The whole Ruhr affair throws us back on the need of a world internationally organized. The Ruhr invasion should be as impossible as for Virginia to invade West Virginia in order to collect a debt.

SUCCESS OF THE CENTRAL AMERICAN CONFERENCE

The Central American Conference, which adjourned last month, adopted a long list of treaties and conventions, including a general treaty of peace and amity, and conventions for the establishment of international Central American tribunal and international commissions of inquiry. The five republics agreed to free trade between themselves, and to make uniform their laws for the protection of workmen and laborers. They will unite in plans for the establishment of stations for agricultural experiments and animal industries, and they made provision for reciprocal exchanges of students between the five countries. In addition the republics made a new extradition agreement and agreed to limit their armaments. The United States is a party to two of the conventions; one for the establishment of international commissions of inquiry, and one for the re-establishment of a Central American tribunal. (It was the United States' refusal to accept an adverse award which ended the earlier Central American court.) Secretary Hughes, who initiated the conference, and Dr. Leo S. Rowe, director of the Pan-American Union, who was invaluable in reconciling differences and softening the animosities between various States, deserve cordial praise for the success of the meeting. Time only can determine whether the "paper" results ripen into effective working institutions. Much will depend on the good-will and common sense of the Central Americans, but almost as much will depend on the degree to which our Government in good faith lessens its extra-legal control in that region.

THE APPEAL OF THE SWEDISH CHURCH TO AMERICA

The Archbishop of Upsala and the Bishops of the Church of Sweden have drawn up the following statement of conditions in Europe, with an appeal to the President of the United States in behalf of a conference:

Upsala, Sweden, February 2, 1923.

No one can count the numbers of those in all parts of the world who are moved in their innermost being by the present events. We hoped for the blessings of peace after the horrors of war. But disunity in the European Commonwealth grows worse. Starvation, the poison of bitterness in outraged souls, physical contamination and sexual degradation ravage noble sections of the human family in Central Europe. During so-called peace, skilled armies are cutting big parts away from the country of their disarmed neighbors, thus aggravating atrocious miseries. The curse now being sown will bear fruit in new and more frightful wars, for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap, as the World War proved abundantly.

Europe's distress evidently comes from making brutal power and shortsighted selfishness the highest law, instead of listening to Christ's voice. We judge nobody, because man sees in part, but we condemn the methods of violence.

Earnest hearts everywhere burn with the question: What can be done? We servants of the Church in Sweden urge our fellow Christians in France and all lands, especially in America to implore with us from God vision and power for whole-hearted action. The whole problem of peace and necessary reparation must be lifted from the present level of reprisals and threats to the higher plane of mutual trust and good-will. Men must forgive as they hope for forgiveness. We humbly appeal to the responsible statesmen and especially to the President of the United States with all possible speed to relieve by a conference and a straightforward agreement between the representatives of the powers the tension which grows daily more unbearable and baleful.

Archbishop Upsala, Bishops Linköping, Skara, Strängnäs, Visby, Västerås, Växjö, Lund, Gothenburg, Karlstad, Harnosand, Luleå, and Primarius Stockholm.

The appeal is so remarkable that it is its own best comment on itself. The world is one neighborhood. Willy nilly America is neighbor to France and Germany.

DRUMMOND'S SUCCESSOR ON FREEDOM IN THE CHURCH

Among the eminent visitors from abroad this spring is Professor James Y. Simpson, successor to Henry Drummond in the chair of Natural Science, New College. New College is the theological school of the Free Church of Scotland in Edinburgh. Professor Simpson is a man of very wide interests. He began as a zoologist and is still such. He has always had a special interest in Russia and has served on official commissions there. During the war he was the British liaison officer with the Baltic States, and served as president of the boundary commission for Lithuania and Latvia. He believes heartily in the future of these states. Ultimately he expects to see them part of a great free Russian Confederation. But they need to go through this phase of independence in order that they may come into such a federation—when the time for it comes—freely and as equals. Only after Scotland had been independent was she ready for the union of 1707, which set the British Empire on its course. But Professor's Simpson's greatest interest is in his work in New College. In December he brought out a volume entitled "Man and the Attainment of Immortality," of which three thousand copies have already sold in Great Britain, an extraordinary sale. Professor Simpson has something to say that serious and modern-minded people want to hear. There is a freedom for religious thinking in Scotland—and England—which we have by no means attained generally in America. The very homogeneity of the population of Scotland is a help to the easier winning of that freedom. We have so many divergent heritages in this country that the Church itself varies very widely in its attitude toward any problem. Robertson Smith, Marcus Dods, Henry Drummond, all came under suspicion in the Scotch Church of the last century. But twenty years afterward the Scotch Church as a whole occupied the position these men had held. In Scot-

(Continued on page 298)

EDITORIAL

EDITORIAL STAFF

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

Frederick Lynch

ASSOCIATE EDITOR

Henry Strong Huntington

MANAGING EDITOR

Benson Y. Landis

LITERARY EDITOR

Tertius Van Dyke

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Edmund de Schweinitz Brunner

CONTRIBUTING STAFF

Henry A. Atkinson
Peter Ainslie
Hugh Black
S. Parkes Cadman

Sidney L. Gulick
Rufus M. Jones
E. Guy Talbott
T. Rhonda Williams

EDITORIAL COUNCIL

William C. Allen
Nehemiah Boynton
William Adams Brown
Howard Duffield
Sherwood Eddy
Irving Fisher
J. W. Johnson

Charles S. Macfarland
Shailer Mathews
George Foster Peabody
George A. Plimpton
Howard C. Robbins
Fred B. Smith
Cornelius Woelfkin

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS

Austria: Professor Carl Beth
Canada: Dr. J. Lovell Murray
Czechoslovakia: Professor Francis Zilka
France: Rev. Professor Wilfred Monod
Germany: Direktor A. Hinderer
Great Britain: Rev. Sidney M. Berry
Hungary: Dr. S. Szabo
Switzerland: Pastor Adolph Keller

fear of a family of nations idea and to the bewilderment of those who hate the idea of such a community, the President and Secretary of State suddenly urge the Senate to take steps to put the United States into the court which is set up by the League and which, in a sense, will be under its care, if not its jurisdiction. And to put it in by the front door, too! There is a provision whereby a nation may be a part-way adherent, a sort of side-door entrance, framed perhaps with the idea of the United States in mind, but the President does not urge that entrance. He wants us in by the front door, occupying a front seat, sharing in all its privileges and apparently assuming all its obligations. Something has happened. The President says in his message that the thing which has happened is that the Secretary of State, with his astute legal mind, after thorough investigation, has discovered that we can become a signatory power to the court without in any way recognizing the League and without having any relationship to it or obligation toward it.

The letter to the Senate was almost pathetic in its constant iteration of the fact that the Secretary of State felt sure that membership in the court did not in any way commit us to relationship to the League. It was in every other line. Indeed, the President was so insistent on this point that the message will raise the doubt in some of the dear Senators' guileless minds that the President was trying to convince himself that in his heart of hearts he was afraid it did relate us to the League. Of course, it does, and all this beating about the bush is but the puttering methods of men who do not dare face an issue squarely and take the consequences. Nobody is going to be deceived, as is evident at once by the attitude of the bitter-enders in the Senate. They know that to join the League's court is both to recognize the League and to assume relationship to it. The people everywhere know it. Hardly an editorial in a daily paper of the last week has not recognized it. But, as far as the people are concerned, the President has nothing to fear. They are not afraid of the League. If he had said frankly, "The court is a part of the League, but it is a good thing, largely of our own conceiving, and we ought to be in it," the whole people would have been as squarely behind him as they are now, and we would not have been put in the rather small position of taking something from an institution which we have as a government both maligned and scorned and taking something we would not help create. As for the Senators, perhaps no more would have opposed the League than will oppose the court created by the League.

Let us all be thankful, however, that the Administration has taken this step, and let us support the President with all our heart and soul. He has a group of very provincial and reactionary Republicans to deal with in the Senate, as well as two or three powerful radicals who will accept nothing that has to do with foreign states. He has got to convince them, although at present writing it looks hopeless. He will, of course, carry all the Wilson Democrats, for it is the biggest step yet taken toward recognition of the League, and, this step made, others may have to be taken. At this writing it looks as though the Democrats would all be with the President and those Republicans who, on the one hand, favor the League and those who, on the other hand, will always follow the Administration. Everybody had earnestly hoped the message might at least draw from the Senate a resolution recommending participation in the World Court. Indeed, Senator King has already introduced such a resolution. Here

The United States and the World Court

IN spite of the fact that Secretary Hughes intimated several months ago in an address at New Haven that there was a possibility of the Administration recommending that the United States become a party to the World Court set up last year by the League of Nations, everyone was really surprised when, on February 26th, President Harding sent his message to the Senate urging that this country sign the protocol and become a party to the court. So far President Harding and Secretary Hughes had avoided everything having even the remotest relation to the League of Nations, Secretary Hughes even picking letters from the League out of his mail with tongs when he condescended to notice them, that it was impossible to believe they would recommend our joining an institution set up by the League. It is like taking good gifts from the devil! It is like taking tainted money! Could any good thing come out of Nazareth? It was only the other day that there were rumors that there was a small cyclone in the State Department when it was intimated that the South American states would welcome a delegation from the League—to which they all belong—to the coming Pan-American Conference. The United States to sit in the same room with delegates from the League of Nations, exposing itself to such contamination! It could not be, and it was a choice between the League or the United States. And now, to the amazement of those who have no is an opportunity for every man who believes the nations should order their relationships by the Christian principle to make his faith felt. Write your Senator when you have read this last word.

EDITORIAL

F. L.

Protestantism and the World's Necessities

IN TWO PARTS.—PART I

DR. ROBERT WILLIAM DALE, in his tribute to the Evangelical Revival, contrasted its success in religious individualism with its failure to bring about social betterment. Some intense Evangelicals of to-day seem determined to maintain this woeful disparity. They resent the entrance of the Gospel into the broader relationships of life and disparage what may be termed the spiritualized communism of their brethren. Yet the humanities inspired by the Gospel are its unanswerable apologetic, while non-social extortion which combines plunder with prayer is a stumbling block to Protestantism and an offense to mankind. Commerce and its sustaining trades and industries have grown to huge proportions since the sixteenth century. The subsequent multiplication of classes and groups, the bitterness engendered by constant disputes between employers and employees, the secession of millions of artisans and workers from the ranks of church membership, compel the sorry admission that after two thousand years of tenure institutional Christianity has yet to present to the world an adequate plan for the insurance of social justice.

Protestantism should approach the social problem aware that the mass, as distinguished from the self, must be upraised by consecrated Christians who surrender themselves, not from fear of the domination of the unfit, but in the spirit of brotherhood, to co-operation as against competition. To be passive before known wrongs or content to purvey to exclusive circles withdrawn from the grim realities of toil and poverty, breeds the exotic religiosity which cripples some Protestant pulpits, and makes their respectability a byword. On the other hand, the recoil from these affectations has caused many Protestant clergymen and laymen to rush to the other extreme and there inject the virus of misstatement and exaggeration into their utterances on social issues, disdainful of the delirium that may follow. It is not by chance that the hopeful features of a just economy, as immune from the plagues of anarchy as from those of autocracy, are found in Christian commonwealths. We shall enhance its future by faithfully dispensing the Gospel of righteousness which covers all theories of social betterment as the sky overreaches the landscape. It is regrettable that this has not been done sooner and more generally. Formerly there was no raving about eradicating the evils of capitalism by confiscation, nor were the earlier social reformers the enemies of property as such. But while Churchmen were vainly perturbed about explanations of the Trinity or the duration of the future punishment of sin, Marx and his associates proposed, under the shadow of dynastic autocracy, that men, instead of sharing their poverty, should share their wealth.

Socialism administered by the collectivist State has little in common with Christianity. Its essence and aims are frankly materialistic. For the godless and the cruel it has become a creed of force, and they have made it the predacious evil of the time. For its more amenable adherents it is the creed of peace, to be reduced to practise by persuasion, and the decisions of the majority. Other followers who cannot detect its inverted dogmatisms and subterfuges are Socialists mainly because of the manifest inequalities which fortify those dogmatisms and subterfuges. The sane verdict rendered by responsible thinkers of the Anglican Church is that prevalent economic abuses are not the accidental but the normal product of the present system. This verdict, once it is adopted by Protestantism, as I hold it must be, will end its fatalistic attitude toward social iniquities. It will then proceed to their extermination as its third primal duty. America's low valuation of human material, the smug arrogance of its native citizens, its reluctance to admit citizens of other races to reasonable social and commercial fellowship, are rapidly disappearing. We are learning that we have received more emigration than we can digest, and that in our haste to exploit national resources, we have retarded national progress. Surely in the United States, if anywhere, Protestantism can develop its nascent Catholicity by means of a cosmopolitan life which furnishes even more material than we ask.

S. P. C.

Bags That Wax Not Old

THE ancient world found it very difficult to keep money even after it was got. There were almost constant wars involving the dire stripping of the unprotected country districts, and the siege and devastation of cities. In those times almost everything was fragile. It was never easy to discover any form of wealth that was surely abiding. Even if the besom of an invading army did not sweep away the labor of years, still there were other enemies to be feared. Tyrants were always on the watch for ways of relieving wealthy men of their treasures. There were robber bands lying in wait for the traveler, and neighborhood thieves found it a small matter to break into private houses and to steal hidden money. It was no uncommon thing for men to dig in the ground and hide the talent which they had saved, or to bury the pearl of great price, or other precious jewel, in a field. If one invested his wealth in garments, then another enemy was to be feared. The moth is as old as clothes, and he got in even where the thief failed to break through.

The problem of getting an indestructible money-bag was, thus, a problem of first importance. A journey to Jericho might any day reduce a man to primitive conditions, or a passing army might make him a beggar, or the visit of a thief might strip him of all his living, or the silent work of a brood of moths might ruin the savings of years. There were no perdurable purses, no non-breakable banks, no irreducible forms of wealth.

Christ evidently recognized that there was a value in money. He did not apparently demand from his follower the absolute renunciation of ownership. He expounded no new theory of economics. But he was profoundly impressed by the moral havoc and the social calamities caused by the excessive ambition for and pursuit of wealth. He saw how the mad rush for money and the overvaluation of it killed out the noblest fundamental traits of the soul, and, more than all else, He felt the tragedy of human lives being focused with intensity of strain and fixed with burning passion on the pursuit of such pitifully fragile treasures—moneybags of all sorts waxing old and becoming incapable of holding the hoard that absorbed the whole life.

EDITORIAL

Christ, then, proposes a new kind of purse, an indestructible and immutable treasure-bag—"make for yourselves bags that wax not old." Such purses are not on the market, they cannot be purchased, they must be woven by each person for himself, and they must be woven, if at all, out of the stuff of life itself. We here pass over, as so often in Christ's teaching, from extrinsic wealth to intrinsic, from the wealth which men merely possess to the kind of wealth which they can themselves be. We once more find ourselves brought to an inner way of living, where the issue is no longer how to accumulate goods, but rather how to become good. The problem is the problem of what men live by. We are called to loosen our grip on perishable treasures only that we may tighten our hold on heavenly, i.e., spiritual treasure. We are shown the folly of spending a life building barns for expanding earthly possessions, while we are taking no pains to make ourselves rich in God.

What is it, then, that men live by? What will prove to be imperishable wealth, whether we are in this world or in any other world of real moral issues? It is obviously not money, for men often live nobly after the money-bag has waxed old and after the bank has failed, and it is our most elemental faith that life blossoms out into its consummate richness after all earthly affairs come to a complete close, and after every penny of visible wealth has been left forever behind. Money is plainly not intrinsic treasure; love is, goodness is, joy is. A beloved disciple, in a moment of inspiration, announced the profound truth that love is "of God." Men wrongly divide love into two types, "human love" and "divine love," but in reality there is only love. Wherever love has become the nature of the soul, and it has become "natural" now to forget self for others, to seek to give rather than to get, to share rather than to possess, to be impoverished in order that some loved one may abound, there a divine and Godlike spirit has been formed. And we now come upon a new kind of wealth, a kind that accumulates with use, because it is a law that the more the spirit of love is exercised, the more the soul spends itself in love, so much the more love it has, the richer it grows, the diviner its nature becomes. But at the same time it is a fact that love is never complete, never reaches its full scope and measure until our love takes on an eternal aspect—until we love God in Himself, or love Him in our loved ones. One reason why love is exalted by death is that we no longer love our immortal loved one in any narrow and selfish way; we love now for pure love's sake, and the truest of all treasures which can be laid up in imperishable bags is this stock of unalloyed love for that which is most lovely—for God and for souls that are given to us to bring some of His nature closer to our human hearts.

Goodness is, of course, notoriously hard to define. It is never an abstract quality that can be described by logical concepts. It is a way of living, a way of acting, a way of working out relationships. It is, like love, a cumulative thing. To be good inherently means to be becoming better, to be on the way to an unattained goal of action or of character. It is the glory of going on to be perfect like our Father in heaven. To be rich in goodness of character, therefore, is to be on the way to become ever richer, however long the journey lasts, however far the spiral winds, for goodness like love, is of God, and steadily assimilates our imperfect human nature to the perfect divine nature.

Joy is, perhaps, not often thought of as one of the things men live by, as the souls eternal wealth. Life is so full of sorrow and pain that joy seems like a fleeting, vanishing asset. But that is because joy is confused with pleasure. True joy is not a thing of moods, not a capricious emotion, tied to fluctuating experiences. It is a state and condition of the soul. It survives through pain and sorrow and, like a subterranean spring, waters the whole life. It is intimately allied and bound up with love and goodness, and so is deeply rooted in the life of God. Joy is the most perfect and complete mark and sign of immortal wealth, because it indicates that the soul is living by love and by goodness, and is very rich in God.

R. M. J.

Round the World and Back Again

[FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE]

THERE'S no place like home, but there are other places in the world, sure as you live! There is no race like our own, but there are other races, not so sure as we are of the "manifest destiny" of our own. There is no institution like our own triumphant democracy, but there are other institutions, whose beard grows rapidly, and whose confident and prophetic slogan is, "A free field and a fair fight, and may the best man win." A thirty-thousand-mile trip o'er sea and land in the short space of six months knocks the smug out of a man, and supplants it with the serious. However broad may be his optimistic smile as he waves his friends farewell, and however ample his "all's well with the world" waistband, when he comes home his countenance wears a sober if not a concerned visage. Sure, he still grips his hopes, he is no pessimist, but his hopes have lost superfluous flesh, the punch is gone, and he is in better health, even if he does wear a lean and hungry look.

He is like the old Massachusetts farmer who, having lived in Pelham all his days, had never made an excursion into the world, even as far as Springfield, twenty miles away. One winter's day, after the cows had been milked and the chores compassed, he braved the great adventure. He walked up and down the bustling thoroughfares, so different from the country road of his native village; looked with wonder at the shop windows, patronized a lunch counter and thought milk "scandalously high" at ten cents a glass; came home, sat down by the kitchen fire, lit his pipe and smoked for a long time in silent meditation. Then, taking his pipe from his lips with the skill and grace of a past master, he said to his patient, eager wife: "Sally, if the world's as big the other way as it is from Pelham to Springfield, it's a mighty big place." Then, in confidence and in quietude, he resumed his pipe. Kipling sings it for us:

O, the world is very large: seven seas from Marge to Marge,
And it holds a vast and varied kind of man;
And the wildest dreams of Kan are the facts in Katmandu,
And the crimes of Clapham chaste in Maturban.

It grips you, this sense of wonder and of vastness, as you ride in luxury on the transcontinental express. It is not alone the high altitudes of the Rockies which affect your heart, but the level plains, with their irrigation and their crops, with their great cities of to-day, occupying the broad acres which but yesterday were the feeding ground of herds of buffalos.

EDITORIAL

Thirty years ago, on a journey to the Golden Gate, my train stopped at a frontier town. The station was a shack; the Indian squaws, papooses on their backs, watched us with shy but interested attention; the cowboys, with sombrero hats, gave us an exhibition of a race horse, at a consideration which made our fondly remembered Wild West shows as tame and inoffensive as a thoroughly subdued husband after he has received a genuine candle lecture, which has revealed qualities in his wife which he had supposed were absolutely foreign to her nature. It was entertaining, but as civilization it left so much to be desired.

My train stopped again, just the other day. Instead of the shack a fine modern station, with subways to the tracks; in place of the squaws, elegantly dressed ladies; for ponies, automobiles; for cowboys, gentlemen in tall hats and evening clothes, some wedding function, I judged, being celebrated, and for the plains, the streets and architecture of a great city. All in thirty years! Oh, the wonder of it! Oh, the portentous prophecy of it!

The wonder grows apace as you sail through the Golden Gate and feel yourself upon the heaving, sobbing bosom of the great Pacific, absolutely the unparalleled ocean of the world. How proud you are of your Shipping Board greyhound, twenty-three thousand tons, well formed, splendidly commanded and flying at the masthead Old Glory!

The question of American ships on the seas, and the American flag in foreign ports lays aside its academic robes, and clothes itself in real oilers and "sou'westers!"

With clearer and clearer vision you see, as you visit foreign port after foreign port, that if America wants to be aloof and isolate, she can withdraw her fleet, but that if she wishes to trade internationally she must do, and speedily, too, what Britain, on whose flag the sun never sets, does for her fleet. The prejudices of no portion of our country should shiver the interests of the country at large, and to have the American flag upon the high seas is indispensable to the growth of our commerce, our prestige and our moral influence among the nations.

But here you are after a six days' sail at Honolulu, which a hundred years ago was a famous watering place for stark naked, man-eating savages!

As a boy, more than half a century ago, I parted reluctantly by the insistent persuasion of my parents, with pennies I personally would have preferred to have invested in a circus ticket, to help build the "Morning Star," which was to carry missionaries to this very island. What now do my eyes behold? A city modern in every respect, with splendid public buildings, asphalt streets, automobiles, up-to-date newspapers and magazines. Four races living in peace and mutual understanding; no race prejudice, no lynching, no Ku Klux, and flying from a hundred flagstaffs Old Glory!

In a single twenty-four hours you are "off again, gone again" for a twelve-day sail to Yokohama, over Asia, so vast, so lovely, so enchanting, but without sight of a sail for ten long days and nights! Of course, when you "cross the line" memories of Mark Twain are on every tongue. At the significant moment Mark was in the bow and his wife was in the stern of the ship. It was Wednesday where he was and still Tuesday in his wife's position. Great was the anguish of America's greatest humorist, because of the apparent impossibility of bridging the chasm between his Wednesday and his Tuesday, and so resuming again the fond relations of connubial bliss with the lady of his heart!

You are stepping ashore at Yokohama; your first rickshaw ride awaits you. You feel like an elephant astride of a grasshopper and cannot easily reconcile your American ideas with having a brother man as beast of burden on your behalf.

But when you arrive at your hotel and your beast of burden announces his fee, based not on distance, but on the fact that you are an ignorant foreigner, you may not abandon your principles about your brother man, but you do reflect upon the ministry of patent exceptions in establishing great conclusions.

NEHEMIAH BOYNTON.

THE OBSERVER

The Passing of a Great Scholar

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

WHAT a difference the Great War has made in everything, in our intellectual contacts as well as in our political estrangements. Ten years ago the death of Professor Ernest Troeltsch would have been in every cosmopolitan paper in America. When he died the other day I saw just one brief notice in an American paper of his passing, and I doubt if there was much more in the British papers, and yet he was one of the most outstanding scholars not only of Germany but of the world. It was frequently remarked in Germany that he probably knew more of certain periods of history than any man living. Professor of Philosophy for many years in the University of Berlin, his chief interest was in the Middle Ages and the Reformation, and his books dealt largely with historical themes. He wrote many books, but I believe that only one has been translated into English—one dealing with the Reformation. The uniqueness of all these books consisted in the fact that they dealt with the social, economic, industrial and political theories and practices wrought by the Gospel and the Church in the Middle Ages. It was the first attempt on any big, scholarly scale to approach that subject, as far as I know. Everybody wondered when the books appeared, as they wonder now, where he got the information that lies at the basis of these big books. He must have read everything written or printed in those years. He was a perfect illustration of the real scholar for which Germany has always been famous, who knows everything there is to be known on his subject.

Last July, while I was in Berlin, I spent an afternoon with Professor Troeltsch in his home at Charlottenburg, the beautiful suburb of Berlin. I had gone to Berlin with the thought of picking up some of the old contacts broken by the war, and also with the hope of seeing some of the leading men in the churches and the universities whom I had not met before and persuading them to talk freely on the European situation from the German point of view. Dr. Troeltsch was one of those whom I had not met, but one of those I most wished to meet. He received me very cordially, but with apologies. He had to live without domestic service; part of the house had to be shut up as they could not afford coal; they lived most frugally, as food of any kind was a luxury; books and magazines he could buy no more. We sat for a long time in the big library, but he said with sadness that he did not know how long he could keep it. He really could not afford to keep the house, the rent was impossible, but he could not find another. The university professors all over Germany were in the same plight, he told me. Many of them were not so well off as he, for he had some income from the State as Under-Secretary of Education. (He was subjected to much criticism from many of his colleagues for accepting a position in the Republic; but, as he said to me, he thought it was his duty to support the State in every way, although he did not believe that Germany was as well off under a republican form of government as she would be under a constitutional monarchy. People needed training for government as much as for law, medicine or teaching, he said, and none of the present public officials had had any such training. The Republic was the only government there was, and the only one there would be for some time to come. He thought all lovers of Germany should support it.

Dr. Troeltsch was a very impressive man. His head was massive and the gray hair, in shaggy locks, made it look even larger. The face was strong and the personality magnetic; his voice was expressive of his personality. Altogether he was a very forceful, dynamic man, one who bore the touch of greatness. He spoke good English, although he had not used it much for ten years. He answered my questions very frankly, saying, why should he not? Like most of the Germans with whom I talked, he was very sad and discouraged and seemed very hopeless about the future of Germany. There was no unity within her, and her enemies were bent on her destruction. I might say that as we talked he seemed almost to be despairing more over the lack of unity within the empire than from fear of France's desire to keep Germany powerless. He said it was an awful feeling to have that one's country should become in the eyes of the world a second-rate power, after it had been one of the greatest. He felt, as did all the Germans with whom I talked, that the Versailles Treaty was an unjust document which violated all the promises held out to Germany at the time of the armistice. He would not say that Germany was guiltless in the origin of the war, or, as some of his compatriots have said, that England started it, but he did believe that Germany was no more guilty than the others. They were all victims, he said, of a civilization that logically produced wars. He thought that if the Peace Conference had recognized that Germany had repudiated her war lords and become a republic, and had welcomed the republic sympathetically, taken it into the League of Nations and appointed a commission to study into the whole question of guilt and reparations, the new Germany would have been so enheartened that it would greatly have strengthened the Republic and produced that feeling of respect and neighborly good-will that would have led to the determination to pay as cheerfully as possible whatever reparations a commission should have determined as just for the damages done by the German army in France and Belgium.

We talked much about the League of Nations. He took the ground that Germany could not be greatly interested in it until she was a member; at present it seemed more like an organization of the Allies to enforce the Versailles provisions against Germany. (He lived long enough to see that this was not true. The League has taken no part in the Ruhr invasion and the most powerful nation in the League—Great Britain—has discouraged France rather than supported her in her step.) Dr. Troeltsch felt that the League if a real League of all the nations, would be a great step toward world peace, but that there would always be danger so long as the selfish nation existed. The selfish nation would disturb the League, as the selfish, criminally minded man disturbed the nation.

He talked much about the religious situation in Germany. Dr. Troeltsch did not think the war had affected it much one way or another, except to breed a good deal of scepticism. It was harder for the pious German to believe in a good and just God, especially in the face of the unjust treatment the average believer felt had been meted out to Germany. Suffering, discouragement, poverty and loss had all threatened the heart of the people. Just at present the people were so concerned with getting enough to eat that they had little time for anything else. Socialism, if not hostile to religion, was at least indifferent to it. The Church was necessarily somewhat confused by a process of readjustment from a State Church to a Free Church, especially as she had to do it in the most perplexing times the nation had ever known. He felt, though, as we all have come to feel since the war, that Christianity had got to be applied to the nation as well as to individuals.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

The World of To-day

(Continued from page 293)

land thinking people have no question any longer that truth is one. The leaders of the Scotch churches with scarcely an exception would agree with Professor Simpson's expression of the need of restating truth with the development of knowledge. "Religion," Professor Simpson says, "is coming into relation with the Supreme Power in the universe, revealed in unique form in Jesus Christ. He showed us what is eternally true in the heart of God. But the way we think of God and His work and purpose in the world must be modified to some extent and is richly increased by the revelation of Himself in science and in history. Each generation has the right to demand that its knowledge of God be restated and interpreted in the light of the knowledge that that generation has attained. The only difficulty arises when there is an attempt to insist that the forms and categories of truth that dominated the thinking of past generations be held as absolute for this generation." "The result of this attitude of freedom on the part of the Scotch churches is"—we quote Professor Simpson again—"that the young people are rallying around our Church.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Free Churches and Reunion

By W. B. Selbie, M.A., D.D.

President of Mansfield College, Oxford

[Two sermons have recently been delivered in St. Albans Church, London, at a series of Conferences on Reunion, one by Principal Selbie of Mansfield College, Oxford, giving the Free Church point of view and dealing especially with the Lambeth Appeal, and one by Professor Headlam of Oxford University, replying from the Anglican point of view. They are both of them very interesting pronouncements and we are printing them in two successive issues of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, this week's and next week's.—EDITORS.]

I HAVE been asked to speak on the attitude of the Free Churches towards Reunion, particularly with regard to the report of the Joint Conference which has been holding several sessions at Lambeth since the meeting of the great Lambeth Conference itself. I have been asked not to evade any of the difficulties and to speak with entire frankness, and this I shall try to do. Some disappointment has been expressed at the attitude of the Free Churches generally, not only towards the findings of the Lambeth Conference and the Appeal to All Christian People which was then sent out, but also towards the findings of this latter Joint Conference. It is felt that we have not shown, or some of the Free Churches at any rate have not shown, that sympathy with the whole movement towards reunion that they might have been expected to do. I think, however, that this is perhaps an exaggerated view of the situation among the Free Churches, and I think I can best approach the subject to-day by trying to give you some sort of indication of their mind in regard to this whole question before we come to deal with the particular proposals of the Joint Committee. I think we should always remember that the Free Churches, or at least the rank and file of the Free Churches, approach this subject from a very different angle from that of the Anglicans, and I think also we must recognize that the rank and file of the Free Churches look at the question somewhat differently from their leaders. It has been said on both sides that the leaders are far in advance of the rank and file. It is quite certain that there are a number of Anglicans who do not follow the lead of the two Archbishops in this matter, and I am perfectly well aware that there are a great number of Congregationalists who would not accept some of the positions that I have accepted and would not follow my lead on a question of this kind. That, however, I think is not a thing to be deplored. If all the people in the churches were prepared blindly to accept all that their so-called leaders said or did I am sure it would be a most unfortunate situation. I feel that the fact that there is this divergence between the leaders and the followers makes necessary a great campaign of education, and I hope that lectures of this kind will help in that campaign of education which is certainly needed on both sides.

As to the position of the Free Churches in general in regard to the Lambeth proposals and to the general objective which those proposals have in view—the ultimate reunion of Christendom—as I say, the Free Churches approach this from an angle of their own. They do not realize, for example, in any definite sense that they are committing the sin of schism. They realize that their work in history has been under God, that they have a very definite part to play in the religious life of the world, and that they have proved by experience, by the manifest presence of the Spirit of God that they have a right to play this part. They also recognize that they represent the enormous majority of the English-speaking Christians of the world, and therefore they are not prepared to look at the subject simply from the angle of what they sometimes consider to be rather a narrow Anglican point of view. Therefore, they do not feel the urge and the insistence of the subject on the side of order as Anglicans themselves do. What they do feel, and what I think they are feeling increasingly, is that our disunion becomes a shame and a scandal in view of the impotence which it causes to the Church in reference to the great evils with which all the churches are confronted at the present time. I do not think they are inclined to listen to those who say, "You ought to close your ranks in order that you may fight the better against the organized evils of the present day." What they do feel, rather, is that the fact that we cannot close our ranks, the fact that we are in different armies and different regiments that are not fighting side by side; but sometimes almost fighting one another—they do feel that this hampers the whole work of the Kingdom of God, and particularly that it hampers the work of Christian witness in the world. Therefore, when the Lambeth proposals were first put out they were received among the Free Churches with a great sigh of gratitude and thanksgiving. Men felt that here at last was the note which they had hoped for many years to see struck. There had been, of course, on the part of individual eminent Anglicans many expressions of friendly feeling towards the Free Churches in the past; there had been a good deal of co-operation in good works; but there had never before been definitely and authoritatively stated the fact that in the opinion of the leaders of the Anglican Church those who belonged to the Free Churches were Christians, and were Christians on the same basis as themselves; nor had there ever been stated in anything like an authoritative way a desire on the part of Anglicans that there should be a closer co-operation and a better mutual knowledge between the divided sections of the Christian Church; and Free Churches generally ever since Lambeth have been looking anxiously and rather wistfully for some definite manifestation of that decision which was there taken up. Of course, a good deal has happened since then, and Free churchmen have felt constantly that, whilst Lambeth spoke with a very clear voice on certain matters, there were very few echoes of this voice in the Church at large. The Lambeth bishops suggested that it might be quite proper for a bishop to give permission to a Free Church leader or minister who was of the right mind in regard to reunion to preach in the pulpit of some Anglican church. Here and there that has been done in some places without any particular result; but in a great many places a storm of protest has been raised, and in the case of one particular incident in which I was myself concerned I fear that more harm than good was done. One feels that there is not in the Anglican Church the same kind of desire for this particular form of co-operation—which is not of course, a very important one, but it is a very real one—not the same kind of desire in the Anglican Church generally that there was among the bishops assembled at Lambeth.

Then, again, Free churchmen feel that ever since Lambeth the emphasis has been too strongly laid on the side of order and organization. What they want to realize, if they can, is the unity of the spirit rather than unity of organization first. They feel—and I am bound to say that I entirely agree with the great body of my fellow Free churchmen—that the only real unity, the only unity which is worth having, the only unity which is in any way comparable to that which is suggested and recommended in the New Testament, is the unity of faith and spirit, the unity of Christ's people under the leadership of Christ, the unity of those who believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and who find in Him their salvation. They had the impression that this unity existed. Many of them remember the first interim report of that very remarkable Committee on Faith and Order which was issued before the war, a committee consisting of representatives of every section of the Anglican Church and of all sections of Nonconformity. In its first interim report that committee set out a definite course on matters of faith, and it became perfectly clear from the findings of that committee that on the great fundamentals of the faith there was no real difference between the Free Churches and the Anglican Church. That was a great achievement, and I think it has never received the notice that was its due, because there was the fact sent out under the signatures of these men that they were agreed in the things which were most fundamental to the Christian faith. That being so, Free churchmen have rather wondered why it is that the negotiations which have since taken place have been entirely concerned with matters of order and organization, and that it seems to be the general opinion now that before we can have anything like reunion we must have something like uniformity of organization, and that the reunited Church is to be one great uniform organized community. Free churchmen generally are very suspicious of uniformity; it was the attempt to enforce uniformity which made them, and they are not likely to consent to any further attempt to enforce uniformity, even by agreement. Therefore, many of them have looked with some suspicion on the findings of the Joint Committee which has been recently meeting at Lambeth in order to follow up and explore the suggestions of the Lambeth Conference itself. I have been a member of that committee, and on the whole I agree with these findings; but I want to state now not so much my own opinion as the opinion of Free churchmen who have spoken very freely to me on the subject, and who perhaps represent the average of our churches, because unless we can carry with us the great bulk of these people—the great bulk of the Free Churches on the one hand, and the great bulk of average Anglicans on the other, who perhaps have thought very little and are very little concerned about the matter—unless we can carry these, any scheme of reunion will still remain a scheme simply on paper.

In the findings of this Conference there are three great sections. The first deals with the nature of the Church, the second with the Ministry, and the third with the place of the Creed in a United Church. Of that section of the nature of the Church I need say very little. It sets out in very clear and unmistakable language the idea of the Church as the Body of Christ, as a visible institution, as containing all those who have been or are being redeemed by and in Christ, and as also possessing certain visible and recognizable marks—the Sacraments, the ideal Christian life, the duly constituted ministry, and so on. The only paragraph in that section which has been met with something like serious questioning is the paragraph marked No. 10, as follows: "The marks which ought to characterize the Church visible on earth are possessed by these existing separate churches and societies of Christian people in very varying degrees of completeness or defect. Hence, even though they be parts of the visible Church, they cannot be considered as all alike giving equally adequate expression of the Lord's mind and purpose. Some, indeed, may be so defective that they cannot rightly be judged to be parts of that Church. But such judgments, though made in trust that they are in accordance with the Divine Mind, must be regarded as limited to the sphere of the visible Church as an ordered society here on earth. It would be presumption to claim that they have a like validity in the sphere of the whole Church as the One Body of the redeemed in Christ, for within that sphere judgment can only be given by the all-knowing mind and sovereign mercy of God."

That is a rather involved and somewhat difficult paragraph, but as it has been read in our churches the net result of it has been taken to be that we are prepared to hand over certain sections of the Free Churches to the uncovenanted mercies of God; let us say, that although we are perhaps prepared to regard them as part of the great invisible Church, we are not ready to join with them or to have them join with us in any reunited Church of the future. The feeling is pretty strong that that paragraph is aimed, say, at the Friends, the Quakers, and the Salvation Army; there are a great many people among us who are not prepared to de-Christianize or to de-Church the Society of Friends, and I am afraid that until that paragraph is made clearer, or until we are able, perhaps, to correct it in some way, it will be a great obstacle on the part of some to anything like a reunited Church.

Turning to the section on the ministry, we there meet with the findings of this committee in regard to ordination and to the episcopate. The section on the ministry makes it quite clear that the ministry should be a ministry of the whole Church and should exercise within the Church representatively in the name and by the authority of the Lord the powers and functions which are inherent in the Church. "No man can take this ministry upon himself. It must be conferred by the Church, acting through those who have authority given to them in the Church to confer it," and in the ministry "there must be not only an inward call of the Spirit, but also an outward and visible call and commission by the Church." Then it is said that, in accordance with apostolic practice and the ancient custom of the Church, "this commission should be given through ordination, with prayer and laying-on of hands by those who have authority given to them to ordain." In ordination "divine grace is given through the Holy Spirit in response to prayer and faith, for the fulfilment of the charge so committed." Then there is a long paragraph dealing with various forms of ministry, but the crucial paragraph comes later, as follows: "In view of the fact that the episcopate was from early times, and for many centuries accepted, and by the greater part of Christendom is still accepted, as the means whereby this authority of the whole body is given, we agree"—that is, Nonconformists and Anglicans together agree—"that it ought to be accepted as such for the United Church of the future. Similarly, in view of the place which the Council of Presbyters and the congregation of the faithful had in the constitution of the early Church, and the preservation of these elements of presbyteral and congregational order in large sections of Christendom, we agree that they should be maintained with a representative and constitutional episcopate as permanent elements in the order and life of the United Church. The acceptance of episcopal ordination for the future would not imply the acceptance of any particular theory as to its origin or character, or the disavowing of past ministries of Word and Sacrament otherwise received, which has, together with those received by episcopal ordination, been used and blessed by the Spirit of God."

There we have some findings which, I think, are extremely important, and which do represent a very large measure of agreement, but the criticism that has been passed from our side upon these findings is that, after all, they are ambiguous. It is suggested that ordination shall be episcopal in the future, but that along with the episcopate there will be representatives of the Presbyterian and Congregational orders; that is, the United Church shall be Episcopal, Presbyterian and Congregational; and what plain, simple-minded people want to know is how, in the name of all that is reasonable, is that going to be carried out, because there does seem to be a certain contradiction between the Episcopal order as we know it at present and, say, the Congregational order as we know it at present, too. Of course, that difficulty is supposed to be solved by the statement that a "representative and constitutional episcopate" should be set up, and one of the things which Free churchmen do very badly want to know is what is in the minds of those who use the phrase "representative and constitutional episcopate." What do we mean, for example, by representation of the Church? Is it just a representation such as we have in our churches to-day when we appoint delegates of the Church to do certain things in the name of the Church; or does "representative" mean, as it is taken, of course, by so many to mean, apostolic succession, and the representation which is drawn through and gathered from the general history of the Church through the appointed channels? One thing which must certainly be made clear before matters can go very much further, is as to the meaning of the word "representative" in this connection.

Then, again, what is meant by the phrase "episcopal ordination?" We have in our Free Churches pretty clear ideas as to the ministry. We recognize that no man ought to enter the ministry of the Church unless he is consciously and divinely called thereto by the Spirit of God, and our first step in connection with all candidates for ordination is to ascertain so far as it is humanly possible whether this man is really consciously called by the Spirit of God to the work. We put men through very severe and definite tests, not doctrinal tests I mean, but tests of action. They had to spend many years in study, and to show themselves approved of God for this work. When we are able to admit that as far as we can tell, and as far as it is humanly possible to find out, that a man is called of God, then he is set apart by the Church to the work, but the actual act of ordination we regard as a purely human thing; it is man's recognition and ratifying of the fact that this man is called of God to his work, that he is, in that sense, a prophet of the Lord. We do not believe that by this human act we can add anything to the work of the spirit of God, so far as the man is concerned. We commission him for work in a particular section of the Church, but it is a commission by men; the call is of God.

Now, are we to understand in the future that in the case of men so called and ordained they can be commissioned for work in the United Church by a bishop, acting along with presbyters and the representatives of the congregation, or are we to understand that the ceremonies which any such man will have to undergo in the reunited Church will be a reordination? In the Lambeth Conference it was urged that we should accept "a commission through episcopal ordination;" now, if that had been worded, "a commission from the hands of a bishop" I do not think we should have had any sort of objection, but when it is put "a commission through episcopal ordination" it gives us pause. They say, of course, and I think say quite honestly, that we shall not be asked to repudiate our past ministry, that we shall not be asked in any way to do anything or say anything which will imply that we had not been working under the guidance of the Holy Spirit of God; but to us the whole matter of ordination is at once so simple and so solemn that we cannot use the word in this double sense, and if the word ordination is used, then it comes to mean doing over again something which has been done once and for all. "Commission," we can understand, but reordination we cannot. I do not think that there is the smallest hope of any save perhaps a mere fraction of Free churchmen being willing to accept reordination in the sense in which I have described it. Many of us feel, I do myself, now that the whole matter is over, that these paragraphs of this report are a little too ambiguous, and that a great deal of them needs explaining before we can get very much further.

Then we come to the further very serious question of the place of the Creed in a United Church. The suggestion of the Joint Committee is that the Nicene Creed should be accepted by the United Church as a sufficient statement of the corporate faith, and that a confession of faith at baptism should be used, and that this had better be the Baptismal Creed of the Western Church, commonly called the Apostles' Creed. This creed should be used also liturgically in public worship, and should be regarded as an expression of corporate faith and allegiance. Then there is the paragraph, "When assent to the creeds is required by the United Church such assent should not be understood to imply the acceptance of them as a complete expression of the Christian faith, or as excluding reasonable liberty of interpretation. It should be understood to imply the acceptance of them as agreeable to the Word of God contained in the Holy Scriptures, as affirming essential elements in the Christian faith, and as preserving that faith in the form in which it has been handed down through many centuries in the history of the Christian Church." Then the section goes on to say that nothing in this hinders the thankful recognition of the continued presence and teaching of the living spirit in the Body of Christ, and emphasizes the duty of the Church to keep its mind free and ready to receive from Him in each day and generation ever-renewed guidance in the apprehension and expression of the truth.

Personally, I feel very little difficulty there, but there is very serious difficulty felt by many members of the Free Churches. They realize that these ancient creeds, as I think we all realize, while they do express and conserve the fundamentals of the Christian faith, they do so in a way and in language which it is very difficult for the modern mind candidly and frankly to accept. We are told, of course, and quite rightly told, that we must interpret these in our own way. Now, many of us in the Free Churches feel that at this time of day that is rather a pity. We know the ferment that is going on in the minds of men about questions of Christian doctrine. We realize that the Church and all sections of the Church are suffering grievously from a supposed lack of frankness in their statements of doctrinal matters. I do not say that this charge is justified, but there it is. Mixing among young men, as I do, I meet constantly with the objection, "You parsons do not say all you mean; you parsons don't tell us the truth as you know it," and they have the impression, rightly or wrongly, that the Church is not frank in its statements in regard to Christian truth. Now, that impression must be enhanced by the fact that the Church clings always to forms of expression which are, to say the least of it, antiquated. The truth in the creeds, the truth expressed by the creeds, I venture to think, the Free Churches acknowledge and accept as fully and frankly as any section of the Anglican Church; but they do feel very strongly that they must be ready to express these truths in ways which the modern mind can understand and in language which the common people can recognize as theirs. I pray, therefore, that when we come to know each other better, and when there is no sort of suspicion left in the mind of anyone as to the real and fundamental faith of the different sections of the Church, that, while we honor these ancient symbols and use them in our worship, we shall not in any sense make them a test for membership of the reunited Church. They are not, of course, proposed actually as a test here, but practically the thing comes to that. If I may refer to my own denomination for a moment, the old Congregational practice in regard to creeds is, I think, a very sound and a very healthy one.

We have always regarded creeds as excellent declarations of the faith, but we have always insisted that they must not be made an imposition upon tender consciences. Declarations of the faith we must have, the Church must know where it stands; the Church must be able to point to certain documents, saying, "There is our faith," and the Nicene Creed perhaps for the moment is as good as any to be pointed to in that way, but not to make them impositions upon any. The day is gone for that, and I do hope that when we come, if we ever do come, to frame a constitution of the reunited Church, we shall take a broader line in regard to the great matters of Christian doctrine than seems to be indicated by the statement that I have just read.

Another thing that is troubling the minds of Free churchmen very much in regard to this whole matter of reunion is as to whether the future Church is to be really Protestant or is to be Catholic. Now, here I am treading on very delicate ground. I do not want to say a word which would make the position any more difficult than perhaps it is just now, but we as outsiders cannot help seeing a great deal of what is going on within the Anglican Church at the present moment. We realize the tremendous struggle that is going on between Anglo-Catholics on the one hand and Protestant Anglicanism on the other, whether of the evangelical or of the liberal type, and we are wondering very much, so to speak, which party is going to win, because that is going to make an immense difference to our attitude in regard to any future reunion. It is quite unthinkable that if the Anglo-Catholic view of Church tradition and of order and of episcopacy is to be maintained, either we or indeed the evangelicals and the liberals within the Church itself will be able to come to anything like an agreement; and that question will have to be faced before we can go much further. There will have to be a definite understanding, and I am bound to say that so far matters of that kind have been evaded and slurred over, and many of us feel that before we can get very much farther there must be some frank understanding on questions of that sort.

Another question on which there must be some understanding is as to the relation of the Church to the State. If the reunited Church is to take the form which seems to be expected in the minds of many people at the present moment, it will be an extraordinary strong, big, conglomerate body, and it is almost unthinkable, again, that such a body should be in the position in relation to the State in which the Anglican Church finds itself to-day, a position, of course, which has grown up historically and which no one would think of starting de novo. While that question, again, has been systematically put upon one side—it has not been really considered by any of these committees—I am afraid that some definite understanding in regard to it will be necessary before we can go very much farther. There is in the minds of many people just now a feeling that we have come, as it were, to the end of all that can be done for the present. Whether we shall be able to carry this joint conference very much farther yet remains to be seen; but I do want to urge one or two considerations which would make for the continuance at any rate of conference.

We on our side do not wish to close any doors. We want the matter to remain open as long as possible. We are prepared—I think I may speak for Free churchmen generally—at all times and under all circumstances to enter into conference with our Anglican brethren to see whether we cannot draw nearer, and to see whether it is not possible to frame some basis of union. But at the same time we feel that the best way of doing this is to get to know one another better, and in order to attain that end we hope that it will be possible for us to sit at the feet, not of our own leaders and teachers, but of those of the other Church, so that we may get to understand the minds of those who differ from ourselves. I am certain that one of the great and beneficent results of the conferences which have taken place hitherto is that men who were formerly very sharply divided have come to know one another, to sympathize with one another, and have obtained a common mutual understanding that would have been quite impossible apart from the experience which these conferences have involved. I have been present myself, I think, in all of them, dating back many years before the war, and I can see as time goes on how much easier the whole situation became. We met at first sitting on opposite sides of one table and looking at one another in ways that made you feel that there was antagonism in the air. But that passed away, and men realized with astonishment that this man and that, whom they had looked upon as a peculiar sort of ecclesiastical firebrand, was a simple, good Christian exactly like themselves. The more that can be done the easier will it be to bring together the bodies which are represented. We need closer mutual understanding. There is on our side among the rank and file of our churches a grievous ignorance about the Anglican Church as a whole. There is, I know, on the Anglican side an almost worse ignorance of ourselves. I am constantly meeting good Anglicans who through some family necessity drop into a Congregational service, perhaps a marriage service or a burial service, and they have come out agape, saying, "We never thought you to be like this," meaning they never thought we were Christians. They are astonished, and so long as that condition of mutual ignorance remains reunion will always be a dream. I hope, therefore, that everything will be

(Continued on page 310)

Is There Hope in the Factory?

By Professor H. A. Overstreet

Professor of Philosophy in the College of the City of New York

II.

[This is the second article by Professor Overstreet, who spent a year working in factories to learn the truth of factory conditions to-day.]

AFTER working for a month or so in a fairly well organized factory, I made a visit to another one nearby.

This was in a New England town, famed for its manufacturing, and the factory which I visited would be known to many by the name of the timepiece on their mantle. I prefer to preserve the anonymity of that factory, since I have some uncomplimentary things to say of it.

When I looked for the personnel manager I found only an employment manager. This was count number one, since in progressive factories the employment manager has long since graduated into wider duties. The employment manager in this factory operated normally behind a little wicket window through which the visible portion of him interviewed the upper visible portions of applicants for positions. (This is considered an indefensible arrangement in all good factories.) At the moment of my arrival he was in the upstairs office. I stumbled up some steep and irregular steps and after several confusing turns about I found him at a desk in a room containing some six other desks, where typewriters banged and men talked in raised voices. The employment manager apologized for the confusion and proceeded to take me through the factory.

I realized then, by vivid contrast, what mere physical organization in a factory means. The buildings were a jumble, floors on different levels, winding stairways, dark hallways, ill-ventilated rooms. Elevators were of the most primitive sort. I saw men tie a rope around a crate and lower it by hand down the elevator shaft. For the most part no elevator was used for transmitting material from one part of the factory to another, but men were seen laboriously carrying trays of materials up and down the stairs.

It was like a piece of medievalism set in the midst of the efficient twentieth century!

After that I began to have respect for the much abused word efficiency. I came to see that efficiency has a human connotation, that its triumphs are measurable in human happiness and its failures in human distresses. I began to see that just as in individual life there must be mens sana in sano corpore, so in the factory primary attention must be paid to physical organization. A well planned factory, other things being equal, may be a joy to all concerned. An ill-planned factory, even with the best of intentions, can be nothing but an irritation and a breeder of discontent.

To-day there is none too poor to cast a stone at scientific management. Labor will have none of it, while old-fashioned management is volubly sarcastic about it. I remember one hard-boiled superintendent saying to me (it was while

I was introducing foremen's training into factories on the Pacific Coast). "What!" he cried. "Some more of that deficiency stuff! Not for me! Why I've got so many blanks and tags and report cards and order sheets around my place I can't shake a leg without spillin' 'em over!" The movement toward scientific management, however, is simply the movement toward a more intelligent conception of factory operation. It begins with the obvious proposition that maximum production at least cost is itself a good thing. If the great human task is the organization of energy for the control of nature to the service of man, the primary concern of man is to use as little of this energy resultlessly as possible. In other words, waste is in every circumstance a sign of human defeat.

In every production problem there are four main variables: time, materials, machinery, men. One can increase (or try to increase) production by increasing the time. That was the old way. Nine hours' work instead of eight and ten hours instead of nine. Or one may increase production by providing more materials. That is the costly way, which industry learns soon to abandon. Or, finally, one may increase production by putting more intelligence into the organization of materials and men. That is the triumphant human way. Scientific management is nothing more nor less than a study of machinery and men to the end of getting from them the maximum production at the minimum cost—in materials, machinery and men.

Take, for example, the Taylor principle of "functional foremanship." The conventional type of factory organization calls for one department—one foreman. I have seen this principle at work in a number of factories, and, save in very small factories, usually with poor results. I remember one factory in which organization was taking place along new lines. I happened to be in the department when the changes were first being made. In that department the foreman was supposed to do everything, from planning the work, repairing the machines, speeding up slackers, teaching new workers, inspecting equipment, to working at interminable reports and answering queries from all quarters of the factory. The man was a human jumping jack. It was physically impossible for him to do all that was required of him. The result was that when a searching investigation was made of his department it was found (1) that large wastes of material, running into thousands of dollars annually, were continuously occurring because of lack of machine inspection; (2) that poor work was being done because the foreman had no time to give proper instruction to his operatives, nor to inspect their work with thoroughness and regularity; (3) that periodic crises of jamming and delay occurred because he had no time properly to plan his work.

(Continued on page 306)

America's International Obligation in the Present Crisis

THE development of a fuller understanding of America's duty and opportunity in the present crisis, and the definite abandonment of the policy of aloofness on the part of our nation, now appears to be the one hope of a real solution of the economic and political problem now facing the world. In the light of this situation, the Commission on International Justice and Good-will of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has prepared the following declaration, which has been officially approved by the Administrative Committee of the Federal Council:

THE DRIFT TOWARDS WAR

"The hope that after the War the world would move rapidly towards permanent peace and a well-ordered international life has been shattered. Growing unrest, political intrigues, physical distress and suffering, a disordered economic life, increasing distrust, suspicions and hatreds, all point to great disaster. If the drift be allowed to continue in the present direction new wars will cripple still further our civilization and may even carry it into eclipse for centuries.

"The failure of diplomatic and financial efforts to bring about a satisfactory settlement constitutes a direct challenge to the Christian Church. Righteousness, justice, and good-will are the foundations of lasting peace. The problem is essentially a spiritual one and comes distinctly within the scope of the Church's duty.

"The Administrative Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America believes that it is voicing the moral judgment of the overwhelming majority of thoughtful Christian people in making the following declaration:

THE CALL TO AMERICA FOR FULL CO-OPERATION

"First: We believe that the United States should accept its full share of responsibility for bringing about an effective settlement of international problems. There are those who think the government has a mandate from the people to pursue a policy of aloofness. We do not thus understand the situation. The churches have declared, and must declare again, their convictions that generous co-operation among the nations is absolutely necessary to cope with the present hunger, strife, uncertainty and despair of the world. The participation of the United States is indispensable to successful co-operative action. An attitude of aloofness exposes our foreign policy to the charge of timidity and ineffectiveness. The present crisis in Europe summons us not to pass judgment on other peoples, but in a spirit of humility and self-examination to review our own attitude as a nation and to ask ourselves how we may, by co-operation with other nations, help to meet the overwhelming responsibility which rests upon the entire world.

ANOTHER INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE

"Second: We believe that the United States should take the initiative in calling an international conference to consider the whole economic and political situation in Europe, including reparations, debts and armaments, in the endeavor to accomplish in Europe a result comparable to that which was achieved by the Four-Power Pact in the Far East. We welcome the suggestion of President Harding in his message to Congress on December 8, when, in referring to that agreement, he said: 'It might be made a model for like assurances wherever in the world any common interests are concerned. . . . We believe in the value of conferences and consultation, in the effectiveness of leaders of nations looking each other in the face.'

THE NEED FOR UNSELFISHNESS IN AMERICA

"In calling such a conference we believe that the United States should make it known, as it did at the opening session of the Conference on the Limitation of Armament, that we are ready to make, in common with other nations, whatever concessions, financial or otherwise, may be necessary to bring about an ordered international life. We are convinced that a sacrificial spirit on our part would evoke a willingness in other nations also to make the adjustments that may be needed. Our plans for reconstruction should include not only our allies but our former enemies. Bankers, economists and business men are telling us that only the re-establishment of normal economic conditions in Europe can bring prosperity to American agriculture and industry. What they declare necessary on the basis of enlightened self-interest, we declare necessary also from the standpoint of the Christian ideal of brotherhood. The well-being of our own country is in-separably bound up with an unselfish consideration of the well-being of the other nations of the world.

JUSTICE IN THE NEAR EAST

"Third: We believe that our Government will not be true to its ideals unless it records a definite protest against any settlement of the Near Eastern question on a basis of expediency or commercial advantage, and without some amends for tragic wrongs which have resulted in the persecution and practical destruction of the Armenian people, and the confiscation of their property. For the good of all nations, wrong must be righted, or a Nemesis is sure to follow. We would urge that in any further conference on Near East problems our Government should give full power to its delegates in all matters in which the rights of humanity are at stake and share with the Allied Powers the responsibility for reaching conclusions based upon righteousness and justice. If the Lausanne Conference is not renewed, we believe that our Government should co-operate and, if necessary, take the initiative in the appointment of an international commission which would deal with the whole subject of the refugee and orphan problem in the Near East, and that it should offer to bear its share in providing whatever may be necessary financially to establish these people in some place of safety and opportunity.

THE DUTY OF THE CHURCHES

"We call upon the membership of the Churches throughout the country to make a united appeal in behalf of this program of international co-operation, to make known their attitude to the President and their representatives in Congress, and to assure the Administration of their aid in developing a strong public opinion in its support. We especially urge Christian people everywhere to approach these momentous issues on their merits, irrespective of all partisan considerations. We make this plea on the highest moral and religious ground, believing that beneath all these problems lies the need of a great spiritual awakening and a deeper conviction that Christian principles are as binding upon national as upon personal conduct."

CONCRETE SUGGESTIONS ON WHAT TO DO

The following suggestions are offered concerning practical steps, which may be taken in every community in securing the adoption of the international policy outlined in the foregoing declaration:

WHAT MINISTERS CAN DO

1. In the regular services of public worship preach upon the Christian ideal for international life and the responsibility of America in the present crisis to play its full part in co-operation with other nations in securing a better international life. The sanctions of religious faith and of moral idealism must be brought strongly to the support of the policy of American co-operation.

2. Organize special public meetings or open forums for a discussion of America's international policy and the necessity for her bearing her share of the present burden of the world.

3. Secure from the congregation or groups within the congregation such as men's clubs and Bible classes vigorous resolutions protesting against a policy of aloofness on the part of America and urging a program of co-operation. Send such resolutions to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, and your representatives in Congress. In this way the impression that the people of the United States are not yet ready for America to enter into the councils of the nations can be effectively dissipated.

4. Circulate literature upon Christian international ideals, the necessity of getting rid of war, and the duty of America to join in world co-operation. Copies of this pamphlet and of other literature for general distribution can be had at cost upon request.

5. Organize special classes for the study and discussion of the meaning of Christianity for our present international problems, using either "The Christian Crusade for a Warless World," published by the Federal Council's Commission on International Justice and Good-will, or other literature.

WHAT FEDERATIONS OF CHURCHES OR MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATIONS MAY DO

1. Confer with Chambers of Commerce, Boards of Trade, Farmers' Organizations, and Labor Organizations, concerning the possibility of a united program in the community among all the forces which are interested in securing fuller co-operation on the part of America.

2. Organize united mass meetings on the part of the churches to voice the moral conviction of the need for American co-operation in securing world peace. In most instances speakers can be secured in the community. If outside speakers are necessary, write to the Church Peace Union, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City, or the Federal Council's Commission on International Justice and Good-will, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City.

3. Organize a special committee, wherever one does not already exist, on International Justice and Good-will, or some similar subject, representing all the churches for the purpose of promoting persistently their activity in behalf of world peace.

4. Keep in touch with the Federal Council's Commission on International Justice and Good-will, and the Church Peace Union, so that there may be a concerted movement throughout the country.

WHAT INDIVIDUAL CHRISTIANS CAN DO

1. Accept your personal responsibility for doing all in your power to develop public opinion upon the necessity for America playing its full part in international life. Talk about the question and discuss it on every possible occasion.

2. Write to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, and your representatives in Congress urging them to adopt a program of full international co-operation. Such personal letters of a thoughtful character are often much more effective than formal resolutions.

3. Write short letters to the editor of your local newspaper expressing your judgment on international co-operation.

4. Encourage the formation of study groups on international questions in your church, or in other organizations with which you are connected.

COMMISSION ON INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE AND GOOD-WILL FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA

105 East 22d Street, New York City

(Continued from page 303)

The first thing done in that department was to distinguish between two functions, that of executive control and that of teaching and inspection. A department inspector was appointed to be the foreman's assistant. By means of this simple and logical division of functions standards began to emerge, wastes to be eliminated, the quality of the work to be improved.

In the spirit of engineers, management, I found, was coming to see that one of the chief problems of factory operation was waste. Waste was found to exist variously: in antiquated equipment; in confused routing; in planlessness; in poor co-ordination of departments; in insufficiency or wrongly trained operatives; in depressing conditions of work; in lack of industrial stimulus; in low morale, and so on.

The layman may, indeed, suspect that these wastes exist, but he can have no real conception of the extent to which they are present or the degree to which they are responsible for high costs, both human and financial, until he has suffered them or helped to perpetrate them in a factory. I have seen workers walk miles in the aggregate to carry material from one machine to another simply because the machines were poorly placed and no one had devised a mechanical conveyance. I have seen workers incessantly stooping where the placing of their machines a few inches higher would have saved many foot-pounds of their energy. I have seen a whole department idle for half an hour to an hour (impatient piece workers at that) simply because the foreman of another department had failed to get out his work. I have seen conveyor machines jammed up and men waiting for a chance to move their material.

I am strongly of the opinion that industry will not flourish in a fine human way under any system, capitalistic or otherwise, until the spirit of true scientific management permeates the factories. I believe this because of what is valuable in science as science. Just as soon as a manager begins to take his job with scientific seriousness his entire attitude and outlook change. He becomes a searcher into causes. When there is dissatisfaction he does not simply hit the nearest head. He develops a pride in understanding the interplay of all the forces in his factory. It is not long before he begins to see his problem as a whole, and he studies his human material as seriously and considerately as he studies his machines.

One good hope of American industry to-day lies, I believe, in the men who are taking this broader efficiency attitude. In many cases they are managers; in many cases they are a new type of engineer—the type of engineer who can envisage his problem as not purely one of mechanics. At the best, the problem of manufacturing is no child's play. The outsider—as I was—is apt to minimize the difficulties of running a factory. "Good will and less greediness"—that is the ordinary man's recipe for industrial health. But a factory is a most exceedingly complex institution, and the most complex and unpredictable part of it is the working force—from hand laborer to top manager. How to organize this highly complex thing so that it will not only operate without friction, but with effectiveness and lack of waste—is not a problem that can be solved over a friendly luncheon and a cigar.

What is hopeful, therefore, is the fact that a new type of manager and a new type of engineer is arising. The "efficiency" problem has emerged from its first stage, when with stop-watch concealed in a pad of papers, it stood surreptitiously taking count of the workers. It has advanced to its second stage where it frankly takes the worker into its confidence, helps to ease his work, and in the augmentation of its own profits assists him in turn to greater rewards.

Scientific management in its beginnings was unfortunate in that it started with too little thought of the suspicious attitudes of foremen and men. It had too large a faith in logic and the stop-watch and too little knowledge of psychology. But to condemn the application of intelligence to organization because man is only in small part a creature of reason and in large part a creature of prejudiced habit would be the sheerest obscurantism.

As a matter of fact, the introduction of scientific management will, it seems to me, tend to diminish the more purely commercial motives in industry. The exercise of intelligence has this peculiar quality; it grows on what it feeds upon. The manager who becomes interested in studying his men and machinery finds the task more fascinating the more he studies. In the end he becomes so absorbed in it that it displaces the dominant commercial interest. I have heard managers say in effect: "If it weren't for this constant butting in of the financial end we could make something out of this factory." There develops, in short, a professional pride in good management, like the pride of a good teacher in good teaching or a good physician in the skilful application of his art of medicine.

Of course, I am now talking of really scientific management. I remember one instance of pseudo-scientific management. One of the executives had become very much excited about the apparent injustice of different rates of pay in one of the departments. His excitement did him justice; but his intelligence was apparently not the equal of his moral sense. He had a man go in with a stop-watch and take a time-study. On the basis of that single time-study he dashed out a complete scheme of piece rates which he recommended to the management. Fortunately, the matter hung fire in the office of a higher executive, and so far as I know nothing came of it. But the folly of it was obvious. To attempt to settle wage differentials by a hasty single study was simply to invite disaster. What happens in such cases, of course, is that the hasty study is found to be inaccurate, piece rates have later to be readjusted, and the workers are up in arms.

I think that the public does not sufficiently realize how much of the strife in industry is due not at all to an inherent conflict of capital and labor, but rather to the unintelligence of executives, from foremen to managers. The problem of capital and labor is a deep and perplexing one; yet I am not so sure but that the problem of ill-advised and short-sighted management is the more immediately and continuously irritating one. The worker has his undercurrent of feeling about the exploitation of capital. But he has a very raging uppercurrent of feeling about the petty annoyances and acts of injustice, the brusque misjudgments, the delays and confusions that reduce his wage, the apparent lack of consideration for him as a human being or as a craftsman. Also, he has a very live and contemptuous awareness of the managerial stupidity of his superiors—often, it must be confessed, when they are not stupid at all.

Two recent incidents emphasize the fundamental importance of this new efficiency attitude. It is significant that in the most radical labor movement on record—Russian Sovietism—one of the strongest pronouncements made by its leader, Lenin, was for the introduction of efficiency methods in the

(Continued on page 315)

Prerequisites of Union

By Rev. Arthur J. Brown, D.D., LL.D.

Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions

DU E consideration of Church Union requires something more than the votes of ecclesiastical bodies. Thinking must be done upon weighty underlying questions. What is the Church? What is the place of a creed? Is uniformity necessary or desirable? Are differences fundamental? What should be our attitude toward fellow Christians who differ with us? What and where are the boundaries of union? These and other questions at once arise. Some have been fully discussed elsewhere. We can deal, within the limits of an article, with only a few of the varied points which affect the main issue.

We should consider how far present statements of doctrine are philosophical rather than Scriptural. Most theologians have adopted philosophical systems and have used their philosophy in working out their theology. That Pope Pius X had no misgivings on the subject was shown in his open declaration: "We will and ordain that scholastic philosophy be made the basis of the sacred sciences." Protestant systems of theology have also been affected by the philosophical theories that were current when they were framed, and almost every new philosophy issues sooner or later in a readjusted theology. Dr. Francis L. Patton said at Princeton Seminary "that the emphasis of contemporary debate is placed upon questions that are in their nature philosophical and historical. . . . These inquiries again are in many cases conditioned by the theory of the universe which constitutes the philosophical presupposition of those who enter upon historical investigations."

Other men have minds that work with logical precision. They take a fact and deduce a brood of inferences from it. This is natural, and an unthinking person who accepts a principle may properly be reminded of the destination to which it points.

The trouble is that the theologian who classifies truth by his philosophy is apt to insist that the resultant system is exclusively Scriptural, and that the logician is prone to demand that we shall accept not only his original fact, but all his personal deductions from it. But all men are not philosophers or logicians. It is an established principle that one is not to be held responsible for all the inferences which another draws from his position. I may not understand how a man can interpret the Bible in a certain way and believe in its inspiration. But if he is loyal to Christ and the revealed Word of God as he reads it, he has as clear a right as I have to freedom of interpretation. A denial of this right is certainly not Protestant.

We should distinguish also between truth and temperamental, racial and controversial expression of it. Men always have differed, do now differ, and probably always will differ as to the relative prominence which should be given to God's sovereignty and man's freedom in doctrinal systems, whether baptism should be by sprinkling or by immersion, whether a liberal or a conservative construction should be placed upon creeds. Such differences are not as exclusively intellectual or Scriptural as many people imagine. The exponents of these respective positions are intelligent, conscientious and earnestly desirous of knowing the will of God. As a rule, attitude is determined, not by a dispassionate weighing of relative arguments, but by heredity or environment or disposition. The lines of cleavage between the evangelical liberal and the conservative, the churchman and the independent, the man who loves forms and liturgies and the one who wants only the plainest service are psychological as well as theological and run deeply into human nature. It is vain to imagine that one party will ever convert the other to its views, or that a communion can be permanently limited to any one of these parties. Such differences will exist among men to the end of time. If Christians are to concentrate their thought upon them, religion will degenerate into sectarianism. There will be controversies and irritations which will make the judicious grieve, which will impair the harmony and efficiency of the Church, and bring reproach upon the name of Christian. Denominational uniformity is sought at bitter cost when it separates Christians into rival camps. Unity in essentials and liberty in non-essentials are far better than a slavery to non-essentials which destroys the true oneness of believers.

We are far from believing that all differences can be attributed to temperament or environment; but more can be attributed to them than is commonly supposed. One age may learn more of God than another age and make a larger appropriation of His revelation, just as certain promises mean more to a Christian in sorrow than to one in happiness. There are some tragic crises that make men instinctively turn to the imprecatory Psalms and demand a theology which clothes the truth in a coat of mail against the enemies of the Church. There are other experiences which send men to the Gospel by St. John and lead to a theology which irradiates life with the sunshine of divine love. Some men conceive Christianity in terms of legal procedure: God is a judge, man a criminal, Satan the prosecuting attorney, Christ the counsel for the defense. Others interpret Christianity in terms of the family: God is the father, Christ the elder brother, all men sons. Some interpret Christianity in terms of doctrine and others in terms of life. In like manner, there are those who view religion as an intellectual system scientifically classified, and those who care nothing for an orderly arrangement of dogmas, but who deem religion as an experience to be realized. The latter may be hopelessly confused theologically, but they may know their Lord and love Him with all their hearts. The philosopher and the child, the logician and the emotionalist, the sacerdotalist and the puritan, the mystic and the disciplinarian, the sanguine and the phlegmatic, the artistic and the practical, the optimist and the pessimist, the ritualist and the Quaker—all are with us and we would not willingly part with any of them.

It is impossible to make up a church of any one of these types alone. Every communion has them all. Indeed, there are many Christians who unite two or more of these types in their own persons. Who of us does not blend some of them in ordinary experience, or find that the varying emergencies of life bring first one and then another into dominance? One of the strongest arguments for solidarity of ecclesiastical organization has been written by a Congregationalist, and one of the strongest arguments for the independence of the congregation has come from a Presbyterian. The former was discussing a national situation which could not be handled by separate groups of Christians, and the latter had in mind questions of scholarship which he believed should not be determined by ecclesiastical authority. The Rev. R. C. Gillie reminds us of the story of Cardinal John Henry Newman's meeting an old friend, a clergyman of the Church of England, after a lapse of many years. In the crowded assembly, the long estrangement was somehow obliterated. The souls of the two friends leapt to each other, and they drew aside into an alcove for a brief conversation. The clergyman ventured to say: "Cardinal, why did you leave us? We never could understand." The answer came after a moment's pause: "Because I desired a horizon to my theology." "That," adds Mr. Gillie, "I suppose marks the dividing line. Some of us are content if we are sure of the center; others are miserable unless the whole circumference is clear."

Men who have no imagination are prone to a hard liberalism of interpretation. I heard a well-known evangelist solemnly assert that the passage in Isaiah, "the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose," means that the desert of Sahara will one day be covered with roses, and that to doubt it was to doubt the Scriptures. Another clergyman, who was too skilful a dialectician to be prudently argued with, held that the vowel points in the Hebrew text had been placed there by inspiration of God and were an integral part of the inerrant Word which it was profanation to challenge. A theological professor of wide repute was wont to advise his students never to concede that there were errors even of translation or transmission in the sacred text, because if one once admitted any error whatever there was no logical stopping place until the whole Bible was gone. As I listened to his eloquent lectures I felt almost afraid to remove my overcoat in public lest, if I once began to undress, I might not be able to stop until I was naked and ashamed. Men of that type are invariably opposed to union with anybody who does not speak their shibboleth.

The dogmatism of partial knowledge, of fallible human opinion! How grievously Christianity has suffered from it! There are persons who respect no judgment but their own, who can conceive of no other interpretation of facts, and who relegate those who differ with them to the limbo of the heretical or unsaved. An English clergyman who was visiting a certain Christian worker heard an animated account of what was described as a direct interposition of Providence which prevented a loss of life that would have inevitably befallen an impenitent man. When he mildly questioned whether this was necessarily the correct providential interpretation, his host fell upon his knees and prayed that the clergyman might be reconciled to his Master. This clergyman would sympathize with the priest in charge of a Greek church in New Jersey, who was bitterly assailed by a Russian newspaper of Jersey City for "making void the Orthodox faith because he shaved himself."

Our Lord's caution about censorious judgments has far-reaching applications. Men who are overstrict in some things are often lax in others. The most vehement champion of total abstinence from liquors that I have ever known smoked a dozen cigars and drank seventeen cups of tea during an average day; and another man, who bitterly denounced the heresy of the dual authorship of Isaiah, was a director in a corporation whose business methods, when exposed, were arraigned as unchristian if not criminal. "I have noticed," remarked the epigrammatic Dr. William C. Gray, "that persons who have boiler iron over some of their convictions usually have lattice work over others." One is reminded of the man of whom it was said that he

"Compounds for sins he is inclined to
By damning those he has no mind to."

We need not conclude that such men are greater sinners than some of us who criticise them. Their moral judgments are clear on the things which they believe to be wrong, and if they are not clear on other things it is because they do not realize their moral implications—because they have partial knowledge or distorted spiritual vision. What is needed is the Christian education of the whole man, the recognition of the Bible's legitimate application to the entire range of human thought and activity; a conception of religion, not as a searchlight that sends only a narrow shaft of light into enveloping darkness, but as a sun that dispels all darkness and illuminates all truths and duties.

It may be difficult for us to realize to what an extent the white man has stated Christianity in terms of his racial characteristics. Perhaps this is one reason why Asiatics so often call it "the foreigner's religion." A creed is what a church believes. Whether it is better to have a written creed and play fast and loose with it, as some Presbyterians do, or an unwritten creed and stick to it, as some Baptists do, are questions that I cannot now discuss. Personally, I prefer a creed reasonably interpreted and then consistently adhered to. But creeds are deductions from the Bible, and not the Bible itself. Their truths are there, but the creed is man's arrangement of them. The arrangement will therefore be influenced by the environment of the men who make it, their temperament, their religious experience, and the errors which are most prevalent at the time and against which they wish to testify. Grant that their object is to state eternal and universal truth in a way that will be helpful in every other land and every succeeding age. No creed has ever yet been written by men whose own descendants now regard as adequate. Some communions have formulated their alterations in official revisions, and others have allowed the old creed to stand and sanctioned or acquiesced in a present-day interpretation of it. But whether the changes have been written down and ecclesiastically adopted or not, every intelligent person knows that they have been made. The Westminster divines, engaged in a terrific struggle with a powerful Roman Catholic hierarchy, whose Pope claimed to be the vice-regent of God upon earth and denied salvation to those who did not submit to his rule, naturally took the truths of Holy Scripture which contravene that assertion and built them into an impregnable fortification against the assaults of Rome. In doing so they made a contribution of immense value to the Christian thought of the world. It is a document of heroic proportions and nobly declares undying truths. The Presbyterian Church itself, however, found that some of the statements of the Westminster Confession of Faith were so misunderstood in an age which is not thinking of Roman pretensions that the Church deemed it necessary to issue. in 1902, a "Brief Statement of the Reformed Faith," in order to give a summary of its position in terms that could be comprehended more easily by the modern mind. If such a restatement of an English creed was needed by American Presbyterians who were the descendants of the Westminster divines, how much more is some such restatement needed for the Christians of Asia who are radically different in race, temperament, environment and outlook?

And this is simply an illustration of what is true of most of the historic creeds. They were formed in times of controversy, or constructed to serve the religious needs of the age which produced them, and to bring into clearest possible relief the doctrines which prevailing heresies denied or obscured. When one of those creeds is translated in Asia, what is the result? The East Indian Christian feels that it does not present Scriptural truth in the form best adapted to a people whose mental and spiritual attitudes are subconsciously influenced by centuries of polytheism and pantheism. The Chinese Christian does not find exactly what he wants for a nation which is characterized in every fiber of its warp and woof by agnostic materialism and ancestral worship. The Oriental Christian knows little and cares less about our Western controversies; but he has others of his own which are very real and vital to him. He approaches Christ from another starting point, and is obliged to testify against different errors.

The missionary sometimes meets an intelligent native, who says in substance: "I cannot accept your creed, but I gladly accept your Christ." Very well, let him accept our Christ, and then work out his own creed from his study and experience of Christ and with a view to the exigencies of his own situation. He will probably come out not so far from us as we imagine, though he may arrive by a different road. Perhaps in his journey he will discover some truth which we knew but had not seen in its right proportion or perspective.

At any rate, what right have we of the West to take a religion that originated in Asia, whose Scriptures were written in an Asiatic language, which was incarnated in One who spent his whole earthly life in Asia, whose symbols and imagery are Asiatic—what right, I say, has the Western white man to take such an Asiatic religion, express it in terms of his own alien thinking, and then carry it back to Asia and demand that Asiatics shall accept his particular version of it and none other? We may well say with the Bishop of Manchester that "if Christianity can only flourish on these terms it can never become the faith of the world."

Is it said that we have learned something of the meaning of Christ and the Bible which we ought not to withhold from our Asiatic brethren, that we should not ask them to start at the beginning as we did and to acquire by hard experience what we can now teach them? Of course not. Let us tell them everything we know, give them the benefit of everything we have learned. But it is one thing to tell them, and quite another to insist that we are infallible guides, that we have found out all there is to know, and that they must cast their religious experiences in our foreign moulds. "There is," says Bishop Gore of Oxford, "a very specific Anglican color about our home religion which we ought to have no desire to perpetuate in India. An Englishman, wherever he goes, is apt to identify his religion with his memories of home. We ought to identify our religion with the Christ of all nations. What we should desire is to see a native Church arise with a native episcopate and a native spirit."

Another necessary distinction is between partial and complete views of truth. Here is the tap-root of sectarianism. Truth is a sphere, and in looking upon it man sees only one side at a time. One group of men are led by inclination or special circumstances to see a given part of the truth. Another group are led to see another part. Both are right in what they see and wrong only in what they ignore. They cannot be blamed for seeing only one side of a sphere at a time or for dwelling upon those aspects of Christian teaching which meet their particular needs. Sectarianism develops when each arraigns the other and erects its denominational fences in such a way as to exclude or unchurch the other. The Presbyterian General Assembly of 1913 declared: "It is earnestly to be desired that Christians everywhere should cultivate a broader horizon and cherish larger views. One of the great English Prime Ministers, when seeking to persuade certain of his associates to adopt the wide policies which he advocated, said to them: 'Gentlemen, you should study larger maps.' The need of the day in all the churches is a realization of the obligations and opportunities of the twentieth century for bringing the Christian churches of common origin, common faith and common life so close together that, forgetting their differences, they will work unitedly for the mental, moral and spiritual uplift of all the people."

We should be fair enough to recognize that men who study the Bible as earnestly as we do, and who consecrate their lives to the service of Christ quite as loyally, are not necessarily wrong because they do not share some of our opinions. Ways of thinking and working in which they have found peace and efficiency cannot be wholly bad. If separately organized, each party is prone to go to an extreme, distorting a segment of truth by overemphasizing it and failing to balance it by its complementary segments. Denominationalism tends to partial and fragmentary views of Christianity, and hence to sectarianism. A united Church would be a Catholic Church in the true sense, bringing the believer of one type into contact with his fellow Christians of a different type, presenting the truth in its rounded perfection, and preaching the whole Gospel to a needy world.

Emphasis should be laid upon the statement that unity does not involve compromise of essential truth or weakening of the evangelical message. I have no sympathy with efforts to attain unity by watering down truth or by eliminating any part of it which a rationalist finds troublesome. I know that there are reverent men who are earnestly trying to serve God and their fellow men without recognizing the redemptive work of Christ. The personal friendship of some of these men is highly prized. But in matters of the Church the line should be clearly drawn between those who believe in a supernatural religion and those who do not; between those who believe that the Bible is the Word of God and those who regard it as merely a human book; between those who worship Christ as the divine Saviour of man and those who see in Him only the best man that ever lived. These cleavages are too wide and too deep for any possible bridging. I am discussing the unity of those who hold what is popularly termed the evangelical faith, and nothing that I have said should be interpreted as implying any disposition to go beyond it. Unity has its limitations. So far from endangering truth, the union of evangelical Christians would guard it more securely. The imperious question of this age is, not whether one denomination can make out a better case than another, but whether we have a Gospel that "is the power of God unto salvation." Urgent is the need that all who believe that we have such a Gospel should get together against those who doubt or deny that we have such a message to the world.

For myself, if men believe the Bible to be the Word of God, the only infallible rule of faith and practise; if they believe not only in the divinity but the deity of Christ; if they accept Him as Lord and Saviour; and if they seek to apply His Gospel to every phase of life—individual, social, business, national and international, then I would like to see those men banded together for God in organic church union, and meantime I propose to work with them in co-operation, or federation, or union institutions, or any other relationship that is practicable, whether or not I agree with them on subsidiary questions. A united Church would form a channel for divine grace that could save the world. A Church split as now into many unrelated denominations is not being, and so far as we can see will not be, so used of God.

One of the inscrutable mysteries of our time is that when the Church of God finds itself face to face with all the united powers of the world, the flesh and the devil, when the providential pointings to unity are so clear, when anyone should be able to see that a crippling hindrance to the victory of Christianity lies in the fact that the Church is a house divided against itself—it is, I say, an amazingly inscrutable mystery that good men, devout men, who honestly believe that they are doing God service, try to obstruct every effort of the followers of Christ to combine against the common enemy.

It is indispensable to that unity for which our Lord prayed that we should recognize the full-orbed nature of truth, and that we should welcome all contributions to it. We should have a noble discontent for partial and segmentary ideas of Christ. We cannot comprehend all that He is. The human mind is limited. But we can be broad enough in our outlook and catholic enough in our sympathies to be grateful for what others have found. Is there any Christian who is prepared to say that his particular communion is an adequate expression of the mind of Christ and of the teaching of the Word of God? As a Presbyterian, I am sorry for my fellow member who imagines that our Church has compassed the entire area of the spiritual realm and made for every section of it the most complete map that ever can be prepared. Lest that statement may give readers of other communions too much comfort, let me add that if I thought that one of theirs was any better I would leave my own and seek admission to it. The more I experience of Jesus Christ and the wider my knowledge becomes of His followers in various lands, the more deeply do I realize that all my knowledge of Him is but a groping; that Christ is larger and richer than anything that I have ever been able to understand regarding Him. A Christ for all men and for all time is not likely to be comprehended by any particular province or decade.

"In Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." What does that mean? Are we able even to apprehend what it means? I doubt whether we shall ever know all that Christ is until we can blend the interpretation of Europeans and Americans with that of the self-forgetting loyalty of the Japanese, the practical sense of the Chinese, the profound mysticism of the East Indian, the childlike emotionalism of the African, and the swift intuition of the Korean. The Asiatic, when once regenerated and guided by the Spirit of God, may be more likely to interpret the real meaning of the Bible and of Christ than we who belong to a different race, for he brings an oriental mind and point of view to the interpretation of an oriental Book. We hear much about the undeveloped resources of soil and electricity and mineral deposits, but the vastest undeveloped resources in the universe to-day are the uncharted and unsounded infinities in the character and mission of our Lord. Verily,

"Our little systems have their day;
They have their day and cease to be;

They are but broken lights of thee,
And thou, O Lord, art more than they."

Something within us that is surely not ignoble calls for a larger view than our now holden eyes can take. We are not content with what we can clearly see and accurately measure. We long for the vision of the unexplored realm beyond. With Emerson, our aspiring souls say, "We love nothing that ends." "Now we see in a mirror darkly"—the dim, blurred reflection from the polished metal of antiquity. When we can rise above the cloudy level of acrimonious debates about definitions and stand upon the sunlit heights where perfect love reigns we shall find, if I may adapt a noble phrase of Professor James, "an eternal unanimity which has neither birthday nor native land. Perpetually telling of the unity of man with God, our speech antedates language and our message does not grow old."

The Weekly Sermon

(Continued from page 302)

done to continue conferences and to continue all the means which may be legitimate at present to enable us to get to know one another better so that we may look forward to the time when we shall realize our common Christianity, when we shall understand that we are one in the faith in Christ Jesus, and when we shall recognize, therefore, that on that basis of unity—unity of faith, of spirit, which already exists—we ought to be able to build up a United Church in a way that shall accept and claim the adherence, and not merely the adherence, but the devoted enthusiasm of those who at present are divided from one another.

---

Mr. Henry Israel, formerly the editor of the Y. M. C. A. journal, "Rural Manhood," and one of the leading rural workers of the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A., has accepted the executive secretaryship of the American Country Life Association. Mr. Israel began his new duties on February 1. His office will be in New York City. THE CHRISTIAN WORK extends to the Association its congratulations upon the selection of so capable a man, and to Mr. Israel its very best wishes as he assumes this position of strategic importance and opportunity.

---

INTRODUCTION TO RURAL SOCIOLOGY

By PAUL L. VOGT. D. Appleton and Company. 457 pages.

Professor Vogt's "Introduction to Rural Sociology" was the first adequate and satisfactory attempt to write sociology from the point of view of rural life. In his revision Professor Vogt has again laid the Country Life Movement under obligations to him. He has included some additional data; has made use of the last census figures, which have simply reinforced his conclusions. It is perhaps unfortunate that the bibliography was not expanded to include the books that have been issued since 1917, but this is a minor criticism.

In Praise of Heresy

By Charles Prosper Fagnani

Professor of Hebrew, Union Theological Seminary

IT is by heresy that the world lives and moves and has its being.

Any live thing must be continually guilty of heresy.

This is true in politics, economics, religion, science, every department of life.

The Revolution of '76 was a heresy, so was the Abolition of Slavery, the election of Senators by popular vote, the Eighteenth Amendment.

Christianity, in its beginning, was a heresy; so was Protestantism in its inception; so was the Anglican Church.

"Time makes ancient good uncouth." Even that ancient good, in the day of its emergence, was a heresy. In the theological world heresy is a departure from the accepted creed. But that creed itself was a departure in its day.

The "fundamentalists" are fond of what they call "contending earnestly" for the faith "once for all delivered to the Saints." (See Jude 3.)

And they guilelessly suppose that the "faith" referred to is identical with some creed they know—the "Apostles' Creed, or the Thirty-nine Articles, or the Westminster Confession of Faith.

And their idea of contending for it is to excommunicate everyone who dissents therefrom in whole or part. Now the dissenter in question is an unusual person, in that he thinks about the creed which the majority merely repeat as a routine exercise, and who in his thinking discovers wherein the same is more or less out of date.

Ideally, the organization to which he belongs should take toward him and his views the attitude of watchful waiting, advised by Gamaliel when he said, "Take heed as touching these men what ye are about to do. If this counsel or this work be of men, it will be overthrown, but if it be of God, ye will not be able to overthrow them, lest haply ye be found even to be fighting against God."

But the trouble is that such a quiet, confident attitude can come only from faith, faith in God, faith in right, faith in the judgment of time.

Whereas, organization men, office-bearers, adherents of a system, are almost invariably actuated by fear, fear for their vested interests (the ever-present economic factor), fear for the maintenance of the status quo, fear of loss of prestige, fear of the popularity of the innovator, fear of having to admit, "He (the heretic) must increase, but we must decrease."

And so almost without exception they react as the Pharisees did to the man born blind, who seemed to display symptoms of heresy, "Thou was altogether born in sins, and dost thou teach us, and they cast him out" (excommunicated him).

Professional teachers with a reputation for learning to maintain will never admit that they need to be taught; that their teaching required revision or modification; that their creed, if it is to live, must be subject to constant change or cease to be adapted to the growing needs of the day.

Being fundamentally mistaken, then, in the belief that a "deposit" of truth can be delivered once for all to be transmitted intact and unchanged to succeeding generations, it is no wonder that the official conservators of doctrine are equally mistaken in the demand that they make upon the heretic, to wit, that he is in honor bound to get out of the Church if he no longer believes in its creed.

It is a sad commentary upon the mental processes of the average man that this insistence upon the severance by the offender of his connection with his Church should be so generally looked upon as the honorable and proper and only thing for him to do, even by those who may have sympathy with his views.

Now a little reflection ought to show that an honorable man, a loyal man, one who really cares for the Church, instead of resigning and withdrawing and shirking responsibility, is conscientiously bound to remain in and to bring as many of his brethren as possible around to his way of thinking.

Yes, it is his bounden duty to stand his ground and proclaim the truth as he sees it. He must stanchly refuse to withdraw of his own accord, no matter how much averse he may personally feel, to mere notoriety and strife and contention.

His attitude, if he is sincere and solicitous for what he believes to be the truth, must needs be that of Paul, who, when urged "to come forth and go in peace," replied, "They have beaten us publicly uncondemned, men that are Romans, and have cast us into prison, and do they now cast us out privily? Nay, verily, but let them come themselves and bring us out."

The responsibility for cutting off a living member should rest with organization, not the individual.

Of course, there is nothing wrong in creeds per se. Creeds can be splendid things, indispensable things, provided they are pulsating with life, growing, developing, adapting themselves progressively to the needs of the day. But a creed dug out of the tomb of Tutankhamen, where it has reposed undisturbed for millenniums, may be interesting historically and archeologically, but it can hardly be suited to the needs of the twentieth century. Must a creed needs be ancient, venerable, archaic, in order to be good?

Are we not fully as competent to make and modify our creeds as any of our forbears?

Wherein we find ourselves differing from them, is it not honest and advisable to say so openly for the benefit of the rising generations, rather than to treat inherited beliefs as sacrosanct because they are old, and keep repeating them as a form of sound words, chiefly sound?

The Church was born in and of heresy; by heresy it has grown; without heresy it must die.

Some day perhaps the Church may learn to acclaim its heretics before they are too dead to appreciate it.

Is there not a tragic lesson in the inscription on a famous statue in Rome, "Raised to Giordano Bruno by the generation whom he foresaw."

International Sunday-School Lesson

March 18, 1923

Jesus Crucified

LUKE 23:33-46.

"He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed"—Isa. 53:5.

IN the center of the market-place of every medieval town stood a stone cross. Around it crowded the chaffering traders; from its base the civic authorities proclaimed their decrees; here the wandering friar preached the Word. It was the heart of the community life." In the center of Christian history stands the cross of Christ. All human activities and enterprises for the last two thousand years have been carried on under its shadow. It is the heart of the Gospel.

Jesus himself put it there. He made the central ordinance of His church a supper where "Jesus Christ was openly set forth crucified." At every observance of the feast His followers "proclaim the Lord's death till He come."

In the name of a crucified Redeemer a little handful of inspired leaders went forth to conquer the world. Their achievement is the romance of all history. With no influence, no arms, no learning, no display of force, determined to know nothing but Christ and Him crucified, they shook the mightiest of empires until it yielded and they had set the cross in the heart of the Roman world.

Through all the Christian centuries the cross has been exalted. It has become the most universal and most sacred of all symbols. Not only the diadems of princes, the banners of empires, the ground plan of cathedrals, but even the doors of our houses remind us in their paneling of the great sacrifice.

This is plain history. What are we to make of it? Surely never had grim and forbidding fact so marvelous a transformation. The founder of our religion was executed as a criminal by the most cruel and revolting death known to His world, a doom so terrible that it was forbidden for Romans and reserved for slaves and foreigners. One would naturally expect His followers to be silent about such a fact. Yet millions join in singing

"In the cross of Christ I glory, Towering o'er the wrecks of time."

No wonder a cultured Chinaman expressed his amazement that Christians tell with exultation the story of their Lord's disgraceful death.

Moreover, we are reminded that the chief actors in the tragedy had not the remotest suspicion that it had any connection with religion. Both to Jew and Roman sacrifices were familiar. But the death of Jesus conveyed to them no hint of a sacrifice. There was no priest, no altar, no ritual. Caiaphas and Pilate had no thought of making an offering to the unseen Powers. They were simply putting out of the way a condemned criminal. Yet on that death has been built up the greatest of world religions. About it have grown profound systems of thought filling libraries with their volumes. The course of human history has been diverted by this cross set up in the midst of its channel. And still "that scaffold sways the future." Well may we ask ourselves anew, What is the meaning of the cross?

Seeking to answer this inquiry let us divide it into four questions: What did the cross mean to Jesus? What did it mean to the early disciples? What has it meant through the centuries? What does it mean to-day?

I. What did the cross mean to Jesus?

He gave no interpretation while "He hung and suffered there." During those five hours of agony His silence was broken by only seven brief sentences. "He was oppressed, yet when He was afflicted He opened not His mouth." His message had been given. There was nothing left but to bear witness to it by death. His silent suffering is more eloquent than any words.

But during His previous ministry Jesus had often spoken of His approaching death and its meaning. From the very beginning it seems ever to have been in the background of His thought. At the baptism He accepted the vocation of the Servant of the Lord whose tragic yet glorious destiny the prophet had foretold. The temptation offered Him the choice between the narrow path of sacrifice and the broad and easy way of public favor, and He chose the narrow path with no illusions about its inevitable end. He told His disciples that the day was coming when the bridegroom would be taken away from them. But after the confession of Peter at Cæsarea Philippi, "from that time began Jesus to show unto His disciples, that He must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed" (Matt. 16:21). Henceforth the necessity, the meaning and purpose of His death were prominent subjects in His teaching. Some of that teaching has been preserved for us. He tells them that He lays down His life as a shepherd who defends his flock; that He gives it as a ransom, that many who have forfeited their lives may obtain them again; that only as He is lifted up can He draw all men unto Him; that as a grain of corn must die in order to bear much fruit, so only by death can He win many. At the Last Supper He speaks of His body as broken for others, and calls the cup the symbol of the blood of a new covenant "shed for many for the remission of sins." The reference is to the sacrifice which ratified the covenant in the ancient days. The repeated references in the Acts and the Epistles to the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah indicate that Jesus tried to make his disciples understand that their Messiah must suffer. This teaching is summed up in the report of His conversation on the way to Emmaus—"Behooved it not the Christ to suffer these things, and to enter into his glory? And beginning from Moses and from all the prophets, he interpreted to them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself." Apparently Jesus interpreted the cross in the light of the prophecies of the suffering Servant of the Lord.

II. What did the cross mean to the early disciples?

The importance they attached to it is indicated by the space given to the Passion in the Gospels. As we read the familiar words, we are impressed by the restraint of their accounts. "And when they came unto the place which is called the skull, there they crucified him." It is hardly possible to state the fact in fewer words. There is no outcry of indignation or horror, no word of sympathy. The record is as colorless as a police report. The story is left to make its own impression. Yet how vividly, as well as simply and briefly, it is told. We see the three crosses, that of Jesus, like his throne at the judgment, separating the one on his right hand from the one on his left. There are the rulers, with the fierce triumph of gratified malice on their faces and cruel taunts on their lips, in which those that passed by imitated them. We see the brutal stare of the populace, the weeping women in the background, the hardened soldiers throwing dice for his clothing, with hands spotted with his spattered blood. When he cries, "I thirst" a soldier offers him sour wine on a sponge, in mockery, as if it were a royal cup, crying, "If thou art the King of the Jews, save thyself." No scene in history stands out more distinct in detail than the crucifixion.

Luke has preserved for us three words from the cross not recorded elsewhere. The first is the word of a priest, pleading for sinful men. "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." Ignorance is not a full excuse, otherwise no prayer for forgiveness was needed. But we are reminded of the saying that "he that knew not, and did things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes." If the legend be true that this prayer was uttered at the moment when the nails were driven through his hands, the agony calling forth a prayer instead of curses, how striking is this fulfilment of his precept, "Pray for them that despitefully use you." Truly "He made intercession for transgressors."

The second word recorded by Luke is the promise to the dying thief. It is the word of a King. The prayer for the forgiveness of his tormentors and enemies must have profoundly affected one who was enduring similar pangs. There is no greater exhibition of faith on record than his prayer, "Remember me when thou comest in thy kingdom." It voices his faith in Jesus and in the life after death. Others had seen Jesus raise the dead and had doubted. He saw Jesus put to death, and believed. How grateful to the heart of the Master must have been this tribute from his fellow sufferer! Gracious indeed is the royal answer, "To-day"—not in some indefinite future Messianic triumph, "To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise."

The third word which Luke is unwilling shall be forgotten is the final cry of faith. "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." It is the word of a son. If the soul of Jesus had been overwhelmed by a sense of the divine withdrawal, when he cried, "My God, why hast thou forsaken me?" the clouds have now been swept aside and he looks up into the Father's face in serene trust. He is sure of God, in the hour when earth fades from sight.

This, then, is the first thing that the cross meant for the early disciples, as seen in their accounts of the crucifixion. It was a display of those qualities of character in the Master which most inspired their reverence and devotion. "Hate could not quench his love, sin could not exhaust his mercy, defeat could not destroy his faith in God."

As we pass from the Gospels into the Epistles we are never out of sight of the cross. Whether it is Paul or Peter or John or the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews who speaks, all make the supreme point in their message the fact that "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures." Listen to a few notes from that great symphony: "God commendeth his own love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." "In whom we have our redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses." "Who his own self bare our sins in his body upon the tree." "The blood of Jesus his Son cleanseth us from all sin." "We behold . . . Jesus, because of the suffering of death crowned with glory and honor, that by the grace of God he should taste of death for every man." . . . "Worthy art thou to take the book, and to open the seals thereof; for thou wast slain, and didst purchase unto God with thy blood men of every tribe, and tongue, and people, and nation." The testimony of the New Testament is that the early disciples beheld upon the cross the Redeemer, "who was delivered up for our trespasses."

III. What has the cross meant through the centuries?

Accepting the fact that Christ died for our sins, men began inevitably to ask how the death of the Saviour accomplished our deliverance. The answers have been many and various. In the early centuries ponderous tomes were written to prove that Christ's death was a ransom paid to Satan. For generations the theory was accepted that the sufferings of Christ were so great that they were equivalent to the full penalty for the sins of all men in all time. Satisfaction thus being rendered, men who accept it go free. The governmental theory commanded the assent of our fathers. The majesty of the law demands that punishment be inflicted somewhere, in order to show God's hatred of sin. Christ endured the penalty and thus God is enabled to be "just, and the justifier of him that hath faith in Jesus." But it was pointed out that if punishment has been exacted, there is no forgiveness, and that government is not exalted but made futile when the innocent suffer for the guilty. Therefore Christ's death was merely a revelation of the love of God fitted to move the hearts of men to repentance. Over these and similar explanations the battle has been waged through the years and our libraries are filled with dusty volumes recording the conflict.

But if we ask what the cross has meant to the great mass of believers through these centuries we get not many answers but one. "While scholars were beating out the articles of the Creed of Chalcedon, all through the world, in serene unconsciousness, humble spirits were following Jesus in the realization of fatherhood and brotherhood." Men who were bitter opponents in theology alike found in the cross the source of their spiritual life. Independent of all theories, it has been the lever which has lifted the world. It has borne witness to the worth of a humanity for which even the Son of God would give his life. It has declared that prince and peasant alike have no standing before God except through the merit of a crucified Redeemer. Thus the great doctrines of grace have become the foundations for modern democratic civilization.

IV. What does the cross mean to-day?

Admitting its tremendous influence in the past, is there any place in the modern world for the cross of Christ? Is it not, like the medieval market-crosses, now only of interest to the antiquary and historian? Some modern cults declare that sin is only a figment of the imagination; others that it is a necessary stage of human progress. We are assured that the modern man is not troubled about his sins and their forgiveness and that the future religion will concern itself only with morality and social service.

But such voices are far less numerous and much less confident since the Great War. The world has been rudely awakened to the reality and the awfulness of sin, and has had an unparalleled example of the meaning of sacrifice.

The modern man looks out upon the world and finds everywhere the principle of vicarious sacrifice. Life is given for life. It is not poetic fancy but scientific fact that the mountain must give up its mineral wealth to make the fertile valley. The vegetable world is ever laying down its life in order that animals may live, and all the lower orders of nature are sacrificed that man may live and labor. In human society life is maintained and perfected only at the expense of other lives. The farmer, the explorer, the engineer, the physician, the teacher, the mother—all give time, strength, toil and hazard life itself in order that others may live. Have we not seen millions of young men the very flower of our civilization, offering their lives to make this a safer and a better world? How many of them literally laid down their lives for their fellow men! Moreover, he sees that as men grow better they recognize more clearly this obligation to serve others even at the cost of sacrifice. No man can really help another unless he enters into his life and shares its suffering.

When we come to the Life that is at the center of the universe, we are compelled to ask whether this principle, so universal, shall not still prevail. God is love. Love gives, love shares, love suffers. The Christian gospel declares that God does just what the best men are doing. He gives that which is choicest and best in order to redeem men from sin. Shall men be better than God? The cross is not only natural, but inevitable in a world of sinful men. It is the revelation of that unutterable love of God which stops at nothing in order to win back his erring children. Whatever may be the puzzling problems of philosophy and theology in the attempt to set down in intelligible terms all the mysteries of this supreme revelation of the love of God, the average man has no difficulty in understanding that all love is sacrificial, and that if God loves the world it is not to be wondered at that he should give his Son for its redemption. Gladly and reverently he accepts that fact and finds in it the motive and the dynamic of a new life.

More and more also men are finding in the cross the goal as well as the beginning of the Christian life. A love like Christ's, a love that gives and spares not—that must ever be the ideal before us.

In the gallery at Dusseldorf, years ago, a young nobleman stood before the painting, "Ecce Homo," with its pathetic face crowned with thorns, and the blood trickling down from their wounds. Beneath it was the legend: "I did this for thee; what hast thou done for me?" Count Zinzendorf was strangely moved as he gazed upon it, and turned away at last with the resolve to devote his life without reserve to the service of the Redeemer. The Great Moravian Church, with its unexampled devotion to the cause of Christian missions, was the fruit of that resolve. "What hast thou done for me?" That is the meaning of the cross for each of us.

REV. EDWARD MACARTHUR NOYES.

On page 317 we publish a letter which deserves careful consideration. It suggests the danger that with the broadcasting of sermons at the traditional church hours, 10.30 or 11.00 Sunday morning, and 7.30 or 8.00 Sunday evening, people may fall into the habit of staying at home to hear the great preachers, to the decimation of the congregation of the local church. We shall be interested to hear suggestions from our readers in regard to the problem.

Making Church Advertising Pay

BY REV. CLINTON WUNDER.

(Continued from last week)

Summer advertising is another undeveloped field for the church and the Y. M. C. A. Many churches, by common consent, "go out of business" in the summer time. Last summer we deliberately made capital of that fact. Again we remembered our principle that a good program fitted to the need and local situation when well advertised will bring results. We secured the very best preachers we could get, representing several denominations. We did not decrease our advertising, with the result that our attendance for June, July and August averaged Sunday mornings 650 and evenings 640.

We should advertise boldly, regularly, consistently, and sufficiently. A dollar per year per member is a good minimum for an advertising budget. Don't be afraid to spend the money. I will always remember the minister who told me of his speculation in the field of religious advertising. How he once placed a two-inch one-column ad in the newspapers, the next Sunday counted his collection and his audience, found no increase in either, and decided never to advertise again. He has always regretted the cost of the ad, an item of about $2.47, which he is convinced would have been more religiously spent if contributed in behalf of the cause of enlightening the heathen in Africa, India and other lands.

I recommend the study of religious advertising as a hobby and as a necessity. Join the local branch of the advertising club, read from the many books on the subject. But think out and work out your own theories, principles and campaign, making suitable adjustments to your local situation. You must become or discover a copywriter.

We have something the public wants, but they do not know we are the possessors of it. Our goods are the love of God, the Kingdom of God, the Gospel of Jesus Christ, as the conveyor of this love and this kingdom. We possess a cure of unhappiness, a remedy for sickness, a means of escape from loneliness, a power to overcome sin, the answer to sorrow, the way to fight fear, a weapon that will strike dead despair, discouragement and doubt. We have a church, its worshipful services, its friendly people, its community interest one in the other; good music that lifts one above business troubles, worry, illness, prejudices and the petty annoyances of life; violin and cello solos that take us upon wings of harmony to planes where God dwells; and we have a sermon that will give folks food for their hunger, a refreshing drink for their thirst, providing faith, hope and love, and the greatest of these is love. But if we love them, why not tell them of it. By advertising we tell them of it.

First, financially, I have found that in my own church advertising has increased the loose collections 450 per cent., and the loose collection is the index of the presence of strangers and visitors in the congregation. We are estimating our loose collections at $5,700 for this year. Our attendance last year averaged two thousand per Sunday, which is an estimated increase of four times over the period when there was no systematic plan of advertising. Respect and love are gained for the church in the community by a proper campaign of advertising. Business men, politicians, professional people, employers and employees become sympathetic with the church that seems to have an aggressive interest in the community. A remarkable growth in the material and spiritual aspects of church life results.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Notes from the Field

Conducted by Rev. Edmund de S. Brunner, Ph.D.

"NO, sir, not another cent for good roads in this township so far as I am concerned," remarked a rather progressive farmer. "Every Tom, Dick and Harry in the city runs a Ford car these days, and every week-end all the riff-raff of the town comes out into the country. It has gotten so country roads are no safer than city slums on most nights." The remark seemed to be an over-statement, but it does throw light on a problem that is becoming very real.

In one of our Middle Western States the situation in connection with the public dance in one of the cities reached such a point that some fairly stringent regulations were put into effect. Within a short time the attendance at public dances in the city decreased eighty per cent., but the attendance at public dances out in the small centers of the county within the same period increased practically two-thirds. It was the same problem, only the center had shifted.

In connection with the student work at the State Normal School, situated at Monmouth, Oregon, the Baptist Church is attempting to work out and exemplify the ideal rural church plan, and to furnish at the same time a laboratory for rural community service. Monmouth itself is a little village of about six hundred population in the midst of the best agri-cultured section of Willamette. The pastor lectures before the faculty and student body once each quarter on some phase of the church and community service and teaches a few periods of the quarter on the rural church and its work for the class in rural problems.

The Normal School Faculty are, on the whole, very sympathetic with the enterprise and the new building, now two years old, and erected at a cost of ten thousand dollars, is a real center of religious light and influence. The church, by the way, includes the parsonage and community house, and was erected at this low cost because it was possible to salvage material from the old chapel and from the building on the new site selected. Furthermore, the energetic pastor, Rev. Edward B. Pace, served as architect and building foreman.

The following is a quotation from a letter received from a rural worker out on the firing line:

"We have a cotton-mill owner who is interested in the community and who works for the community," said the school principal in a cotton-mill town across the river from Jeweltown, which is in ——— County. The owner has indeed done things for his settlement. The houses are all used rent free. They are all lighted with electricity. There is a fine cement swimming pool with trees set along it and good dressing rooms. About a quarter of a mile from the settlement is a good baseball field, well kept and rolled, with small bleachers. Needless to say, there is a baseball team. The mill helped pay for the school and largely pays for the school principal. It is a good school; the teachers are interested in its upkeep and proud of it. They are helping to plant flowers all around the building. The playground equipment was paid for by the mill. There is also a church building put up by the mill for the use of any and all denominations.

But—this company also operates a Grist Mill across the river. Recently, they have completed a dam across the river which supplies power to both plants. This dam has caused a great strength of stagnant water on the low land behind the cotton mill, which is built on high land. The water used in the settlement is from wells, and they had not been analyzed since anyone could remember. The doctor from across the river, who takes care of sick folks at the mill-town, had remarked that "there was bound to be illness because of that low water back there." Several days later the stagnant water won out, when there were six cases of typhoid fever.

THE COMMUNITY HOUSE AT MONMOUTH

Is There Hope in the Factory?

(Continued from page 304)

factories. Here was clear recognition of the fact that, whatever the system, intelligent organization of men, materials and machines is the primary requisite.

The other incident came under my direct observation. I was present in one of the factories in Cleveland when the president of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union and the management of the factory announced to a group of factory executives and factory labor representatives called together for the occasion that a comprehensive series of time-studies was to be made by an engineering concern hired jointly by the factories and the union. Here, almost, was a revolution in procedure! "Labor" had fought time-studies as dehumanizing. "Capital" had tried to impose them as profit-making. Here were labor and capital joining hands in a common effort to find some reasonable standards whereby rewards could be measured with some degree of accuracy and justice. It is significant, too, to recall the fact that Sidney Hilman has fought consistently for what he calls "production standards."

The time has apparently come when slap-dash and sentiment are giving way to an intelligent study of organization. When in a Cleveland factory one found that efficient planning has made it possible for most workers to complete their work by Friday afternoon (without reduction in wage); when in another factory, by the elimination of wasteful movements, operators had been able to add from a third to a half to their wage; when in numbers of factories confusion had been reduced to order, ill conditions into good conditions, one is justified in believing that the development of this kind of intelligent engineering in the factories is of very great hope for the future.

And yet this is only one side of the shield. All this is being done for the workers. Is anything being done by the workers or with them? After all, that is the fundamental question which concerns us in a democracy. Benevolent autocracy in industry may work; but it cannot work always. Inevitably there is the pressure of the submerged human spirit to find expression for itself. Is there any movement in industry which looks to the greater participation of the worker in the organization of his factory life? This is the crucial question to ask of an industrial system that makes any pretense at all to be consistent with the spirit of democratic institutions. I shall attempt in a final article to sum up my impressions of the new movement in America toward democracy in industry.

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

"Human Nature and Conduct"*

PROFESSOR DEWEY'S last book will probably rank as one of the most constructive and creative books issued in the first quarter of the twentieth century. It deals with things that are vital to all social scientists, educators and religious leaders and in dealing with them it advances full grown a new idea of social psychology. Not only is the idea new, but it is immeasurably better than any that we have had before. The old social psychology built its theories on an analysis of an assumed separate social mind. McDougal and others announce certain instincts under which could be classified all the activities of the social mind and the finding and defining of new instincts became a great indoor sport with social psychologists. Professor Dewey demolishes the idea of any sort of separate social mind. He proves that human consciousness can be explained only in terms of social life, and that the key to an understanding of social life is to be found largely in the one word habit. Habit he defines variously, but chiefly he means by it "that kind of human activity which is influenced by prior activity, and in that sense acquired; which contains within itself a certain ordering of minor elements of action; which is projective, dynamic in quality, and which is operative in some subdued form even when not dominating activity. Habit is an ability, an art formed through past experiences. It is energy organized in certain channels." Habit, then, becomes the pivot around which the facts of social psychology center. Ideals and morals, therefore, are human and are not outside of and apart from people and from life. Morality is social.

"It sounds academic to say that substantial bettering of social relations waits upon the growth of a scientific social psychology. For the term suggests something specialized and remote. But the formation of habits of belief, desire and judgment is going on at every instant under the influence of the conditions set by men's contact, intercourse and associations with one another. This is the fundamental fact in social life and in personal character. It is the fact about which traditional human science gives no enlightenment—a fact which this traditional science blurs and virtually denies. The enormous role played in popular morals by appeal to the supernatural and quasi-magical is in effect a desperate admission of the futility of our science. Consequently, the whole matter of the formation of the predispositions which effectively control human relationships is left to accident, to custom and immediate personal likings, resentments and ambitions."

Or again, as Professor Dewey says, "Ideal morals begin with the perception of the enormous differences for better or for worse in the qualities of those various things which are of social concern. These differences can be regulated, employed in an orderly way for good only as we know how to observe them. And they cannot be observed aright, they cannot be understood and utilized, when the mind is left to itself to work without the aid of science. For the natural unaided mind means precisely the habits of belief, thought and desire which have been accidentally generated and confirmed by social institutions or customs. But with all their admixture of accident and reasonableness we have at last reached a point where social conditions create a mind capable of scientific outlook and inquiry. To foster and develop this spirit is the social obligation of the present because it is its urgent need."

This new book of Professor Dewey's is not for mere reading. It must be studied, but for the most part his thought is clear and there are many pages in which he illustrates his point or lays bare the real meaning of current attitudes, prejudices and philosophies with the finesse of a master.

*Human Nature and Conduct. By John Dewey. 336 pages. Henry Holt and Company, New York. $2.25.

Correspondence

I WAS IN PRISON AND YE CAME UNTO ME

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

We who write this letter have lately come out of Leavenworth Penitentiary, after five years of incarceration for our ideas, and in sixty days we are to be deported because we have not retracted those ideas. During this brief leeway we want to do everything possible for those we left behind the bars. Fifty-three workmen are still serving from five to twenty years because they refused to support a war in which they did not believe. Nearly all of the fifty-three are members of the Industrial Workers of the World, in which we are proud to hold membership.

There is a large probability that all the war-opinion prisoners will shortly be turned loose. Unquestionably the Harding administration is sensitive to the pressure of public opinion which is being exerted from one country after another. Protests are being sounded by labor organizations and individuals in many lands, this being largely due to the tireless publicity work of the General Defense Committee in the last year.

Just before we left Leavenworth all the other war-opinion prisoners were summoned one by one to the warden's office, and each was asked, "If your sentence is commuted by the President, will you agree to be law-abiding in the future?" That question of course implied that our fellow-workers had been law-breakers in the past; yet we contend, as do the others, that in expressing opinion against the war we were within our rights under the Constitution, which provides that "Congress shall make no laws abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble. . . ."

Seven of those inside refused to answer the warden's question, we are told, while the others replied that they would obey the law in the future, but that they had always been law-abiding in the past. Warden Biddle declared that he was concerned only with the question of their future conduct, and cared not whether they were innocent or guilty of transgression in the past.

We have reason to believe that the Government is on the point of washing its hands of a sticky problem by letting all the war-opinion prisoners out. In that way it could remove a source of annoying criticism, which must necessarily grow stronger until the last political [prisoner] has been liberated.

When our fellow-workers emerge into the sunshine and clean air again they will need practical aid. Most of them will come forth almost penniless and needing clothes. And they will be up against the difficulty of getting a foothold in the productive world again. They will have to find jobs in a country where jobs are scarce, regardless of inspired reports of a labor shortage.

Some of the boys will come out in bad health, and will require immediate medical attention. Edward Quigley and Caesar Tabib have been gradually sinking through the stages of tuberculosis for many months, despite all appeals to President Harding to free them before they died. (Ricardo Flores Magon was permitted to die in his cell in the face of similar appeals.) Harrison George has just been released after serving a five-year sentence, and is in bad physical condition. For months the penitentiary officials ignored his manifest need for the removal of his tonsils, and the resulting accumulation of poison in his system has undermined his health.

Out in New Mexico another fellow-worker, William Weyh, is fighting to regain a hold upon life. He was with us in Leavenworth until he was close to death. James Mulrone, who served his full term, is in a Chicago sanitarium. His health was broken while awaiting trial in the Sacramento jail (fifty-three I.W.W. members were kept in a cell twenty-one by twenty-one feet for sixty-four terrible days and nights), and his strength was sapped still further in Leavenworth. His condition today is pathetic to contemplate.

And Frederick Esmond, another victim of that Sacramento ordeal (in which five fellow-workers died before trial), is about to be released from St. Elizabeth's Hospital in Washington, D.C. He also must be sent to New Mexico so that he may have a chance for life.

You cannot understand what prison does to a human being until you have been confined in one. Unless a man's spirit is indomitable he breaks under the strain. Every day is a monotone, and the food is an everlasting repetition until the sight of it brings nausea. The air is unclean. It is reminiscent of the odors in a menagerie, except that the prison is worse.

To care for our fellow-workers who are coming out the General Defense Committee must have money. Its treasury is very low, with the constant demands from many quarters for defense of men prosecuted under state laws designed to suppress independent thought; for prison relief; and for the publicity that is so essential for all these cases.

In the name of our fellow-workers who still are caged; in the name of those who have given their all so that free speech may become a reality in the United States—we ask you give all the money you can spare, and that you give quickly.

Yours for a square deal,

A. V. AZUARA

(Sentenced to serve twenty years).

SAM SCARLETT

(Sentenced to serve twenty years).

C. L. LAMBERT

(Sentenced to serve twenty years).

ARCHIE SINCLAIR

(Sentenced to serve ten years).

RADIO SERMONS AT CHURCH HOURS

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

I am not opposed to new methods of work in our religious field, but I have not been convinced that it is for the best, nor ethically right, to have radio sermons preached at the very hour throughout the sending stations that the local church in the local community is calling its people to worship. What do preachers mean by broadcasting at those very hours? I have been told that it is simply thoughtlessness for the most part.

Let me illustrate how it affects me in a small town. One of my church members does not come to church any more. Her husband has put in a high-powered receiving radio set and she hears "wonderful" sermons every Sunday in her own home. But she is beginning to invite the people of our church to these "great" sermons. Personally I would not have the slightest objection to this if it were not either at eleven o'clock Sunday morning, or seven or seven-thirty Sunday evening—the very hours that we can demand for our public services.

I wish my "radio brethren" would explain why they must use identically the same hours that the average town preachers have for their services? We would not object to their broadcasting all week long, and, if necessary, even between service times on Sunday—but why the same identical hours?

Of course, it may mean that they intend to do all the preaching for us, and, as a layman told me, it will give the average preacher his time for his "church chores" and pastoral work, and he will not be compelled to study any more. I fear that if it should come to this that many of us will leave the ministry.

I think that this is a matter for preachers themselves to correct and regulate. Surely I am not to infer that there are men in the ministry who feel that it is of more importance that they be heard than it is that the local church shall progress. And yet I am reminded that recently there were two "big" preachers in Washington, D.C., who both felt that they had the right of way, and by preaching at the same time they sent out nothing but meaningless noise and gave some people a very low opinion of ministerial ethics.

I am not a pessimist nor one opposed to the radio. I think that it can be used for great benefit in the Kingdom of God. But I am asking whether we have a right to those hours which traditionally we have always thought belonged to the local church on Sunday? Will our own brethren break this up because they are over-anxious that "their" voices be heard irrespective of what happens to the local church?

What do the average preachers think about this matter? Shall we surrender the Sunday services to our "radio brothers" in the big metropolitan centers? Is that going to best build up the Kingdom of God in the average community? I am willing to admit that the church must be more than a preaching station, but, brethren, if we are denied the right of way on the Sabbath what is there left for us in the way of public services? And without public services and preaching in the local communities I am convinced that the churches will suffer.

I recently read a statement from a prominent layman in the Episcopal Church who went so far as to say that the radio would in time put the Evangelical churches, whose emphasis is the sermon, out of business. But he maintained that the Episcopal and Roman Catholic churches, who emphasize the sacrament, would not materially suffer from the radio.

I am anxious to get light on this matter and to learn if we preachers cannot regulate this radio preaching so that it will not conflict with our regular Sunday services in the smaller communities of the United States.

Sincerely yours,

ELMER L. SETTERLUND.

Mineral, Ill.

THE CHURCHES AND THE KU KLUX KLAN

The following article is taken from a recent issue of "The New York Christian Advocate":

"The Imperial Wizard is reported in the Klan paper as saying in an address on April 30 of this year: 'America is a garbage can, not a melting pot. . . . When the hordes of aliens walk to the ballot box and their votes outnumber yours, then that horde has got you by the throat. All of these folks of color can take their place—they had better take it and stay in it when

1922 PASSION PLAY beautifully illustrated by 58 colored slides, with lecture, for rent at $2.50, or for sale at $26.60. Also Wm. J. Bryan's "Back to God" and 400 other excellent illustrated lectures and sermons. Write for information

VICTOR ANIMATOGRAPH CO., Inc.
276 Victor Bldg. Davenport, Iowa

FOR YOUR EASTER COMMUNION

Individual Cups

Over 40,000 churches use the Thomas Service. Clean and sanitary. Write now for Catalog and Special Trial Offer.

Thomas Communion Service Co. Box 432 Lima, Ohio.

MOTION PICTURES

for churches. No danger from fire with Safety Standard Film and the Victor Safety Cinema $195—Splendid subjects for church and school. 1235 in our libraries at low rental. Pictures suitable for evening services, missionary societies, men's clubs, young people, children. Write for "The Picture and the Pulpit" and demonstration.

WRITE for Free Booklet
SAFETY ENTERTAINMENT INSTRUCTION PROJECTOR & FILM
UNITED FILM PROJECTOR CORP.
Address Dept. I
69 W. Mohawk St. Buffalo

McSHANE BELL FOUNDRY CO. BALTIMORE MARYLAND

Church, Chime and Peal BELLS

Memorials a Specialty

The Woodlawn Cemetery

Is readily accessible by Harlem trains from Grand Central Station and by subway. Small lots at reasonable prices. Write or telephone (4855 Gramercy Park) for Book of Views or representative. Office 20 E. 23d Street, New York City.

Pulpit Gowns

and Choir Vestment
Custom Tailoring
FOR CLERGYMEN

Pulpit Hangings and Bookmarkers

Cox Sons & Wining
131-133 East 23rd. New York City

Now Ready Volume 1 9s. 6d. net

of

'THE SPEAKER'S BIBLE'

Edited by the Rev.

James Hastings, D.D.

HEBREWS

388 Pages.

776 Columns.

The Volume may be had from the Book-sellers; or, post free from

'THE SPEAKER'S BIBLE' OFFICES,
ABERDEEN, SCOTLAND.

The Serial Issue of VOLUME II (which deals with the First Half of ST. LUKE'S GOSPEL) begins in February.

Send for Booklet today!

LEARN how to make a safe investment and secure an assured income for life yielding as high as 8% with

No Anxiety
No Fluctuations
No Inheritance Taxes

A real bond with a donation feature endorsed by leading churches of all denominations

Write for Booklet No. 29

NEW YORK BIBLE SOCIETY
Oldest Bible Society in New York
5 East 48th Street New York

THE MONDAY CLUB SERMONS

FOR 1923

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. But many Sunday-school teachers, pastors and superintendents will wish to own the whole series, so as to have it at all times conveniently at hand. Get a copy to-day from your regular book store, or from

The Pilgrim Press

14 Beacon St., Boston
19 W. Jackson St., Chicago
156 Fifth Ave., New York

Tusculum

President C. O. GRAY, D.D., Greenville, Tenn.

A thorough Christian-character-building College. Established 1794. Address

MENEELY BELL CO.

TROY, N.Y. AND
189 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.

BELLS

whooping cough

and CROUP--those dreaded Childhood afflictions are quickly and safely relieved by Roche's Herbal Embrocation--the remedy that has served several generations of Mothers successfully--since 1802.

Equally effective for BRONCHITIS or COLDS on the chest.

Always keep a bottle handy

E. FOUGERA & CO., Inc.
90-92 Beekman Street, New York

ROCHE'S
HERBAL EMBROCATION

WHOOPING COUGH

Asthma, Spasmodic Croup
Bronchitis, Coughs & Influenza

The most widely used remedy for whooping cough and spasmodic croup. The little lamp vaporizes the remedy while the patient sleeps.

Introduced in 1879

Vapo-Cresolene

"Used while you sleep"

Send for descriptive booklet 63A

Sold by druggists

VAPOR-CRESOLINE CO., 62 CORTLANDT STREET, NEW YORK

When answering advertisements please mention The Christian Work

these apes are going to line up at the polls, mixed up there with white men and white women. Lord forgive me, but that is the most sickening and disgusting thing yet. . . . I am informed that every buck nigger in Atlanta who attains the age of twenty-one years has gotten the money to pay his poll tax and register, and that numbers of them are now ready to vote. . . . You've got to change that. . . . Keep the Negro and the other fellow where he belongs. They have got no part in our political and social life. . . . To assure the supremacy of the white race we believe in the exclusion of the yellow race and the disfranchisement of the Negro. It was God's act to make the white race superior to all others. By some scheme of Providence the Negro was created a serf.'

"Will the sons of the men who answered Abraham Lincoln's call in 1861 now take the oath of allegiance to this bombastic charlatan!

"The Christian Advocate' has not been blind to the menace of political Romanism—nor silent! It has not been unmindful of the arrogance of the Knights of Columbus—nor silent! It has not been slow to perceive that the parochial school if left unregulated by the State will distort and taint the Americanism of American youth—and it has not been, nor will be, silent on this matter of vital concern. But we love America too well, we honor Protestantism too highly to permit our citizenship to be degraded and our Christianity to be perverted by the Klansmen who would enrich

HAVE YOU DONE IT?

OUR Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare is doing a large constructive work in a needy field which has been too long neglected by the Church.

Prohibition, Social Hygiene, Prison Reform, Drugs and Narcotics, Child Labor, Amusements and Recreation, Gambling, Profanity, Humane Education, Motion Pictures, Marriage and Divorce are subjects which cannot be neglected without danger to civic and religious interests.

Your contribution to these causes will count on the regular budget of your church, if sent through authorized channels.

If your church and Sunday-school have not contributed to this work during the present year, will you not make sure that they do so during March?

Send contributions to the Presbyterian Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare, Columbia Bank Building, Pittsburgh, Pa. Miss Anna M. Wycoff, Assistant Treasurer.

PRODIGAL DAUGHTERS

By Joseph Hocking

Starts Soon as THE CHRISTIAN WORK'S New Serial

Within the next few months "Prodigal Daughters" can be seen on the screen throughout the country. Famous Players chose it as one of a small number of novels from which great films could be produced. The selection of this story emphasizes anew the great appeal of Hocking's novel.

"Prodigal Daughters" is a tale of the flapper, with a swift plot, stirring incidents and an interesting and remarkable solution.

"Prodigal Daughters" has been the theme of many sermons and of endless discussion. Its appeal lies not only in the dramatic presentation of the author but its timely message to modern America and England. Three million copies of Hocking's novels have been sold.

THE CHRISTIAN WORK
70 Fifth Avenue - New York City

$3.00 a year. A five month's trial subscription for $1 themselves by collecting membership fees from good and patriotic citizens by offering them a false method of correcting certain manifest evils of the day.

"A correspondent, greatly incensed by an editorial denunciation of the Ku Klux Klan in these columns last week, charges us with striking a blow at Protestantism. God forbid! The blow is being struck by those who, thinking to serve the cause of light and liberty, which is Protestantism, give their support to a group which hides its very face from the light of day, and pursues its ends by the method of the mask, the black hand and the poison pen."

BOOKS RECEIVED

The Christian Doctrine of Peace. By James Hastings, D.D. Charles Scribner's Sons. $4.
New Testament Followers of Jesus. By Walter A. Squires, B.D. Westminster Press. $1.25.
Pleasing God by Right-Doing. By M. Florence Brown. Westminster Press. 60 cents.
Stories of the Beginnings. By Ethel W. Trout. Westminster Press. 60 cents.
Readings from Great Authors. By John Haynes Holmes and others. Dodd, Mead and Company. $1.
My Lady's Bargain. By Elizabeth Hope. The Century Company. $1.75.
A History of Connecticut. By Elias B. Sanford. S. S. Seranton Company. $2.
A Missionary Pioneer in the Far East. By Robert E. Speer. Fleming H. Revell Company. $1.50.
Service with Fighting Men. Two Vols. Association Press. $5.
Parallel Edition The New Testament: A New Translation. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.
When You Enlist. By Margaret Slattery. Pilgrim Press. 75 cents.
Non-Violent Coercion. By Clarence Marsh Case. The Century Company. $3.
The World's Great Religious Poetry. By Caroline M. Hill, Ph.D. Macmillan Company. $5.

THE DIFFICULTIES OF EQUIVOCATION

"The Auburn Chapel Bell" pleasantly reminds us of the Norwegian's classic description of the frog. "The Chapel Bell" charges that the Chicago Board of Education caused the essay to be immortalized in type. The essay runs: "What a wonderful bird the frog are! When he hop he fly, almost! When he stand he sit, almost! He ain't got no sense, hardly! He ain't got no tail, either! He a fish, and yet he not a fish."

EXCITING NEW $1.75 NOVEL FOR 15c

You Should Read "The Free Trader," That Intensely Interesting Love and Mystery Story of the Canadian Wilds

Washington, D.C. (Special)—"The Free Trader," by the Pinkertons, is a wonderfully absorbing and well told tale of love, heroism, adventure and villainy. The Pathfinder, in accord with its policy of giving the best of everything, has secured the serial rights to this unusual story prior to its publication in book form, and will print it starting March 17. The Pathfinder is the great illustrated weekly magazine from the nation's capital, now read in over half a million homes. Send 15 cents and receive it 13 weeks, containing this brand new serial and many other fine stories and features—unequaled digest of news, record of congress, jokes, stunts, puzzles, question box, etc. It costs the editor a lot of money to do this, but he says it pays to invest in new friends. Send 15 cents today to Pathfinder, 332 Langdon Sta., Washington, D.C.

The COMMUNITY CHURCHMAN

A Monthly Magazine for all churchmen who are community minded

A working tool for every pastor and layman, informing, inspiring and helping him to make his church of larger social and spiritual service to its community.

Annual Subscription price, $2.00

Rate to Ministers, $1.50

Single copies, 20 cents each.

HANDBOOK OF THE COMMUNITY CHURCH MOVEMENT

This Handbook (84 pages, paper-bound) contains concise information concerning the numbers, varieties, methods of organization and kinds of service of the community churches throughout the United States. Price 65 cents, postpaid.

Address, Dept. W

THE COMMUNITY CHURCHMAN
2822 Annette St., Indianapolis, Indiana

IRRESISTIBLE

VACATION PLANS!

JOIN THE "CHRISTIAN WORK" PARTY

to the MEDITERRANEAN and EUROPE

Summer "Baltic" Cruise and Winter "Baltic" Cruise

Both Round Trip Cruises on the Palatial White Star S. S. "Baltic" (23,884 tons), one of the Finest Trans-Atlantic Express Liners afloat, representing the Highest Standard of Service Throughout.

ITINERARY Madeira, Cadiz, Seville (Cordova, Granada and the Alhambra), Gibraltar, Algiers, Naples, Athens, Constantinople, the Bosphorus and Black Sea, Haifa, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Bethany (Sea of Galilee, Nazareth, Samaria, Jericho, the Jordan and Dead Sea), Alexandria, Cairo, Heliopolis, Monaco, Monte Carlo, Cherbourg (Paris and French Battlefields, London), Liverpool, and New York—a wonderful travel program.

On Winter "Baltic" Cruise, special side trips to Damascus, and up the Nile to the First Cataract can be included.

Stop-Overs in Europe with return trips included on the "Majestic," "Olympic," "Adriatic," "Baltic," "Cedric," etc.

Summer "Baltic" Cruise
61 Days, Sailing
June 27th, 1923

Winter "Baltic" Cruise
65 Days, Sailing
Feb. 2d, 1924

Cost—First-class, $600 and up, according to size and location of stateroom

NINETEEN ANNUAL CLARK CRUISES

on such steamers as the Rotterdam, Celtic, Arabic, Laconia, Empress of Scotland, etc., insure perfected and satisfactory arrangements. 61 or 65 days, $600 and up, including the regular shore trips, landings, carriage drives, guides, hotels, first-class railroads, fees, etc.—everything first-class.

WESTMINSTER BRIDGE AND CLOCK TOWER, LONDON.

OUR "CHRISTIAN WORK" PARTY is being organized by D. E. Lorenz, Ph.D., Author of "The Mediterranean Traveler" and Managing Director of Clark's Cruises.

THE SHIP—24 Imperial Suites and Chambres de Luxe with private bath. Two Great Promenade Decks, largely devoted to sumptuous Public Rooms. All B and C Deck rooms have beds, windows, running water, etc. Inspiring Services and Lectures. Travel Club meetings. Concerts. Entertainments, Deck Sports and Contests, and delightful social life. Unexcelled Cuisine of the highest White Star Standard. Musical Program—Orchestra of Selected Musicians at Lunches and Dinners.

Mostly Steam Tenders for Quick Landings; Staff of Trained Directors for Shore Trips; two Lady Chaperons; Physician, Nurses and Ship Hospital.

Illustrated Booklet (100 pages) and ship diagram sent free upon request. State which Cruise preferred.

Write and Make Reservations at Once.

CRUISE DEPARTMENT.

THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y.

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

A Religious Weekly Review

Jan 24-28863
Berkeley Calif
3223 Alherton St
Religion Library
Pacific School of M...

What Are the Fundamentals?

Frederick Lynch, D.D.

Liberty in Logan County

Henry Strong Huntington

What Happened at Lausanne?

James L. Barton, D.D.

The Mission of the Church

Charles E. Jefferson, D.D.

New Forces in Old China

Sherwood Eddy, LL.D.

Prodigal Daughters: Instalment I.

Joseph Hocking

Three Dollars a Year

Ten Cents a Copy

New—Valuable

DORAN BOOKS

MAN AND THE ATTAINMENT OF IMMORTALITY

Prof. J. Y. Simpson, M.A., D.Sc., F.R.S.E.
Successor to Henry Drummond at New College, Edinburgh.

A most original and important discussion of organic evolution as exemplified in man and its ultimate significance in his religious development. A work of profound scholarship and highest spiritual value. Illustrated, Net, $2.25

CRITICAL HOURS IN THE PREACHER'S LIFE

Rev. Ernest C. Wareing, D.D., Litt.D.,
Editor of the Western Christian Advocate.

With striking originality and startling frankness this well-known editor and preacher reveals the struggles, tragedies and temptations of the minister's life. A book of warning and inspiration. Net, $1.25

SOME LIVING MASTERS OF THE PULPIT

Rev. Joseph Fort Newton, D.D., Litt.D.,
Author of "Preaching in London," etc.

Intimate studies of many of the greatest living preachers on both sides of the Atlantic. Dr. Newton's personal contacts and power of analysis make this a volume of peculiar insight and richness of incident. Net, $2.00

CLASSICS OF THE SOUL'S QUEST

Rev. R. E. Welsh, M.A., D.D.,
Professor of Apologetics and Church History, McGill University.

A fresh and noteworthy interpretation of the great devotional writers whose quest for the spiritual life has crystallized itself into great literary classics. Net, $2.00

THE DEEPER VOICE

Annie Steger Winston

A study of childlikeness in relation to the spiritual life of which the author says: "The way to a trust in God which is sole antidote for that distrust of life which has fallen upon men." Net, $1.25

CAN WE DISPENSE WITH CHRISTIANITY?

F. W. Butler, Vicar of Hurley, Berks.

Of this recent publication of the Student Christian Movement the Christian World says: "A scholarly and closely reasoned argument for the uniqueness and 'absoluteness' of Christianity from the philosophical side." Net, $2.00

The AUTHORITY OF JESUS

Rev. R. Winboul Harding, B.D.

A strong message showing that love is "practical politics" in human life. "Just the kind of book that is calculated to help thoughtful young men and women."—Methodist Times. Net, $2.00

TEACHING ADOLESCENTS IN THE CHURCH SCHOOL

Erwin L. Shaver, New England Secretary, Congregational Education Society.

Professor George A. Coe, says of this book: "It is a genuinely new departure in the method it unfolds for conducting a training class." Net, $1.25

DORAN BOOKS

At Your Religious Book Store
GEORGE H. DORAN COMPANY
244 Madison Avenue New York

THE AMERICAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY

76 Wall Street, New York

(Incorporated April, 1833)

The only American denominational, international and national Society aiding seamen. Maintains a Sailors' Home and Institute at 507 West Street, New York City. Places loan libraries ($25) on vessels sailing from New York.

Publishes the "Sailors' Magazine," $1.00. Supported by contributions and legacies.
JOHN B. CALVERT, D.D., President.
GEORGE SIDNEY WEBSTER, S.D., Sec'y.
Send contributions to CLARENCE C. PINNEO, Treasurer, 76 Wall Street, New York.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY

Its work is interdenominational evangelical and international in scope and is commended by all the churches. It has published the Gospel message in 178 languages dialects and characters. Its colporters meet the immigrants with Christian literature in many languages, and also visit the spiritually destitute. In the Spanish and Portuguese languages, chiefly for Latin America, there have been issued 16,012,088 copies of volumes, tracts and periodicals. Its literature in the native dialects has been the strong right arm of foreign missions. Its benevolent work is dependent upon donations and legacies.

REV. EDWIN NOAH HARDY, Ph.D., Gen. Sec.
WILLIAM PHILLIPS HALL, President.

Donations may be sent direct to American Tract Society, 101 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

FROM "UNIVERSAL SERVICE"

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

You have been kind enough to send us a clipping from your issue of February 10, in which you quote what purports to be two dispatches to The Jewish Morning Journal from its Berlin correspondent, the first in reference to negotiations between the Russian Church and the Vatican concerning the union of the Orthodox Church with the Roman Catholic, and the second reporting that the Soviet Government will guarantee full liberty to the Catholic Church in Russia.

Allow me to say that you are in error about the origin of these dispatches. Instead of coming from our Berlin correspondent, they came through the Universal Service, of which news agency we are a subscriber. Their sponsor is Carl Von Wiegand, the well-known correspondent. Our own correspondent's messages are always specially labelled, while you must have noticed that the dispatches you have alluded to were entirely without label, as is generally the custom among most newspapers printing a regular press association service.

Naturally, it follows that your inference about our correspondent having pretty direct access to the Soviet representatives in Berlin is entirely baseless. Furthermore, to the best of our knowledge the Soviet representatives in Berlin are all at least born, if not practicing Christians.

Very truly yours,

J. FISHMAN,

Managing Editor, The Jewish Morning Journal.

[Our statement that the Soviet representatives in Berlin are, certainly in part, Jews was based upon the statement of a reliable Jew who knows some of them personally.—The Editors.]

MINISTERS' SONS

Rev. Robert G. Hutchins, D.D., for some years was the superintendent of Church Extension in the Presbytery of Brooklyn.

Sincerely yours,

ANNIE D. ST. JOHN.

Newton, N.J.

His son, Rev. William J. Hutchins, who was a licentiate of Brooklyn Presbytery, began his ministry in the pastorate of Bedford Church which he led out of an old dwelling house into a handsome modern chapel. Thence he went to a professorship in Oberlin College and now is president of Berea College. At Yale he took high rank and captured the De Forest gold medal. His son, Robert M. Hutchins, born in Brooklyn, also went to Yale and also took the medal, the only instance of father and son both securing the prize. He was voted by his class to be the man among them "most likely to succeed." During the war he served in the army ambulance service on the Italian front, and for work under fire was awarded the Croce di Guerra. Now at the age of twenty-three he has been chosen secretary of Yale University, the place filled for twenty-five years by Rev. Anson Phelps Stokes. Where is that old proverb about ministers' sons?—The Brooklyn Presbyterian Outlook.

THE DISCOURTESY AT ELLIS ISLAND

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

Whoever wrote the editorial in THE CHRISTIAN WORK for February 24 entitled "Have We the Right Immigration Commissioner at New York?" certainly "hit the nail on the head." Never shall I forget a day spent at Ellis Island about twelve years ago. I saw injustice and discourtesy exhibited there enough "to make one's blood boil" over and over again. Ever since then the longing has grown stronger that somebody would do something to put a stop to it. We seem to have been unfortunate in the selection of commissioners. Are there not enough courteous Christian men in our country (who make the Golden Rule the practice of their lives) to fill the positions at Ellis Island? Will not THE CHRISTIAN WORK continue the good work it has so bravely begun in this editorial?

THE GREAT TEA HER

taught with authority. His language was clear, incisive. It is therefore important that we know his exact thought. The American Standard Version gives the most accurate rendering of our Master's words

Nelson American Bible

is being read and studied in more homes, in more institutions of learning, in more Sunday Schools and is being preached from in more Protestant pulpits than were all other versions of Scripture a century ago. No matter which other version you use, you will enjoy the simplicity, the directness and the faithful accuracy of the wonderful American Standard Bible in your study and devotion.

FREE BOOKLET—A charming 36-page booklet entitled "The Wonderful Story," published at 10c per copy, telling how the Bible came down through the ages, and containing many facts of vital interest.

will be sent FREE on request to any one mentioning the Arkansas Methodist.

The American Standard Bible text has been adopted by all the leading Colleges, Theological Seminaries, Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., and Bible Schools in the United States.

The American Standard Bible text is used by over 13,000,000 Sabbath School scholars from which to study the International, Graded or other Bible lessons.

The American Standard Bible is for sale by all book sellers

THOMAS NELSON & SONS

381P Fourth Ave., New York City.

DEAR SIR: Kindly send me a FREE copy of your book entitled "The Wonderful Story." This does not obligate me in any way.

Name.....

Street No.....

City.....

When answering advertisements please mention The Christian Work

THE CHRISTIAN WORK

CONTINUING

THE EVANGELIST AND NEW YORK OBSERVER

Vol. 114.—No. 11.

New York, March 17, 1923.

Whole No. 3014.

CONTENTS

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY.....	323
EDITORIALS:
What Are the Fundamentals? Frederick Lynch, D.D.....	327
Protestantism and the World's Necessities: S. Parkes Cadman, D.D. ....	328
EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE:
Round the World and Back Again: Nehemiah Boynton, D.D....	329
THE OBSERVER'S LETTER:
Always We Dream Utopias.....	331
THE WEEKLY SERMON:
Free Church Criticism: A Reply: A. C. Headlam, D.D.....	332
GENERAL ARTICLES:
Liberty in Logan County: Henry S. Huntington.....	334
What Happened at Lausanne: James L. Barton, D.D.....	338
The Mission of the Church: C. E. Jefferson, D.D.....	340
New Forces in Old China: Sherwood Eddy, LL.D.....	342
Prodigal Daughters: Joseph Hocking.....	345
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE:
Christianity in Japan: K. Tsunashima .....	347
INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON:
For April 1: The Walk to Emmaus.....	348
ONE BOOK A WEEK:
Analysis of the Interchurch Movement Report on the Steel Strike	349

The Christian Work; Published weekly; 10 cents a copy, $3.00 a year in the United States, $3.52 in Canada, and $4.04 in all other countries (postage included.)

Application made for entry as second class matter February 17, 1923, at the Post-office at New York, N. Y., under act of March 3, 1879.

Printed in U. S. A.—Published by The Christian World, Inc., Frederick Lynch, President; Henry Strong Huntington, Vice-President; Benson Y. Landis, Secretary-Treasurer.

All communications and remittances should be sent to "The Christian Work," 70 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Printed by Birkle & Glaser, 103 Park Place, New York City.

The World of To-day

TURKISH REJECTION OF THE LAUSANNE TREATY

The Angora Assembly has refused to accept some of the financial, economic and administrative features of the Treaty of Lausanne, on the ground that they do not conform to the Turkish Nationalist Pact. This Pact was adopted three years ago in January as a sort of Turkish declaration of independence. Its sixth and last article ran:

It is a fundamental condition of our life and continued existence that we, like every country, should enjoy complete independence and liberty in the matter of assuring the means of our development, in order that our national and economic development should be rendered possible and that it should be possible to conduct affairs in the form of a more up-to-date regular administration.

For this reason we are opposed to restrictions inimical to our development in political, judicial, financial, and other matters.

The conditions of settlement of our proved debts shall likewise not be contrary to these principles.

The Turkish government has put its position in a hundred-page document, which it is submitting to the nations with which it negotiated at Lausanne. Turkey asks for the little island of Kastelorizo, south of Asia Minor, east of Rhodes, and for the little islands about Tenedos. Apparently Turkey would like to draw up a separate economic treaty. Turkey accepts the Allies' terms dealing with prisoners of war and asks only slight changes in those dealing with communications and sanitary arrangements. The Turks ask that Turkish subjects be given the same prerogatives in Allied States as those enjoyed by their nationals in Turkey. That suggestion does not sound tenable. Europe will not settle down to bargaining with the Turk once more.

A NEW NEGRO MIGRATION

The Commission on the Church and Race Relations of the Federal Council of Churches called together on February 23, 1923, some of the church leaders from the principal northern centers for a day's conference to exchange experience and information on Negro migration. The purpose was to get some consensus of opinion on things which the churches and other agencies in these local centers may do to serve the newcomers better than heretofore. While there is no way of ascertaining figures that show the extent of the movement of Negroes to the North during the past twelve months, there are definite indications which justify the conclusion that there will be a large movement during the spring and summer of 1923—larger than during the last two or three years. Northern industry, therefore, will be short of labor. As is already evident this is leading many industries to admit Negro laborers in large numbers. Migration of Negroes has taken place during the past fall and winter, which is unusual. We may infer what an increase there will be with the coming spring and summer. The large increase of Negro population in many northern centers that has already taken place, and the facts which indicate a probable large migration in the immediate future make additional action by white and Negro churches urgent. The conference recommended interracial committees in northern cities to deal with the questions of race relations; that in every city some colored person or persons be definitely appointed as workers to aid Negro travelers, and that this be done in co-operation with the National Travelers' Aid Society; that the churches encourage practical movements for improving conditions of housing among colored people; that vigilance be exercised to see that Negroes may have access to public facilities for recreation and that when necessary such facilities be provided in neighborhoods where they live, etc. The attention of churchmen is called to the Negro as a tremendous religious asset; he is a church-goer; he seeks the church environment.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

A GENERAL AMNESTY DAY

Strangely, despite the great number of pleas to President Harding for the release of all political prisoners, fifty-three workmen incarcerated for war opinions remain in the Federal penitentiaries. Last July the President publicly promised that he would review the cases of all political within sixty days, and that he would release all found to be serving solely for opinions. That promise has not been kept. In July the President received a petition for amnesty signed by three hundred thousand American men and women. Supplementing this, pleas for liberation of the political have been sent to the White House by a great many organizations and individuals of high standing—the Federal Council of Churches, the National Catholic Welfare Council, the American Society of Friends (Quakers), fifty-one bishops, Senator George Wharton Pepper, Senator William E. Borah, numerous labor unions, college professors, ex-soldiers who hold medals for bravery, and a host of others thoughtful for the general well-being of society. There is no equitable reason for keeping these fifty-three men in prison. Forty-nine of them are members of the I. W. W., and various newspapers which express the attitude of the exploiting interests delight in characterizing the I. W. W. as a "dangerous institution." But we have the President's own word for it that he does not regard the I. W. W. as inimical to society. He volunteered the assurance in July (addressing thirty-five men and women representing eminent organizations) that he had no prejudice against the Industrial Workers of the World. From all indications, it is not just by Mr. Harding's wish that the fifty-three political remain behind the bars. He has long had time to satisfy himself that every one of the fifty-three is serving sentence solely for expression of opinion against the war, and that none of these men advocated destruction of the government by means of force or violence. So it is obvious that there are hidden forces which bind Mr. Harding's hands. Only this could account for our czar-like treatment of the political. With curious temerity the Administration has liberated all the spies who committed overt acts against the army and navy; it has set free all the war profiteers; it liberated a woman who sold doctored eyeglasses to men who wished to escape the draft; it turned loose men who sold draft exemptions for cash. In order to bring pressure upon the Administration for the release of the "politicals" April 29 has been set aside as a General Amnesty Day by the General Defense Committee, 1001 West Madison Street, Chicago, Ill. On that date the committee asks for demonstrations in behalf of amnesty, protest meetings, parades, distribution of pertinent literature, the sending of telegrams and letters to President Harding, and exertion of effort to get the newspapers to give publicity to this cause.

THE POWERS OF THE RAILROAD LABOR BOARD

Like many another decision of the United States Supreme Court, the one handed down by Mr. Chief Justice Taft in the injunction case brought by the Pennsylvania Railroad against the Railroad Labor Board, is likely to be misinterpreted. On its face it is a victory for the Labor Board and for the shop crafts, yet in no sense does it give a judicial warrant for the content of the Labor Board's decision. Rather it establishes the Board's right to give a decision and asserts that the matter must rest there. The case arose out of the fact that the Pennsylvania Railroad conducted the election of employee representatives contemplated in the statute in such a way as to exclude the election of any other than the company's own employees. This plan was wholly unacceptable to the union shop-craftsmen, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and they ignored the elections conducted in this way. The Labor Board, to whom the matter was carried in accord with the procedure outlined in the Transportation Act, sustained the men in their contention, holding that they had a right to select their union officials to represent them if they so desired, and directing the road to hold another election in accord with this principle. The Pennsylvania declined to accept this decision, not merely on the ground that it was unsatisfactory or unjust, but on the ground that the Labor Board was outside its prescribed rights in dictating to the road how it should conduct its election of employee representatives. The contention of the Government, which the Court has sustained, was not that the Labor Board had a right to compel compliance with its own interpretation of the law, but that the decision in question was as much within its powers as a wage award, and that its publication of its decision and of the fact of the road's non-compliance is entirely right and proper. The opinion given by the Chief Justice expressly refrains from deciding the question whether, if the Labor Board should go beyond its province in publishing a decision, action could be brought against it, as against a corporation, in a court of law. One clear gain results from the decision. There is now a supremely authoritative statement as to the nature of the Labor Board and of the arbitration procedure created by the Transportation Act. When the employees rejected the Board's decision there was a widespread tendency to regard their strike as "against the Government." As pointed out previously on these pages, such an interpretation was without warrant in the law, notwithstanding the fact that it found its way into the Government's brief in the famous injunction case brought by Mr. Daugherty in the Chicago Federal District Court. Now the Supreme Court has spoken positively on the subject: "The decisions of the Labor Board are not to be enforced by process. The only sanction of its decision is to be the force of public opinion, invoked by the fairness of a full hearing, the intrinsic justice of the conclusion, strengthened by the official prestige of the

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

Board, and the full publication of the violation of such decision by any party to the proceeding." The Pennsylvania Railroad will obviously have the same right to disregard the Labor Board's decision as the shopmen had to strike. Hitherto, it has been legally in the position, so far as this issue is concerned, not of defying the Board, but of testing its powers. Continued resistance would be, like the strike of the employees, an appeal to public opinion as against the Board.

MINIMUM WAGE LAWS

The actual operation of such a law is the real test of its value. Such a test has already been made, for one has been in operation in the District of Columbia since 1918. It provides for: (1) A permanent Minimum Wage Board of three members, one representative of the employers, one representative of the employees and one representative of the public; (2) unpaid wage conferences formed by the Board for separate trades and occupations, composed of representatives of the employers, employees, and the public. These conferences will study the problems presented by the industry they are formed to represent, including the cost of living and will recommend a minimum living wage sufficient to maintain the health of the women workers and also recommend suitable minimum rates for learners and minors. These rates may be changed when the cost of living rises or falls. Reviewing the four years of experience with the law, Elizabeth Brandeis, Secretary of the District of Columbia Minimum Wage Board, refers to the common arguments that a minimum wage becomes a maximum and that it results in a displacement of women by men. Of these objections she says: "The figures of the District taking the various industrial groups together show that in 1922 over fifty per cent. of the women and minor workers subject to minimum wage rates were actually receiving wages above those fixed by law. It is clear that the minimum far from becoming the maximum is scarcely even the standard wage. As to displacement of women by men, a comparison of a large number of identical establishments in each industrial group shows that between 1919, the high water mark of business prosperity, and 1922 there has been absolutely no decrease in the number of women employed; the figures show an increase of 0.2 per cent. Apparently despite the introduction of minimum wage rates which substantially raised wages, the position in which women used to be employed are still filled by women." Miss Brandeis further points out that while there is no conclusive evidence on the point, the contention that the apparent gain to the workers through a minimum wage is offset by a rise in the price of the product, has not been sustained. The courts have been called upon to pass on the constitutionality of minimum wage laws. In April, 1917, the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the decision of the Supreme Court of Oregon upholding the constitutionality of the Oregon law. In Arkansas, Kansas, Massachusetts, Minnesota, and Washington the courts have upheld the constitutionality of such legislation. The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia rendered an adverse decision on the District law on November 6, 1922, as recorded in the Information Service of December 2, 1922. The case has been carried to the Supreme Court of the United States and its decision is awaited. Twelve States (Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Kansas, Massachusetts, Minnesota, North Dakota, Oregon, Utah, Washington, Wisconsin), and the District of Columbia already have minimum wage laws.

THE NEAR EAST RELIEF ANNUAL REPORT

Ten countries now are co-operating through the Near East Relief and kindred societies to solve the problems of the Near East by humanitarian effort and good-will, Charles V. Vickrey, general secretary of that organization, told Congress in his annual report. Expenditures aggregating $82,266,548.38 were reported by the Near East Relief since 1915 for the succor of the many thousands made homeless and destitute by war, race hatred and deportation and other tragedies in the field of its operations. The report not only reviews and summarizes the tremendous task and almost insurmountable problems which fell upon the shoulders of the Near East Relief in consequence of the Smyrna fire and hegira of Christians from Turkey, but points also to examples of co-operation and helpfulness which have been given by the Russian Soviet Republic of Armenia and by the government of Greece. The largest work of the Near East Relief has been among the hordes of refugees who fled from Turkey to Armenia in 1915, and quotes the President of the Armenian Republic and other authorities as declaring that at least five hundred thousand of the one million Armenians in that area would have perished from starvation if it had not been for American relief. The treasurer's report shows the Near East Relief's income for 1922 to have been $10,714,070 as compared to disbursements of $12,280,325, an excess of expenses over receipts which amounted to $1,566,254. This was made up by drawing upon the balance which had been carried over from the previous year. It leaves a reserve of $328,389. The excess in disbursements over the previous year is due to the emergency resulting from the burning of Smyrna and the great exodus of Christian peoples from Turkish Nationalist territory—Anatolia and Eastern Thrace. To provide the thousands of orphans which have been brought out of Turkey with new homes in Greece, Syria or Palestine involves further extraordinary expense; but the opinion is expressed that in the end this will prove to be a blessing in disguise by placing them where they can be more quickly and easily made self-supporting by industrial training. The number of orphans under the care of the organization, now aggregating 115,000, is expected to increase as the tragedies of the Christian migrations are bringing daily to Near East Relief institutions additional children "who cannot be refused without bringing shame upon our nation."

THE CONTINUING RAILWAY SHOPMEN'S STRIKE

It has doubtless been generally assumed that the shopmen's strike of last summer was terminated on all of the roads with the signing of the Baltimore agreement. As a matter of fact, only a little more than half of the roads have settled with the shopmen in accordance with the terms of that agreement, and it is estimated that nearly half of the shopmen who struck on July 1, eight months ago, are still out. On the eastern roads alone which have not accepted the terms of the agreement (Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, Delaware and Hudson, Ontario and Western, Central of New Jersey, Lehigh Valley, Boston and Maine, New York, New Haven and Hartford, and the Pennsylvania), the group known as the "eastern coal carrying roads," approximately 51,500 shopmen are still on strike out of a total of about 63,400 who went out on July 1. This situation obtains in other centers where the roads have declined the terms of the Baltimore agreement. Deterioration of railroad equipment, slow and poor transportation, both of passengers and freight, and long delays in the delivery of necessities, such as coal, are the results of this situation. Conditions due to the failure to settle the strike have become serious enough in Colorado to cause Governor William E. Sweet to serve notice on the railroads of that State that they must furnish "adequate and continuous service" or take the consequences. The Governor's statement, as quoted by the "Denver Post," said: "Reasonable service has not been given by the railroads, and the situation has become so unbearable that facts concerning the failure of our railroads to discharge their obligations to the public should be the subject of official investigation and action." The "Denver Post" goes on to say: "The Governor intimates that if the railroads do not take steps immediately to remedy the situation they may face revocation of their franchises. Numerous instances are cited where the railroads have failed to furnish cars, resulting in a loss to farmers, stockmen, fruit growers, miners and merchants. It is intimated that if the railroads are unable to furnish service in any other manner the Governor may force them to take their striking shopmen back in order that their equipment may be kept in shape." The strike has lasted so long that the shopmen have come to the end of their resources and the winter has brought hardships and suffering. A committee has been formed in New York with offices at 1130 Fifth Avenue, of which Rev. Richard W. Hogue is treasurer, to assist financially the men still on strike and to take steps to bring about a settlement in accordance with the Baltimore agreement on the roads which have thus far been unwilling to accept its terms.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

A GLIMPSE OF CHINA FROM THE INSIDE

In a letter just received a correspondent who has seen China from the inside for twelve or fifteen years gives a fairly cheerful view of the political situation there. Harking back to the recent war, he reports that Wu Pei Fu fought well, as he has before; his friend Feng was a very large factor. Chang was thoroughly beaten, and at last got back outside the Great Wall. Hsu Shih Ch'ang suddenly slid out, as you might say, from the Presidential chair! Li Yuan Hung, in Tientsin retirement since 1917, consented to resume his office. "At this time, in June, there was a great feeling of hope for China's reunification and forward progress. Many of these hopes have been sadly disappointed. The Peking government is still corrupt, and subject to constant change and confusion. Finances are precarious. Bandits, as well as Tu-Chuns, abound. But I must say that at many points, the condition, even of the Government, seems to me far better than before the Spring War. President Li does not have the strength needed; but he is honest—a great improvement on wily Hsu. Bankruptcy and corruption are perhaps not worse than at several other times during the Republic. There seems no way of eliminating these military governors and their unpaid robber-soldiers at once; but their power ebbs. We have a constitutional Parliament now, in Peking; they bicker and trifle, but they represent South as well as North. There is no longer a 'Dr. Sun's Republic,' though he still plots. A few men are doing steady constructive work, here and there. General Feng is now posted in Peking. Where this fits in the political chess game, we don't know; but if he is to head up a true National Army, it may augur very well. He is an effective soldier; a simple-minded man: an out-and-out Christian."

BREAKING DOWN THE BARRIERS TO PAN-AMERICANISM

The calling of the fifth Pan-American Conference to meet in Santiago, Chile, in March, 1923, offers the greatest opportunity ever presented to the American Continent to break down the barriers which have divided the American nations for more than a century. We are gravely concerned with the evidence that reaches us from day to day that large companies of Latin Americans in the twenty southern countries are growing more prejudiced against the United States. The most talked of Latin American at the present time is Gabriela Mistral, the Chilean poetess. She is now visiting Mexico as the guest of that government, and from there will visit several other Latin American countries. In an article which has been published in every Latin American country she says that there are two things which must unite Hispanic America: First, the beautiful Spanish language; and, second, the pain caused by the United States.

The agenda at the Santiago Conference is to be enlarged. Uruguay has insisted that the question be discussed concerning an American League of Nations. It is easy to see the many questions involved in such a question; America's attitude to the World League, a definition of the status of the Monroe Doctrine, a determination of the status of the small states like Haiti, now under control of the United States, conditions under which American governments shall be recognized, etc.

Two other topics of especial interest to the churches because of their relationship to international peace are the codification of American international law, and disarmament. The latter subject will bring on a hard fight. There has been tremendous excitement throughout Latin America in the last few months because of the appointment by the United States of a Naval Mission to Brazil to help Brazil build up her navy. Argentina says that we are denying all that we proposed to do in the Disarmament Conference.

Still another question which interests the churches is the consideration of measures to secure the progressive diminution in the consumption of alcoholic beverages. It is very significant that Latin American countries are interested in having this matter thoroughly discussed.

We should do all possible to impress our delegates with the importance of making the Conference count for building political and social co-operation. The churches should follow closely the proceedings of the Conference.

A recent meeting called by the Commission on International Justice and Good-will of the Federal Council of the Churches took action which effectively summarizes the concern of the churches in the issues involved in the coming conference. The resolution reads:

"We urge that in connection with the coming fifth Pan-American Conference, our nation do all in its power to cultivate amity and friendship with the Latin American nations and so to prevent the development on our continent of the spirit of distrust and suspicion that has led the European continent into its present morass."

EDITORIAL

EDITORIAL STAFF

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

Frederick Lynch

ASSOCIATE EDITOR

Henry Strong Huntington

MANAGING EDITOR

Benson Y. Landis

LITERARY EDITOR

Tertius Van Dyke

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Edmund de Schweinitz Brunner

CONTRIBUTING STAFF

Henry A. Atkinson
Peter Ainslie
Hugh Black
S. Parkes Cadman

Sidney L. Gulick
Rufus M. Jones
E. Guy Talbott
T. Rhondda Williams

EDITORIAL COUNCIL

William C. Allen
Nehemiah Boynton
William Adams Brown
Howard Duffield
Sherwood Eddy
Irving Fisher
J. W. Johnson

Charles S. Macfarland
Shailer Mathews
George Foster Peabody
George A. Plimpton
Howard C. Robbins
Fred B. Smith
Cornelius Woelfkin

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS

Austria: Professor Carl Beth
Canada: Dr. J. Lovell Murray
Czechoslovakia: Professor Francis Zilka
France: Rev. Professor Wilfred Monod
Germany: Direktor A. Hinderer
Great Britain: Rev. Sidney M. Berry
Hungary: Dr. S. Szabo
Switzerland: Pastor Adolph Keller

What Are the Fundamentals?

FOR several years now we have been hearing much of the Fundamentals of the Faith. A large group composed of both clergymen and laymen have organized themselves into a body to protect these fundamentals. They have been producing a large body of literature and have captured some of the religious weeklies. They have also been watching the utterances of theological professors and preachers suspected of liberal tendencies. Dr. Fosdick's sermon in which he dwelt on the Virgin birth and inspiration was admittedly called for by some declarations of this group and was in the nature of a reply.

No one can have any objections to the most eager efforts of any group to defend the faith and to insist that the fundamentals be entirely guarded. From every side the fundamentals are being challenged—in books, in the press, in novels and on the stage. The events of the last eight years have caused many to challenge not only the fundamentals of the faith, but the fundamentals of Christian morality as well. We would be the first to welcome any concerted movement of the Church to state with conviction and passion the great fundamentals of the faith. The danger is that a group, perhaps a small group within the Church, will arrogate to itself to say what these fundamentals are and to insist that everyone within the Church shall accept their definition of what they are. We are afraid that this is what is happening in some degree and it moves us to ask: "What are the fundamental doctrines of the faith?"

The question is easily answered. Any doctrine is a fundamental which determines character, is necessary for salvation and determines the destiny of the human soul. This is the answer that has been universally accepted by the Christian Church in its history and is the only absolute test to-day. There is no final test other than this.

Thus the doctrine of the incarnation is a fundamental. It is the heart of Christianity. There is no Christianity without it. It determines the Christian's life and his outlook upon the world. If God was not in Jesus Christ reconciling the world to Himself, if our humanity has not been touched by Divinity, if God is not in His children, then we may be Buddhists, Mohammedans or anything else, but we are not Christians and we have lost the indwelling of God through Christ which is our chief source of strength, peace and salvation. The incarnation is a fundamental. But the method of the incarnation is not; the Virgin birth is accepted by most Christians because the evidence for it seems trustworthy, but the Virgin birth is not the incarnation. Should the evidence be found insubstantial, still the incarnation remains a fact. God could have come into Christ by natural processes of birth had He so chose, as well as by miraculous method. How He incarnated Himself is not a fundamental; that He did possess Jesus Christ and through him humanity itself, is a fundamental.

The doctrine of inspiration is a fundamental because it determines character and by it God accomplishes His plan of redemption. If the human soul is not capable of being touched by divinity both to divine utterances and holy deeds, then we have no religion left: nothing but ethics determined by the common good and human thoughts born only of human impulse. The glory of our faith has been the heavenly thoughts of prophets, poets and the thinkers and the heroic deeds of apostles, disciples and martyrs, inspired by the indwelling God. There is no such thing in the world as the eleventh chapter of Hebrews on the one hand or the epistles of St. John on the other without inspiration. It is a fundamental of the Christian faith—God speaking and doing through holy men. But any particular method of inspiration may not be a fundamental of the faith at all, and it is the most calamitous thing that could happen to Christianity to have any self-constituted group of men insist that a certain method of inspiration, verbal, or any other, was a fundamental. It is not: and every era of the Christian Church is evidence that it is not. Dwight L. Moody and Henry Drummond held antipodal views of the method, but who shall say that either of these prophets of the Lord did not believe in inspiration with all his mind and soul. John Hall and Phillips Brooks held radically different views of the method of inspiration. One seemed to believe that God almost literally dictated every word of the Scriptures; the other believed that God possessed the sacred writers with His Spirit and through this possession they were moved to write—but who dare say that either of them did not find his whole source of comfort and assurance in the inspiration of the Scriptures? Inspiration is a fundamental: the mode or method is not.

The same is true of the revelation of God. Revelation is a fundamental. If it is not then we are not sons of God and have no way of knowing His character or will. If there is no revelation of God then we are in a godless world so far as we human beings are concerned. The very foundation of Christianity is the revelation of the nature, character, will and purpose of God in Jesus Christ and godly men. We are materialists or positivists or ethical culturists or gentle agnostics or anything else if we do not believe God reveals Himself to man and man can speak in prayer to the revealed God. Revelation is a fundamental of the Christian faith; but the method of revelation, or any limitation of it to any particular time or place or book is not a fundamental at all. Here again all history proves our contention—proves it so self-evidently that we need not even turn to illustrations.

EDITORIAL

The doctrine of the Atonement is a fundamental of the Christian faith. Jesus Christ and Him crucified was the gospel the apostles carried to both the Jewish and the heathen world. The cross has surmounted the Church in all times and places. It is the symbol of our faith. There is no Christianity apart from God suffering for the sins of His children. Christ dying to save men from their sins and by revealing to them the heart of God; making men one with Him again is not only a fact in history but is part of an eternal process. Always God in His infinity is stooping to man in his finiteness; always the holy Christ is offering himself upon the perpetual cross; always the pure by suffering and forgiveness are saving the sinful; always the strong are giving their lives for the weak; always the good are dying with Christ for the sins of the world. The atonement is a fundamental law of the spiritual universe as gravitation is of the earth. St. Peter dying as did his Lord; Savonarola being burned in Florence; Livingstone falling by the way in Africa; the youth of the nations offering their lives in Flanders—all these are imitating Calvary. The atonement is being reproduced in degree wherever the pure, the strong, the holy, sacrifice themselves with Christ that others may live, others be saved:

"Wherever through the ages rise
The altars of self-sacrifice;
Where love its arms has opened wide,
And man for man has calmly died,
I see the same white wings outspread
That hovered o'er the Master's head."

The atonement is a fundamental: but no doctrine—governmental, substitutionary, or any other is, and any group of men which arrogates to itself the right to say to the brethren, you must believe this or that theory, should remember that many theories have been held and even the one they are advocating may have been one which was once condemned as heretical. The fact of the atonement is a fundamental: no theory of it can ever be.

The fact that Christ is the living Christ, is close to His children, claims the world as his world, purposes to set up his Kingdom in it, judges it as its constituted judge is on every page of the gospels, is the continued note of the epistles and is in all the Christian creeds. It is a fundamental of the Christian faith. His presence is our comfort, his plan for a City of God in the world our goal, our inspiration in all our effort; that we shall see him some day face to face our hope and our reward. Surely he comes to his children. But no particular doctrine such as that of his second coming, in this place or that, at this time or that, or his coming to the world again in bodily form is a fundamental in any degree whatever, because it has no relation to character and certainly is not necessary to salvation. The only thing necessary to salvation is that Christ and the soul shall meet: that he will appear again in bodily form is only a theory of his coming.

Here again all the experience of the Church bears witness to our contention. In any town or city part of the Christians believe in the second coming; part do not. Part of the pastors of our Churches believe in it; part do not. But who shall say that those who do believe it are holier, more spiritual, more fully saved than those who do not? A doctrine which millions of the best Christians in the world do not hold, and do not find necessary to salvation can never be a fundamental of the faith.

Once more: The resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ from the dead is a fundamental of the Christian faith. There can be no Christianity, whatever else there be, with a dead Christ. We can take his teachings for what they are worth, admire and imitate his pure life, but that is not Christianity. Christianity was from the beginning and is eternally the gospel of the living Christ—the Christ who lived God before men, was dead, buried, rose again from the dead and is alive forevermore. His resurrection is a fundamental because it is the pledge of our own immortality, the sign of his own victory, and is power in us—power of the immortality that is ours. Our whole life is changed as is our whole thought of life, so also are our hearts filled with hope, courage and the consciousness of our immortality. The resurrection of Jesus Christ touches every Christian's brow with divinity. It is a fundamental. But no theory of the resurrection can ever be a fundamental, because it does not matter whether the old body came forth from the tomb or whether the Lord of life appeared to the disciples and Mary, whom He loved, in a glorified or spiritual body. No theory of His resurrection can be a fundamental: the fundamental, the power to salvation, is the fact that he rose again from the dead and liveth forevermore.

We have been constrained to write these words in answer to many letters showing much perplexity. We hope they will help sincere and perplexed souls. We do not want Roman Catholicism fastened on the Protestant Church. The very genius and distinctive thing about Roman Catholicism is that it insists on telling its priests and adherents that they must accept the interpretation of the Scriptures held by the authorities as well as the facts of Scripture themselves. This is what some who call themselves fundamentalists are attempting to do. It belongs to Roman Catholicism, not Protestantism.

F. L.

Protestantism and the World's Necessities

PART V.

THE last and perhaps the greatest immediate service which Protestantism can render the world is to redress the balance between Church and State. Behind the seething spirit of revolt and the wild stirrings of public opinion lies a deep-seated distrust of nationalism as the source of war. Since Hegel announced that the State was absolute, an end in itself, and the organon of its own moralities, the cult of militarism has been both exalted and cast down. Its semi-divinities are now depressed but not vanquished. The peoples of Europe, betrayed by perfidious rulers, are obsessed with fear lest the Hegelian doctrine should revive, and another Baal be set up in blood and terror. It is this dread which explains three-fourths of our international and diplomatic imbroglios. Revolutionary labor, pleas and counter pleas for the mutilation or the restoration of Germany, the French alliances with Poland, secret treaties with the Turk, and the chronic excitement of the Balkan States, can be traced to the determination that the white race must not permit another orgy of massacre. Protestants who believe that the leadership of that race will not survive a second world war see no possibility of preventing it save by the increased control of Christianity over international affairs. But to gain the control they must be Christians first and nationalists afterwards. Situated, as we are, between Pagan traditions which ennoble tribal relations and war and Christian teachings which pledge its end in universal brotherhood, the choice must be made as to which we shall hereafter obey. For had not the Church been narrowly defined by nationalist boundaries, and defiled by an idolatrous subservience to the State, the good the late war accomplished might have been obtained without shedding of blood, and the incalculable evil it left in its train might have been avoided.

E D I T O R I A L

Whatever may be said in praise of patriotism, surely it is limited by righteousness and subordinate to justice! There is need for lucid thinking at this point. The conception of the State as a concrete part of the "Absolute" in which all opposites are reconciled, suits Caesarism, but it does not explain the verities forced upon us by dreadful circumstances. This "Absolute" has neither organism nor purpose. It is neither personal nor impersonal. It possesses no qualities for good or evil. Its asserted perfection is a myth. As a metaphysical dream, skilfully elaborated, without moral character or consistency, Hegel's ideal is a striking illustration of the havoc wrought by erroneous speculation. It destroys the freedom of the individual by consigning him, body and soul, to the State. The essential differences between the State and the Church and between the State and society at large are lost in the process of consignment. Because much organized human life is outside the purview of the State, its alignments traverse State frontiers. The reaction against the fatal heresy that the State is unconditional and supreme should be promoted and yet restrained by the Church. The moral attainments which she emphasizes are produced by self-determination as against mere impulse. But how can self-determination operate if the State is all and in all? Protestantism has a mission to guard the ethical and religious truths which enrich every political heritage. It can show that the claims of the individual upon the State and of the State upon the individual are reciprocal. Both sets of claims are conditioned by the fact that man's obligations as a spiritual being must be duly honored. The State is a body of persons, recognized by each other as having rights, and having a constitution for the maintenance of those rights. Thus, while the State is more important than any citizen, it cannot be indifferent to the rights of any single citizen. The Church is, as we have said, the congregation of God's faithful people upon the earth, who unreservedly accept the spirit, the life, and the teachings of Jesus Christ as their standards of belief and practice. And if theocracy as taught by the Bible is the one lasting foundation of democracy, blessed is that people whose God is the Lord! And equally blessed is that State which applies Biblical precepts to belated and brutal conditions of old-time nationalism.

S. P. C.

Round the World and Back Again

[EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE]

PART II.

JAPAN reminds you of a youth in the turbulence of the adolescent period, but growing out of it very fast, indeed. Welcoming with great eagerness Western civilization, she is rapidly taking it over into her own hands, and in political, commercial and social relations is increasingly showing her utmost resentment in having them imposed upon her, and her burning desire of having them reposed in her, with all the implications, correlaries and respect which such disposition rightfully requires.

It opens your eyes wider than ever before; they are filled with wonder and surprise, but when you close them for a quick meditation you find yourself thinking, "If I were Japanese I should certainly think so, too!"

You sail from Yokohama by way of the inland sea and Shanghai. Across the China Sea to Manila is a quarter section of the delight of Paradise, which does not abate when you find yourself again on American soil and within the jurisdiction of that capacious patriot, Major General Wood, who is nobly fulfilling a delicate task of the very greatest importance to the future of the Philippine Islands and of the world. The old Spanish city, still within its walls, is most fascinating in its reminiscent suggestion of yesterday. The new American city surrounding those ancient walls is simply prophecy domesticating itself. The colonizing power of democracy is in distinct and grateful evidence, while the attractive charm, the rapid development and the expectancy of independence combine to make Manila a thing of beauty and a joy forever.

Of course, the enthusiastic youth and the calculating politician are ready and eager for independence at once and instantly, but the cooler heads, the broader judgments and the wiser thinkers, while friendly to the ultimate suggestion, are disinclined by precipitate action to illustrate in modern times the ancient debacle that "Ephraim is a coke half baked."

Hongkong, Shanghai and Canton would offer most attractive places of detention, but we must hasten to Peking, a city most remarkable, having perhaps as much for the imagination as almost any city in the world. In such a city one sees Western civilization in the very act of seeping in, just as sometimes in the early dawn one can see the daylight challenging the midnight darkness on its irresistible way to conquer it. The darkness is still there, but so is the rosy-fingered light! I saw in half an hour upon a great thoroughfare all the modes of transportation since creation's dawn; saw the man with the huge burden on his back; saw the camels from the desert carrying the burden at the behest of men; saw the Peking cart; saw the locomotive; saw, and dodged for my life, the automobile; and saw the airplane "cleaving the sky."

But these casual visions and the historical ones like the temple of Confucius, the marvelous temple of Heaven, and the wall of the British Legation, with the single section left as it was after the onslaught of the Boxer rebellion, with the simple legend attached, "Lest we forget," played by the Gloria Trumpeteers, all intensely interesting, could not cloud for me my thrilling interest in the real value of the work of the missionaries and the strength of the moral influence of my own country in the Chinese Republic.

EDITORIAL

One of my choice friends was a Catholic priest, who gave me many a suggestion of the work of Catholic missions in China and whose appreciation of Protestant missions was gratifyingly calm, judicial and comprehensively sympathetic. For the Christian missionary in China is not primarily a denominational representative. He is a pioneer of Christian civilization, with a scope and inclusion in his work which makes him a real empire builder.

You do not know the real power of a missionary as you see him at home on a furlough; he is away from his task; often he does not loom large; but see him in his work in a great city and he is truly a major general of the Coming Day. The sweep of his power and the extent of his influence are a revelation. True, there are 130 different Christian approaches to the four hundred million Chinese souls, two hundred millions of whom know not even the name of Christ; true, denominationalism is the most confusing situation which confronts a Chinese seeking light, but true also that in spite of this handicap which, thank Heaven, gradually shrivels, the message of Christianity persists and the fundamentals of Christianity proceed.

By her churches and chapels, by her Y. M. C. A., by such institutions as Peking Union Medical College, in whose hospital I, having the first experience of my life with a surgeon, found that the expert who was operating for my benefit was a Brooklyn boy whom I knew years ago as a boy in knickerbockers running around Washington Avenue; by the serviceful life and sacrificial devotion of those wonderful men and women to China, to her religious, intellectual, social, civil, philanthropic life, these men and women of the Cross, Protestant and Catholic, are building the foundations of the mighty, vast, world-powerful China that is to be. Missionary work is no merely pious aspiration; it is spiritual, it is solid, it is stupendous!

But what about American "moral influence?" Historically it is very great. John Hay is not forgotten; the "open door" is not closed, and China regards America as perhaps her best friend in the world.

China is proud of our Ambassador. Thank God for that! And especially proud should every citizen of the State of New York be that a man of the proportion, the power and the personality of Ambassador Schurman, our fellow citizen, represents us so nobly in Far Cathay. He is wise without being conceited, brave without being a bully, cultured without needing cuss words for adequate self-expression, dignified but not aristocratic, zealous as representing his country, sympathetic to the country to which he is accredited. A great, splendid, human American!

Just at present it is difficult for China to understand the official relation of America to the world. China is in the League of Nations with fifty-one other of the sixty nations in the world. Why is America with the other eight, the three more important ones being Russia, Turkey and Germany? China can understand why these three nations are out. But why the great United States? The contradiction between her own experience with the United States and our present attitude she finds very difficult to explain.

The bold and barren fact is that this question meets the American traveler in every country he visits. Step upon the soil of Britain, it is there. Make your bed in France, and lo, it is there. Take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, in Japan, China, India, and even there the question is mooted in the press, on the platform. Everywhere it is the most debated, defended and denied question in the world. An American meets it everywhere, and, believe me, he needs all his wisdom and a good supply of wit to meet many a perplexing situation!

Have you noticed how almost to a man travelers come home to America with very positive convictions regarding our duty to the world? There is hardly a "standpatter" or an isolationist in the crowd. To be sure, there was one from the Court of St. James the other day, but as he was a purely political appointment, there may possibly be a trail leading from his appointment to his attitude. But the overwhelming majority of oversea travelers are of one mind. America out of the League of Nations is in the awkward squad, when she should be leading the battalions. She is jeopardizing her moral influence, which is her glory. Her position has been accurately described as "sympathy without responsibility; good-will operating in a vacuum."

The world is rapidly losing the gains to civilization for which the war was fought, and for making the world safe for democracy, democracy is decidedly on the side lines!

A returned traveler from the Far East, from Britain, France, Germany, Denmark, who has no time to speak of his interview with Lloyd George, his audience with the Archbishop of Canterbury, or his reception by the King of Denmark, and who has no language but a cry, must use even that to beg his fellow Americans to believe that the question of America's association with the nations for the saving of the world is the greatest international question of the age, upon whose reopening and reconsideration, not only the fate of empires is hanging, but more than many appreciate, the fortune of our own country.

Our politicians are in danger of being our national demotors, not our promoters.

The Constitution of the United States begins, "We, the people." Oh, blessed words! Let them ring true again to their original meaning, and with an aroused conscience, which already stirs, let the people demand a reappraisal and reconsideration of the mighty questions; that it no longer be our shame as it was of Laertes':

"The wind sits in the corner of your sail,
And you are stay'd for."

NEHEMIAH BOYNTON.

The Old Preacher

BY DON C. SEITZ.

All his life
In kindly gentle ways
He toiled
To mend mankind:
Preached mercy,
Fed the poor,
Gave oft the welcome hand
To passing strangers,
And in his daily course
Comforted
Sad lives.
But when his hair grew gray
And his thin voice
Reached only to the middle
Of the church,
His congregation
Generously
Gave him
The key to the street!—Watchman-Examiner.

THE OBSERVER

Always We Dream Utopias

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

It is a remarkable sign of the imperishable faith of man, a sign that hope springs eternal in the human heart, that in spite of the wickedness manifested by every generation and the seemingly ineradicable selfishness of men and nations, in every century someone comes along and sings the millennium or pictures a Utopian city on the earth. I suppose that even out of the present welter of the world where selfishness and slaughter seem to be the two outstanding traits of humanity, someone will rise and dream of a millennium upon earth where France and Germany will sit with loving arms about each other and all the people of Europe will call one another brothers and our own nation say service to other nations is our truest destiny. There has never been a century that some poet has not sung of a Jerusalem, the Golden, to rise upon the earth, or some philosopher has not drawn up plans for a city of God, and these poets and philosophers have not been the weak and sentimental of the earth. They have been among earth's biggest men who have played with universes in their minds, as a child plays with tennis balls, men who have so determined the thought of the world that we are all thinking in their terms to-day—Plato, Augustine and Lord Bacon. The idea that somehow God has ordered His world so that good is to come out of ill; that the Kingdom of God is ultimately to be a reality; that there is some divine event, even though far off, toward which all creation moves, will not seem to down. From the Hebrew prophets down to Tolstoy the seers see it, the prophets preach it.

These thoughts came to me from the reading last week of a rather remarkable book, which has just been published by the Macmillan Company, "The History of Utopian Thought," by Joyce Oramel Hertzler, of the University of Wisconsin. I picked up the book with peculiar interest, for it was only a few weeks ago that I was saying what an interesting employment it would be to go through history and examine the dreams of Utopias as dreamed in one century after another, and make a collection of them, so to speak. I even half thought I might like to do it myself, and now someone has done it. Dr. Hertzler began with the Old Testament prophets, examining their dreams of a golden, Messianic age, when the earth should be full of peace and good-will, and then devoted considerable space to the examination of Jesus' ideal of the Kingdom of God and the apocalyptic hopes of the New Testament. All this has been done before in one way and another, and while interesting and valuable is not quite so unique a contribution as the examination of the various definite proposals for Utopias in the sense of regular organized societies in which there should be happiness, contentment, plenty, love, and good-will.

One does not always remember how many great dreams of these heavenly societies there have been until he reads Dr. Hertzler's interesting book. First, there was Plato's "Republic." What a wonderful dream it was, and what an influence it has had upon the world! I suppose there is hardly anything that has been suggested in modern educational methods that is not in the "Republic," at least, in germ. For my readers will remember that about two hundred pages of the four hundred in the Jowett edition are devoted to discussion of how children should be educated for citizenship in this wonderful state. Unfortunately, the extreme emphasis put on the state by Plato has probably had no little part in developing that extreme patriotism which bore logical fruit in Germany in 1914, and which is always threatening to plunge the world into strife. For in Plato's Utopia the citizen is so subordinated to the state that he practically loses all individuality. As Dr. Hertzler says: "All individual self-will and selfishness must be subordinated to the common will and common good as dictated by the spiritual and intellectual guides." These guides, by the way, assume a very high place in Plato's state. They are to be men not only of the highest training, but of the highest virtue. There is nothing really democratic in Plato's ideal state and working men are not much more than slaves. (For anyone who wants to spend a few hours contemplating some of the highest thoughts that have ever come from the mind of man, let him get Jowett's translation of "The Republic." Jowett's analysis of "The Republic," which precedes it in the translation, is also a remarkable piece of work.)

The other Utopia which can rank with Plato's dream in real greatness is Augustine's "City of God." It is entirely and absolutely different from Plato's vision inasmuch as where Plato goes into great detail regarding the organization and government of his ideal state Augustine dwells upon the fundamental relationship of the soul of God, which, if attained by all individuals, would eventuate in a heavenly city on the earth. There are twenty-two chapters in Augustine's great work. The first five are given to an attack on the Paganism of his day and are terrific in their scathing words; the next five are devoted to criticism of the prevailing philosophic systems of the day; while the remaining twelve chapters, which are the ones that chiefly interest us to-day, are devoted to an exposition of the two contrasting doctrines: Augustine's "City of God" and the existing "City of Men." The "City of God" consists of those who wish to live after the spirit and "is founded upon the love of God and contempt of self." The city of men is made up of those who wish to live after the flesh and is based upon the love of self and contempt of God. To quote Dr. Hertzler: "Augustine's Utopianism centers about this life according to God. It consists in the first place of freedom from the baser passions and lusts and the practise of a religious, specifically Christian, ethics. . . . Finally, the bond of agreement in the divine city is the love of God as is shown when he defines a state as an assemblage of reasonable beings bound together by a common agreement as to the objects of their love. Through humble love of God, we renounce self and lust and receive God and His law, and thus united by means of this divine beneficence are prepared for the City of God. This is a beatific vision of a social life in which the personality of the individual is bound to that of other individuals through God, truly the highest stage of moral perfection." I have not space to dwell upon Augustine's great work, but in it one finds not only his own opinions on every conceivable theological and philosophical subject, but also finds every opinion held by his age examined. Poujoulat called it "the encyclopedia of the fifth century." All the theological thinking of the last 1,500 years has been colored by it.

I cannot in this short letter go into the other Utopias which are among those dreams that for a time held spellbound the minds of men and then passed away—were abandoned with great sorrow by disappointed souls. Yet it is not fair to say they entirely passed away for something of the dream entered permanently into the thoughts of men. There was the "Utopia" of Sir Thomas More, which made such an impression on his contemporaries that it was held as a sort of Bible among them and the name was given to all future millennium dreams; there was the "New Atlantis" by Francis Bacon, a land of freedom and justice where the principles afterwards expounded in the great "Novum Organum" were to be carried out; there was the "City of the Sun" by Campanella, the great Italian (written, by the way, in the same year Lord Bacon wrote the "New Atlantis"—1623), a city of light and love wherein all social injustices would disappear forever; finally there was Harrington's "Oceana," written in 1656, that wonderful dream of a state in which the sovereignty of the people should be supreme, in which "King People" should rule justly.

These are the great classic Utopias although, perhaps, one should include among them, as Dr. Hertzler does, Savonarola's attempt to found a theocracy in Florence. But this has no enduring form in literature. Dr. Hertzler devotes eighty pages of his book to a survey of these different attempts to found Utopian colonies. They have been many such attempts actuated by the noblest idealism and the most beautiful humanism, but none have endured for long, partly because of weak, selfish human nature, partly because it is impossible to isolate a community in this wicked world. Chief among these are Fourier, whose disciples essayed several communities, and Robert Owen, who might perhaps be called the father of modern trades-unionism. Other names always associated with these are Saint Simon, Etienne Cabet and Louis Blanc. I am a little surprised that Dr. Hertzler makes no mention of the Brook Farm experiment, for while it made no particular contribution to the Utopian literature and never attracted any considerable number of disciples to participate in the experiment, yet it was one of the most idealistic points in American history and full of romance and Emerson, Hawthorne, Margaret Fuller, and others of the immortals abode there for a time.

There is nothing more fascinating to read about than these Utopias. They take one out of this miserable, materialistic, selfish, bloodthirsty world up into a land of pure, serene delight. And as one reads it is all so simple, so seemingly easy, so beautiful, like a fairy story or a Brahms symphony where everything moves by the law of divine harmony. But, alas, in operation they do not work. The wheat and the tares are too closely intermingled in this world and sometimes it looks as though they must grow together until the harvest. They could work if all men would live in good-will toward each other, but all men will not and there is no way of making them. Even as I write these words, I read from an eminent citizen "Self-assertion is the law for both man and nations. All this talk about brotherhood and love is sentimental mush." Thus we have our Utopians preaching Christ as the law of life, but we have as many Nietzscheans preaching Caesar. The Utopias are impossible in a world where half the people and half the nations do not believe in good-will.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Free Church Criticisms: A Reply

By A. C. Headlam, M.A., D.D.

Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford and Bishop-Designate of Gloucester

[NOTE.—This is the second sermon in the series to which we referred last week, and is in the nature of a reply to the positions taken by Principal Selbie, of Mansfield College.]

IN the short time at my disposal I propose to deal for the most part with some of those criticisms which Dr. Selbie put before us.

Dr. Selbie says: "Free Churchmen feel that ever since Lambeth the emphasis has been too strongly laid on the side of order and organization."

That is a very great problem for all Christian people and for the united Church, to decide exactly how much unity of order is required. On the one side you have the Roman Church, and the volume of the Roman Canon Law shows that there is a Church with a very elaborate and very carefully worked out system of order, penetrating into every particular relationship of life. Dr. Selbie's own Church, the Congregationalists, would, I suppose, represent very much the opposite way of looking at things; the great stress laid on Congregational liberty, the great stress laid upon individuality, the fear of checking the life of the spirit by the influence of bureaucracy. There is the problem before us and which we are approaching: What amount of unity of order is necessary in the Christian Church? On the one side, undoubtedly we require some order. If the whole of the Christians in England are to be united in one society you must have some sort of system of order. On the other side, I suppose we all as Englishmen read very particularly the evils of anything like bureaucracy. We feel that we want individual initiative. In the Church of England we have very great variety, and every effort to increase to any excessive extent the idea of order immediately creates some sort of revolt. Therefore the problem before us is this: What amount of order do we really require in the Christian Church of the future? The only thing I will say in answer to that is, let us turn our eyes to the early Christian Church. There you have a quite natural system of order, but you have very great elasticity, very great initiative, great power of adaptation to new circumstances; and I think that if we agree in studying that representation of the Christian order we shall get the best guide to what we require in the future.

Dr. Selbie dealt next with a rather difficult paragraph in the Report of the Joint Conference on Church Unity, saying: "Are we going to de-Christianize the Society of Friends?" The paragraph referred to by Dr. Selbie, and which was expounded with great care by the Archbishop of York, reads as follows: "Some (parts of the visible Church), indeed, may be so defective that they cannot rightly be judged to be parts of that Church. But such judgments, though made in trust that they are in accordance with the Divine Mind must be regarded as limited to the sphere of the visible Church as an ordered society here on earth. It would be presumption to claim that they have a like validity in the sphere of the whole Church as the One Body of the redeemed in Christ, for within that sphere judgment can only be given by the All-knowing Mind and Sovereign Mercy of God." Now I venture to think that Dr. Selbie, or those friends of his whom he represents, have read that paragraph with the wrong emphasis. The object of that paragraph is not to de-Christianize any particular society, but to say that even if you cannot unite with it you do not de-Christianize it. Cast our minds forward into the future, and think of the United Christian Church; however wide you draw the line, however broad your limits, undoubtedly there will be some Christian bodies that will not be able to come in. I doubt very much whether it would be possible to conceive the introduction of the Unitarians into such a body. As regards the Society of Friends, I doubt very much whether they would wish to come in: the very condition of their existence is that they are not a Church, and do not wish to be a Church, and do not wish to be part of a Church. Therefore I think that quite clearly there will be some, whatever efforts you make, who will be outside. What this paragraph shows, and it is important to bear it in mind, is that those judgments which we are obliged to make as regards the visible Church are human judgments, made in relation to human conditions, and that they are not judgments within the sphere of reality; that we do not say that because any body of Christians cannot come in with us, therefore we condemn them: whether they or whether we are to be condemned is not a matter for us to determine, we leave it to the judgment of God. But if you are to have an ordered society you must have conditions of admission.

The next question that Dr. Selbie asked was: "What is a representative and constitutional episcopate?" We mean one which will come with the whole authority of the Christian Church. We mean that when a person is appointed to his ministry he will come not merely as the minister appointed by this or that congregation, but he will have behind him the authority of the Church as a whole, and that authority has always been gained in the past through episcopal ordination. Ideally, what happens is that a diocese elects its bishop, the bishop elected by the diocese is presented for consecration to the bishops of the Province, the bishops of the Province being representative of the Church as a whole; and whatever other meanings there may be, and I am not going to discuss this matter at present, the great meaning to me of Apostolic succession has been just this representation. I think there has been a tendency to associate that idea of Apostolic succession with a good deal that will not bear investigation: the idea that through a particular channel grace has come down from Apostolic times. That I believe to be theologically a mistake, and not the meaning the Christian Church has ever given to Apostolic succession, certainly the earlier ages of the Church. Apostolic succession means that the bishop appointed is appointed, is consecrated, with the authority of the whole Church, and I look forward in the future, if we have a United Church, that ordinations and consecrations shall come with the authority of the separated portions as well as of the Church of England, that the Presbyters, the ministers of the different separated Churches, should join with us in the laying-on of hands, and that so you would get a representative episcopate, a representative ministry, a ministry representative not only of one traditional Christian Church, but all traditions, and that the ministry which is now divided should again be united.

That leads on to the next question that has been raised. What is meant by the words "episcopal ordination?" Dr. Selbie says: "We lay great stress in our Church on the call by the Spirit, and we test that vocation very fully." He then goes on: "But the actual act of ordination we regard as a purely human thing." Now I really do not think when he says that that he is saying exactly what his Church really thinks, because almost directly afterwards I read: "To us the whole matter of ordination is at once so simple and so solemn that we cannot use the word in this double sense. . . . 'Commission' we can understand, but re-ordination we cannot." I venture to think that the fact, in which I agree, that Non-conformist ministers say: "We will not be ordained," shows that they do not look upon ordination as a purely human thing, shows that they feel it means a great deal more. If ordination was a purely human thing neither I nor they nor anyone would mind being re-ordained; but we do mind being re-ordained because ordination is a great deal more than a purely human thing. We in the Church of England agree quite thoroughly with the Nonconformist Churches in accepting the calling by the Spirit. The very first question that is asked in the Anglican Ordination Service is, "Do you trust that you are truly called?" And we test it as much as they, but, unlike them, we ordain with the laying on of hands, and we mean by that not only that we give a solemn commission, but we all unite in prayer to God. An ordination, with laying on of hands, is but a symbolical prayer: the essence of the ordination lies in the prayer. We mean when we pray to God that He will give to the one that we are commissioning and the one that we are sending forth His grace for the great work to which he is called. If you recognize that prayer is the essence of an ordination I think you will feel that we really all ultimately agree about its infinite importance. But now comes that difficult question of re-ordination, and I want to put the problem before you quite clearly. On the one side, Non-conformist ministers say: "We have a commission, and we have God's Spirit, we believe, and we have tested it again and again by its spiritual blessings." We agree with them; that is what the Lambeth Conference has said. "And we think it would be untrue to our calling if we were to submit to any re-ordination." I think they are quite right. We Anglican clergy would not accept any form of re-ordination for the sake of reunion with the Eastern Church or the Church of Rome, and we have no right to ask for the same from others.

Then comes the second point in the problem, which is a difficult one. Many people, clergy of the Church of England and others, say, "We will not submit to the Sacraments being celebrated in our Church by one who has not received episcopal ordination." Again, I think that, mainly from the point of view of Church order, their position is very likely a just and a right one. But how are we to readjust it? I do not believe that the difficulty is as great as people think. Supposing reunion was to come between the Church of England and the Eastern Churches, it would mean that mutual acceptance of one another's orders, but I am quite certain that no Anglican clergyman would be considered a proper person to celebrate in an Eastern Church, nor an Eastern clergyman in the Anglican Church. In the Church of Rome at the present day there has been a reunion; there are a large number of Uniat bodies, the Uniat Greek Church, the Uniat Armenian Church, and so on; and the Church of Rome recognizes their orders quite completely, but there is no mixture of rite, as it is called. A priest of the Greek rite is not competent to celebrate according to the Latin rite, nor a priest of the Latin rite according to the Greek rite. If that be so, I see myself no reason why, in the immediate future, we should not reunite on just the same conditions. We might have intercommunion; we might preach in one another's Churches; we might be united in all good works; but those who are ordained for the Anglican rite will celebrate according to the Anglican rite in the Anglican Church, and those who are ordained by the Presbyterian or any other rite will celebrate according to their own rite in their own Churches.

Then we come to the question of the Creeds. Dr. Selbie reminds us that in the Congregational Church there has always been great reluctance to impose creeds upon anyone. The Church must be able to point, he says, to certain documents, saying, "This is our Faith," and the Nicene Creed is perhaps as good as any for the moment, but it will not do to make them impositions on any; the day is gone for that, and if ever we come to frame a constitution for the Reunited Church we should take a broader line than seems to be indicated in the report.

Therefore, I would suggest that we should take as the terms of our assent to the Creeds something of this sort: "We accept the Faith of Christ as it is taught us by the Holy Scriptures and as it has been handed down to us in the Creed of the Church." If you were to call upon everyone to make some such declaration as that, you would not be making any imposition; you would be securing our unity in faith; you would leave full freedom for interpretation; and you would take care that the emphasis was not on this or that particular document—every document which comes from human hands must be imperfect—but that the emphasis was on that Faith of Christ which is something for our heart and our conscience as well as our intellect.

Another difficulty which was raised was this. We see the opposition between Evangelical, High Church and Anglo-Catholics, and we are wondering very much which party is going to win, because that is going to make an immense difference in our attitude to any future reunion. Here I would say this. I am quite certain that no party in the Church of England is ever going to "win." The Church of England consists of a great body of clergy and laity who are members of the Church of England, some from one point of view, some from another, and there are a certain number of people whom we call extremists, who are in the habit of what you may call beating drums and holding conferences and so on, and who bulk very largely in the public mind; but I am sure that the bulk of the Church of England is Christian and Church of England and is not attached to any party primarily. But I want to go a little deeper even than this. What is to be the Church of the future? Is it to be Protestant or Catholic? I do hope we shall recognize that the time must come when these old badges cease to be reality. The Church of the future is to be not Protestant nor Catholic in that sense, but Christian, and it is to unite in itself the whole Christian tradition, both that part of it which is preserved by the Protestants and that part of which is preserved by the people who are called Catholics. That is the Church we are going to build up.

Liberty in Logan County

By Henry S. Huntington

LIKE most of the Southwestern section of West Virginia, the State is a tangle of mountains two or three thousand feet high, between which crooked rivers and creeks wind through narrow valleys, with only rare meadows. The famous Hatfield-McCoy feud was fought out nearby, over the Kentucky border, just southwest of Logan. No such famous feud developed in Logan itself, but the feud spirit was there.

In such a country the sheriff represented a power that every criminal considered he had a feud against. Therefore mountain sheriffs and their deputies learned to shoot fast and to deal roughly.

Twenty years ago enterprising coal operators began to open up the Logan County mines. Most of the farmers' families gradually gave up their attempts to get a living out of the soil and turned to mining.

From the opening of the mines, the mine operators in Logan County, as through most of West Virginia, were against unionization of their men. When a man was known to favor unions, the mines would discharge him.

The mine operator's practically controlled the county. One of the great families of the district was the Chafins. About 1908 the power behind the political throne in Logan, i.e., the coal operators and their men, elected a sheriff, a strapping twenty-year-old member of the Chafin family by the name of Don.

The Logan County authorities were determined that within their bailiwick there should be no discussion that was calculated to overturn the established order. The manner of their rule may be illustrated by the famous case of John Brown. Some ten years ago a Socialist speaker by the name of John Brown came down to Logan, the county seat. The sheriff told the man he could not speak in Logan. Brown answered that he had permission from the Governor. He went to the telephone exchange and called up the Governor to verify his statement. As he came down the steps from the exchange three deputy sheriffs attacked him and beat him up. As he rose from the ground, wounded, with his clothing torn, he asked, "Haven't I got a friend somewhere?"

"Yes," said one of the bystanders, "I'll take you to a friend." He took him to a local tailor, a man with one of the kindest hearts in Logan. The tailor sewed up Brown's clothes. But John Brown had to go out on the next train.

But there was no forgiveness for that tailor. For such deeds of kindness to those whom the authorities disliked and because he would go on the bonds of people who were arrested, and so save them from jailing, the sheriff deeply disliked him. Perhaps there was personal feeling, too. I do not know. Anyway, deputy sheriffs would arrest the tailor's men as they went about soliciting for clothes to press in the mining camps about Logan, would bring them into town, and then turn them loose with no charge against them. Such an arrest meant that a man lost his day for work.

One day on the steps of the Logan County Court House, Don Chafin was "beating up" Tom Fielder and telling him that he had to leave town. Fielder answered that he had as good a right in the town as Chafin himself. The tailor, coming down the steps, said: "Don't hit the man again, Mr. Chafin." Chafin turned on him and gave him a blow on the nose, from which he carries a scar to this day. Two of Chafin's deputies hit the tailor also. E. T. England, who is now the Attorney General of West Virginia, expostulated at the attack. "England," said Chafin, "I'll do you the same way." That night Chafin's deputies or his friends broke the windows of England's office.

The rapid increase of the membership of the United Mine Workers in West Virginia beginning in 1917, and the wave of intolerance that swept over the whole country during and after the World War intensified the ill feeling of the coal operators and of their man Chafin against unions. The coal operators pay $32,000 a year toward the salaries of the twenty-five deputy sheriffs in the county. For this the deputies guard the mine pay rolls twice a month and do other occasional specific services. But naturally they feel that the coal operators are their real employers, not the people, and they are loyal to their employers.

Don Chafin and his aids will not allow "union talk" in the county. Their attitude toward it is illustrated by the story of Jim Haney, who "talked union talk" in 1921, when he was employed by the Fort Branch Coal Company, east of Logan. Haney circulated a paper to be signed by those who wanted a union. Don Chafin immediately told him he would have to leave the "holler," i.e., the valley of which the habitable part of Logan County consists. The sheriff's men kicked and abused him and would not even give him time to go home and change his clothes or tell his wife where he was going. They put him on a train, and he went to Kentucky. About two weeks later his wife was hit by a train and knocked unconscious for twenty-four hours. Haney came back to see her, but before the week was gone the deputies notified him to get out again.

The feeling against the unions and any speech in their behalf was particularly hot, of course, during the "mine war" of 1921. That mine war is recalled by everyone in America. All sorts of stories of the oppression of men with union sympathies in the non-union southwestern counties of West Virginia had drifted out to the union miners farther North. Some of the stories, as is evidenced by what we have told, were well grounded. But tales came out, too, that in Logan County they were killing women and children.

The union miners almost spontaneously gathered to the number of five or six thousand and started a march over Blair Mountain toward Logan. Clerks, mechanics, even a young minister in Logan, took guns and went up the mountain to repel the invasion. That was only natural, of course.

Back in Logan there was such hot feeling against any one who sympathized with the miners that the sheriff and his deputies threw the law to the winds. A few miles from Logan two deputy sheriffs and the brother-in-law of one of them, without a warrant seized a young, clean-spoken painter, a union sympathizer, and proposed to take him to Logan under arrest. Their only charge against him was that he had been "talking." They accused him of saying, "I wish every ——— that goes up to shoot them poor miners would git blowed up." He absolutely denied it. But only the interposition of a bold fellow citizen saved him from jail. The deputies went off with the warning, "Now, young man, if we hear anything more from you, you'll git it."

The man who saved the young painter was warned by friends of his who were also friends of Sheriff Chafin, "I wouldn't do that, you'll get into jail if you do. Don won't allow any such talk as that."

The forces against the miners assembled a number of airplanes near Logan. When one of these planes crashed into a roof and came down, an independent-minded citizen remarked in the hearing of a neighbor woman, "Well, there's one that won't bomb the poor miners." When he got to the place where the plane had fallen, he remarked, "I've got twenty-eight acres of ground, and fourteen big fat hogs, and twenty-one bushels of potatoes, and the miners can have all that when they come. They won't hurt no civilized person."

That afternoon the sheriff or his deputies arrested him, without warrant or charge. They kept him in jail eleven days, and then, it appears, only released him because his brother had appealed three times in his behalf to General Bandholtz, commander of the Federal forces sent in to keep order. The sheriff's office finally trumped up a liquor charge against him. When he came to trial, the only witnesses against him were deputy sheriffs. When these deputies were compelled to testify without the opportunity of hearing one another, their testimony hung together so badly that the judge, though reckoned the prisoner's enemy, dismissed the case. It is difficult to see why that judge did not have the witnesses prosecuted for perjury.

During the mine war I know definitely that one man was discharged by the mine superintendent because, in the superintendent's own words, Don Chafin "said so."

The end of the mine war did not bring the end of these Turkish tactics. During the strike of the railroad mechanics last summer two deputies, with no warrant, arrested a striker named A. A. August at Peach Creek on the ground that he called some strike breakers, "scabs," and deputy sheriffs, "thugs." The deputies jerked August about, put him in a motor car and took him to jail. When August was locked up, Squire White, the jailer, said to him, "You don't like Logan County."

August answered, "I do like the county, but I don't think much of the people that's in it."

White opened the cell door and came in and beat August over the head until he fell. August did not fight back. He knew better. Three hours after they put August in jail they turned him out without a trial.

(Concluded next week)

World Court League

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES has asked that the United States join the World Court set up by the League of Nations.

The recommendation is going to be bitterly opposed by three groups of people:

(1) Those Senators and others who do not want the United States to have any participation in world affairs.

(2) Those who think it is a first step toward recognizing a community or league of nations.

(3) Those militarists who have no trust in any method for peace except armaments and war.

The opposition of certain Senators is going to be very strong as was evidenced by the reception of President Harding's first message to the Senate.

On the other hand, the President is determined to put the United States in to the World Court and has announced his determination to go to the people.

He will need the help of every lover of good-will and of everyone who believes that the time has come to substitute judicial methods for war in the settlement of international disputes.

Everyone who believes that the Christian principles can be applied to international affairs should immediately address himself to helping the President achieve this high purpose.

Every American should rally to the President because the Court is largely an American idea, and every great American statesman has advocated it.

The President's call to America to sustain him, voiced in the letter to Governor Bloom of Ohio, should express the sentiment of everyone who wants to see America taking her full share in world problems: "I look upon the establishment of the Court of International Justice, with the jurisdiction that has been given to it, as one of the greatest advances which world society has made toward conditions in which, at last, the rule of law may be substituted for the rule of force. It looks to the settlement of issues before they become dangerously acute; it contemplates the elimination of the causes of conflict and war. Feeling thus, I cannot but believe that our own country should be among the most devoted adherents of such a program."

Let us all devote ourselves to sustaining the President in this high endeavor.

We can do much personally.

(1) We can write a letter to the President congratulating him and offering him our support.

(2) We can write our Senator at Washington urging him to support the President.

(3) We can preach, talk, and write about it unceasingly.

BUT WE CAN DO MUCH MORE IF WE WILL BAND OURSELVES TOGETHER FOR A YEAR TO PUT OUR UNITED FORCE BEHIND THE PRESIDENT.

With this thought in mind the editors of The Christian Work, a magazine which has led in the movement for America's participation in world affairs, have undertaken to unite the Christian pastors and laymen of the nation in a

WORLD COURT LEAGUE

Will you not join us and thus have part in achieving one of the greatest steps ever taken in Christian history?

You will triple your influence in this way and together we can bring such pressure upon the United States Senate that it will not dare to resist the will of the President and the people.

Membership is free to readers of The Christian Work. Will you not send your name at once on a post card addressed to:

---

WORLD COURT LEAGUE,
care of "The Christian Work,"
70 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

What Happened at Lausanne?

By Rev. James L. Barton, D.D.

Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions

[This address by Dr. Barton, the first after his return from the Lausanne Conference, was delivered at a meeting of the Commission on International Justice and Good-Will of the Federal Council of Churches. We print it for the information it contains. We disagree most earnestly with some of Dr. Barton's conclusions. No question is settled until it is settled right. It is impossible to accept the decisions of Lausanne meeting on minorities and denying any sort of justice to the Armenians. America must never consent to that. She must never put her hand to a treaty tacitly or explicitly accepting those great wrongs against humanity. The Church must make her voice heard in Washington, declaring that we will sign no treaty with Turkey, which does not grant justice to the oppressed and the wronged.]

AFTER the Smyrna tragedy there was an almost universal appeal from the missionary and religious organizations of America to the President and to the State Department that the United States should do something to prevent the transportation of the Smyrna tragedies across the Bosphorus into Constantinople and Europe. In view of a proposed conference for the settling of the Near Eastern question, this appeal included a request that the United States should have official representation in the conference and be ready to take its share in its conclusions. It is doubtful whether in all the history of the United States there has ever been an appeal to the Government so generally endorsed and backed up by the religious and philanthropic and moral interests of the nation. I was told in Washington that the mails of the President and of the State Department were flooded even in excess of the way they were just before America entered the war against Germany; that the sentiment of the country was more united on the question whether America should take her place in stopping the tide of barbarism that was threatening to sweep across into Europe. And you know the result. Three delegates represented the United States on the side lines in the conference, and that was the conclusion of the whole matter.

Our delegates were there and they were in an impossible position. I never have had greater sympathy with any group of men in any assembly than with these men who represented the moral sentiment and the interest of the United States in that significant conference that was sitting to settle all the great Near Eastern affairs. I talked with many newspaper correspondents—and I want to say that they were of the very best type that can be gathered out of the experienced body of newspapers men—and every last man with whom I talked said that the unofficial representation of the United States would not have been tolerated for one hour if France and England had not been heavily indebted to us and had not been afraid that the United States might send them a note and say, "When will you pay some of that interest, and what about the principal?" They were bound, in dealing with our representatives, to consider them simply as advisers because just before the conference there was an official interview at Washington, published in the London papers quite at length, to the effect that no matter what was done at Lausanne, the United States would take no responsibility for the result and would join no demonstration against Turkey nor make any other arrangement whereby the representatives of the United States should assume any responsibility for the conclusions of the conference. Our representatives were there to advise England, France and Italy as to what they should do in the settlement of Near Eastern affairs, with the assurance that whatever they got out of the Lausanne Conference, the United States would expect the same. Whenever our representatives spoke, they spoke on what ought to be done, not to help to do it.

You can imagine the position they were in. How different that situation from what it would have been if the sentiment expressed in the many petitions to the State Department had been listened to and followed. Suppose the United States had been there taking its share of responsibility, with the Secretary of State as its representative (for this was an official conference and the nations were represented by their Ministers of Foreign Affairs), saying at the outset that the American nation would stand together with the several nations in this conference to carry the matter through, and carry it through right. I think there was not a man at Lausanne who did not believe that if they had done that the whole thing could have been finished in six weeks, and finished right. But that was not the condition. We were there simply to advise and to see that the Allies secured the most possible in the concessions that were to obtain in the treaty, so that when America made her treaty we might secure all they had won. So far as was possible under those limiting circumstances our representatives did well.

For three months the discussion continued and our men stood for certain specific things. Without doubt we helped secure the freedom of the Straits. Another objective which the American representatives struggled to secure was an Armenian national home. I suppose they put more time and more effort into that than anything else. They had strong instructions from Washington to find a place to which the Armenian population could be taken, orphans from the Near East Relief and others dependent on charity, where they could speedily become self-supporting. They lost out on that. The Turks came there after a tremendous military victory, much elated at what they had achieved. They came feeling their way. They moved cautiously until it became apparent that France and Italy would not join with England in any coercive measures. Lord Curzon gave them two or three ultimatums. At first they yielded; they did not want to fight even England. When they began gradually to sense the situation and to see that no force was to be used against them they became bolder.

Another point was the old question of whether Christians should be driven out of Turkey. Our delegation said they should not. But Dr. Nansen came over from the League of Nations with the statement that the only solution of the Turkish question was an exchange of populations. That sounds very good until you begin to figure out what it means: it means chiefly driving the Armenians out of Turkey. But the Turks were allowed to remain in Thrace as long as the Greeks remained in Constantinople. An order was issued that the Armenian population should get out of Turkey. They were given thirty days to do so. Strong opposition arose to such an extent that the order was modified to all "liberty" to go for thirty days. In some places the notices were worded as follows: "You now have liberty to go out of the country. If you fail to go out of the country now, the government will not be responsible for anything that happens to you later." So they got out. Practically the whole Armenian population evacuated except the men from fifteen to fifty years of age, who were retained as prisoners. The exchange of populations came to mean the elimination, possibly temporary, of the Armenians from the Turkish Empire except in Constantinople, and many there are receiving notice to leave.

Let us see what has been won by the Turk.

In the first place, the Turk has won control of Constantinople. The English have some troops there for the protection of the city, but Lord Curzon himself said that in case of war between Turkey and Great Britain the whole army would be sacrificed. In Constantinople, I am informed, they have the archives of the Embassy boxed and ready for shipment.

The second point that the Turks have won is the right to expel a non-Mohammedan population. It is the one thing I most feared from the conference. Here was a principle which has never, so far as I am aware, been discussed in any other great international conference. At Lausanne it was discussed and Turkey was virtually accorded the right to expel her Greek and Armenian populations because they were not satisfactory to her. This has been done at a conference at which seven nations sat as participants. I raise the question whether that is not a dangerous precedent to set—to say that a nation that wants to rid itself of any part of its population should have the right to send them out with no warning and no place to which they can go.

Turkey has secured also the "right" to abrogate previous engagements that she has entered into during all time. That fact has been tacitly acknowledged, although under protest. I raised the question with Ambassador Child before I left. "Suppose this treaty is not signed, what about the treaty of 1832 with the United States?" "Oh," he said, "that has been set aside by Turkey." All the concessions, all the capitulations, all the permits, all the agreements that have been entered into by previous Turkish governments prior to 1918 are wiped off the slate. The Turks are starting anew and the Powers are practically accepting the situation and have labored for months trying to get something in place of the capitulations, tacitly acknowledging that the capitulations are abrogated.

Again, the Turks have won the absolute elimination of the Armenian question from any future discussion. I believe it is true that this is the first international conference in Europe that has been held to consider matters of the Near East since and including the Berlin Conference where the Armenian question has not been up for consideration. Ambassador Child made some strong representations on the subject, Lord Curzon gave a great message, and the Armenians made a complete case, prepared with great skill. I was informed that the Turks had said that they would not sign a treaty in which the Armenian question was mentioned or the word "Armenian" or "Armenia" appeared. The treaty, I believe, does not mention them at all. They are spoken of only under the name "minority population." In this conference that was supposed to settle the Armenian question, and with our delegation instructed to try to secure an Armenian national home, in a night the question was thrown over and the Armenian question was dead.

Another point that Turkey has won is the securing of a clean "bill of health" from the Lausanne Conference. There was much said about atrocities. Ambassador Child made some splendid utterances, Lord Curzon was very frank about things that have shocked civilization, and they all said things that many of us have said, but in the final conclusion there is no indictment.

As far as I can see, there is no appeal from the findings, whether the treaty is signed or not. The highest tribunals we know for the trial of a nation, a tribunal made up of representatives of five powers who gave two or three months to the consideration of the subject, arrived at conclusions written into a treaty. There can be no appeal, unless you were to call the same group again and get them to reconsider the case. It seems to me we must acquiesce in the findings of this conference as the conclusion of a superior court of nations from which there is no appeal, however much we may rebel against the conclusion.

So the Greeks must evacuate the country they occupied two thousand years before they ever heard of Turkey. The conference accepted it and there is little use in raising protest against it now or of talking of its cruelty. We must acquiesce in the fact that the Armenians will not be given a national home within the boundaries of the Turkish Empire, even though it be contrary to every moral sentiment of our being. Those questions have been discussed in the highest court and it has been decided that that is the solution of the race question in the Near East. We must also recognize that the Turk has the right to expel any other populations he does not like. In Constantinople I was told by some of our missionaries who have lived among the Kurds that the Turks feel towards the Kurds much as they do toward the Armenians. Turkey now has the right under the sanction of this court to turn out the Kurds.

Now as to some conclusions.

My first conclusion is that we are forced to consider this Turkish case closed. The Turk has carried on his government by processes of massacre for a generation. He has been tried by a court of his peers and they have found no indictment against him. There is no court of appeal. Some say, "Appeal to the moral judgment of the world." It has been appealed to. It was appealed to in 1915 and after the tragedy of Smyrna. It was appealed to when that tragedy was in danger of being repeated in Constantinople. And nothing came of it. And immediately upon the heels of that tragedy this conference was called and they have come to this conclusion and there is no higher court. The United States can now do nothing for the protection of the Armenians unless it were to declare war on Turkey and fight the war alone. We could have joined, three months ago, with England, France and Italy in a firm stand. Then the case would have been settled right and without war.

There is just one thing that can be done. The question was raised in Lausanne after the Armenian case was closed as to whether, England, France and Italy would appoint a representative each on an international commission to look into the condition and needs of the Armenian refugees, an "Armenian Refugee International Commission." Ambassador Child was heartily in favor of it. He agreed to do everything possible to secure co-operation on the part of the United States. This would create an international commission of four men whose object would be to look into the needs of the Armenian refugees and see what could be done, even if it demanded national appropriation.

We have seen physical force fail in dealing with the Turkish Empire. It has accomplished nothing. Whatever physical force was represented at Lausanne failed to make any impression upon the Turk. We are driven to the one thing we can stand for, namely, moral force. The only course open to us is to recognize the facts as they exist and muster our Christian forces. We have not lost faith in the power of Jesus Christ to win a nation and a people. We are driven from our confidence in physical force to our absolute belief and confidence in the power of the Gospel of Christ to change conditions in the world.

It is an interesting fact that the Turks in Lausanne recognize that there is a moral need. They said they want missionaries; that religious liberty is accorded. Turkey is no longer a theocracy. The government is divorced from religion. Religion centers in Constantinople and the civil government in Angora.

Again, Turkey is going to need help to reorganize her government. They will be slow to take experts from Great Britain, France and Italy. America must be ready to furnish these. I believe that if we go into the League of Nations with Turkey (she has been accepted by the Lausanne Conference and we cannot turn her out) we can bring to bear on Turkey a moral force that will have weight with her and will help her to be worthy of a place in the sisterhood of nations.

The Mission of the Church

By Rev. Charles Edward Jefferson, D.D.

Minister of the Broadway Tabernacle, Congregational Church, New York

“GO ye therefore and make disciples of all the nations”—these according to the Gospel of St. Matthew, are the last words of the Founder of the Christian religion. Christianity is a world religion. “God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son.” God is the Father of all. All men are brethren. “God has made of one all the nations of the earth.” “There cannot be Greek and Jew, circumcision and uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, bondman, freeman; but Christ is all and in all” “The field is the world.” The Christian Church must carry the entire world in its eye and the whole human race on its heart.

The religion of Jesus Christ has to do not simply with individuals, but with nations. His Church must deal with empires and republics. It is futile to train individuals to act toward another like Christians, if nations are left to treat one another like barbarians. Individuals cannot successfully worship Christ while nations continue to burn incense to Mars. The Church cannot win respect for so-called Christian nations so long as those nations dress in armor. It cannot induce adherents of other religions in great numbers to believe in Jesus Christ as the Saviour of the world so long as nations which profess to follow Him spend their time in the manufacture of poison gases for the purpose of destroying other nations, and in drilling men in the art of dropping asphyxiating bombs on defenseless cities. We cannot get young men to believe in the Golden Rule while they are being drilled in the art of jabbing sharpened steel into human abdomens. We cannot persuade men to give themselves to a God of love while the government is industriously sharpening the instruments of hate. Why attempt to pray when the prayers are drowned by the thunder of target practice? Of what advantage is it to save souls when diplomats and statesmen and journalists are permitted to plunge the whole world into hell?

Here, then, is the supreme duty of the Church of God in our generation. It must enter boldly into the realm of international life and claim everything for Christ. The Church has a world message and a world responsibility. The law of love is binding on governments, and civil officials are all answerable to God. It is impossible to make permanent progress until governments become Christian in disposition and purpose. Statesmen and rulers must act on the principles of service and sacrifice or be thrown out of office by the Christian people. To make their government Christian is the first duty of Christian men. It is the mission of the Church to establish on this earth the Kingdom of God, which is righteousness and peace and joy. The world cannot be joyful without peace, and the world cannot have peace without justice. Just as long as governments treat other nations unfairly we shall have a world torn periodically by war. There can be no abiding peace unless political leaders love justice. The Church cannot secure peace if statesmen pursue policies which are wrong. The Church cannot abolish war if governments persist in piling up explosives. The mission of the Church is not to declaim against the horror of war, but to overthrow governments which pursue policies which make war inevitable. The Church exists to create a friendly world. We cannot have a friendly world until governments get rid of their pagan traditions and dispositions. The Church must make disciples of the nations, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever Christ has commanded.

In the work of creating a more friendly world the Church must begin in the home. Children must be trained from the beginning to speak respectfully of foreign nations. All insulting epithets applied to foreigners must be taken from their tongues. Other peoples should not be spoken of scornfully at the dinner table by Christian parents. Children early get the temper and attitude of their elders. In every Christian home every nation which is mentioned in conversation should be spoken of in the language of appreciation and good-will. The schools, from the highest to the lowest, should be nurseries of friendly feeling. A school is a mischievous institution if it biases the heart against foreign nations. Boys and girls who are contemptuous of people under other flags grow up to be men and women who justify war. The conversation of society should be kept gracious and sweet. It is in social intercourse that the seeds of war are often sown. The unguarded tongue can keep fires burning in the heart which may one day burst into a world conflagration. The Christian pulpit must build up in Christian people the international mind. It must so emphasize international obligations that men shall have an international conscience. If we are to make disciples of the nations, then we ought to think of them often, and consider ways of drawing them closer to us. A Christian Church is not worthy of its name if it is not a fountain of friendly feeling. The Church exists to extend the sway of love over all the earth, and to this great work every congregation should make its contribution. The world's atmosphere should be made fragrant by the friendly sentiments expressed by Christian people. "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the sons of God." Every one of us can win that title.

The supreme mission of the Church in the twentieth century is to create a warless world. We must make war unthinkable. Three of our Presidents have publicly declared that war between Great Britain and the United States is unthinkable. That cannot be said too often. We should form the habit of saying it. All the people should be educated to say it. The English-speaking peoples will fight one another no more. Let that resolution be written in the book of life!

If war between the United States and Britain is unthinkable, then preparations for an American-British war must also be unthinkable. Why prepare for a war which the mind is not allowed to entertain? If it is a crime against humanity for these two nations to fight, it is also a crime for them to squander their money on the implements of slaughter. Nations are shepherds of the gold that is given them. For every dollar of it they must render an account. How can Britain and America hope to escape the condemnation of Gehenna if, with their great cities in their present deplorable condition, they squander their resources on preparations for a war which sensible men have declared to be unthinkable? A powerful group of militarists is everlastingly at work in both countries eager to build up the military and naval establishments beyond all rational dimensions. By their incessant chatter about the "next war" they keep the old fears alive and give all the old suspicions a sharper edge. It is the duty of the Church to watch these men—to expose them—to rebuke them. They are among the arch-mischief-makers of our time. The Church must keep its eye on all jingoes, no matter where they are to be found, whether in the House or in the Senate, or in the newspaper office. Jingoism is a disease, a pernicious and degraded form of patriotism. Journalists who in their papers habitually jab at foreign nations, and by their idle gossip and poisoned rumors darken the mind and embitter the heart, should be abhorred and feared by all decent people. Politicians in high places who speak of sister nations in terms of insolence and insult should receive the hot condemnation of all who love mankind. No man is fit to hold political office in the United States who cannot speak respectfully of every foreign nation, and who does not breathe in all his public utterances the spirit of international good-will. It is the work of the Church to create a public opinion so discriminating and powerful that any reckless reprobates who may own newspapers or hold office shall find themselves impotent to work harm.

The Christian Church is working constantly in the interest of international understanding and concord. Even when its leaders are recreant or dumb, it goes on drawing the nations closer together. It is impossible for Britain and America to drift permanently apart, for the reason that the Church is potent in both countries. British and American Christians are numbered by the scores of millions, and these great masses of human life are always pulling the two nations together. In all British and American churches the Lord's prayer is repeated—a prayer that breathes the spirit of fellowship and forgiveness. When we pray we are always together. And when we sing, we are still together. Britons sing the hymns of American poets, and we sing the hymns of British poets. In the hymn book the two nations are indissolubly united. When we read the Bible, we are side by side. It is always reminding us that we have one Father, and that we are all brethren. It is always pleading with us "to put away all bitterness and wrath, and anger and clamor and evil speaking and malice, and to be kind to one another, tender-hearted, forgiving one to another, even as God for Christ's sake has forgiven us." When we celebrate the Lord's Supper, we are in the presence of One who is Master of us all. When we listen to the preacher, he is always asking us to look to Jesus. Every British preacher exhorts his hearers to follow Jesus. Every American preacher does the same. Here is an amazing thing. The proud Briton, rich in the possession of a long line of British sages and heroes and martyrs and saints, turns away from this great company of the immortal, and urges all Britons to keep their eyes upon Jesus. The American, also proud of his country and its mighty men, turns his back on them all, and begs his hearers to look only to Jesus. The Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes are glorious flags, but there is a flag above them all, the banner of the Cross. Under that banner millions of Britons and Americans are gathered. Americans and Britons are ardent patriots, but they know that patriotism is not enough. In their great hours they rise above all forms of nationalism, and sit down in the kingdom of righteousness and peace and joy. Their citizenship is in heaven. All Christians believe in the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit is the spirit of love. Possessing this spirit, they are not surprised or frightened by superficial differences or temporary estrangements. "There are diversities of gifts, but the same spirit. There are differences of administration, but the same Lord. There are diversities of operations, but it is the same God who worketh all in all." Christians know that there is "one body and one spirit, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all and in all." Confident that nations live and move and have their being in God, and that God is love, we are sure that the future is safe. If love is in us all and over us all, then love will ultimately conquer. Our friendship is a growing one, and nothing shall be able to separate us. We shall have in the future as in the past our differences of viewpoint, our clashes of opinion, our divergent judgments, our outbursts of ugly temper, but all these are transient and only bubbles on the surface.

Our hearts are intertwined. Our minds are interlaced. Our lives are merged and blended. Our ideals are the same. Our purposes and hopes are one. We are working for the sway of love. We trust all to love. We know that "Love bears all things, hopes all things, endures all things. Love never fails."

New Forces in Old China

By Sherwood Eddy, LL.D.

[Mr. Eddy has just been spending three months in China, and is now in India. His distinguished work in the Foreign Division of the Y. M. C. A. is familiar to the Church in America.]

UPON arrival in Peking, after an absence of four years, I had interviews with the President, Li Yuan Hung, whom I had known previously as General, Governor, Vice-President and ex-President, and later with the Premier and various ministers and officials of the present government. The political situation in China seems desperate. The people of China, led by the students and intellectuals, are very slowly rising to a new national consciousness and a new democracy. The government, on the other hand, seems rapidly to be falling. Can the people rise in time to save the situation? It seems very doubtful. The government at this moment seems headed for bankruptcy and disaster. But perhaps some national calamity is needed to rouse the sleeping giant of China to put forth her energies for full self-realization and self-determination.

Several elements determine the political situation. The first is the widespread and almost universal custom of "squeeze," bribery nepotism and corruption in official circles. Even the Chinese merchants, after contact with their corrupt officials, have contracted the habit of taking "squeeze," a practise which is now shared by many of the foreign firms who claim that they cannot get business in China without it. The representative of a large business house in America told the writer recently that he was given eight hundred dollars as his share of the "squeeze" in a business transaction amounting to some eight thousand dollars. This system of bribery is honey-combing and sapping the moral fibre of China's life.

The growth of militarism and the selfish independent power of the military governors, each with his underpaid and underfed feudal army of retainers is the most immediate and serious menace to China. There is a growing number of discharged soldiers who have kept their weapons and have become bandits. Soldiers and bandits are often interchangeable and work in collusion. Banditry is increasing in almost all the provinces. Some students dare not go home for vacation lest they be seized and held for ransom. The crops of the farmers are taken, merchants are robbed, the wealthy citizens are heavily taxed, and in some districts towns and villages are attacked, robbed and destroyed. As we came south on the principal express train, corresponding to the New York Central or Pennsylvania, we received official notice that we could not go through as the trains were held up on account of bandits. Word had just come that two more women have been seized by the bandits here in Honan province, making eleven foreigners now being held by these outlaws who are demanding admission to the army as officers. General Wu Pei Fu, who is in command of the soldiers in the district swept by bandits, has not put down these highwaymen. His men are said to be giving them arms and ammunition to carry on their brigandage. In Szechwan thirty "generals" lead their bandit armies and even students who are members of respectable families are becoming brigands as the only means of protecting their own property, for only the bandits are safe.

